NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"RING out the false, ring in the true." "Ring in the common love of good." "The heart must ring thy Christmas bells," and for the New Year, too. So may it be with us all, and bring such happiness as the best wishes of this season ask! For THE INQUIRER we ask the great happiness of being used for better service. Many friends are bent on this, and have faith in its opportunity and the need which it can meet. Very thankfully we acknowledge the abundant help, which goes to the enrichment of these pages, and what we would further ask of friends throughout the country is a more strenuous and persistent effort to bring the paper to the notice not only of members of our churches, but of others to whom it might bring a most welcome message of new light and help.

IN the churches themselves we believe that THE INQUIRER might be used to much better purpose if an effort were made to waken fresh interest; and this we say from no motive of self-interest in the paper, but because the reason of its existence is to give such help to our common life as the churches need. And beyond their borders, we hear not infrequently of unexpected gratitude for what THE INQUIRER has to give, so that we are sure it is worth while to aim at greater publicity, and would urge our friends to use every opportunity to make others acquainted with the fact that such a paper exists.

ONE welcome means of making THE INQUIRER better known has been through the Free Libraries. For some years a number of friends have subscribed for copies to be sent to such libraries in London and various parts of the country. We shall be grateful for a renewal of these subscriptions for the New Year and for a substantial increase in their number. Many more copies of THE INQUIRER could be thus used to great advantage, if the means were placed at our disposal.

WE hope to publish next week an article by Mrs. Bosanquet in the series on Questions of Social Economics, the subject being, "Charity and the Seasons."

THE marble monument to commemorate the ministry of Dr. Martineau in Little Portland-street Chapel, which has been executed by Mr. H. R. Hope Pinker, is completed, and is to be unveiled on Saturday next, Jan. 10, when a short service will be held at 2.30 P.M., and will be conducted by some of Dr. Martineau's pupils in Manchester New College. As this is the only memorial in London to Dr. Martineau, it is hoped that not only those who remember his ministry at Little Portland-street, but also those who revere his memory and have benefited by his teachings and writings, will endeavour to be present on the occasion. The service will be conducted by the Revs. V. D. Davis, Henry Gow, and H. S. Perris, and short addresses will be given by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and Philip H. Wicksteed. On the following Sunday, Jan. 11, which is the anniversary of Dr. Martineau's death, services having special reference to the Memorial will be conducted in the morning by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, and in the evening by the Rev. H. S. Perris, minister of the chapel.

WE have this year the prospect of a number of meetings of exceptional interest. Mr. Tarrant, in his London Letter, has laid special emphasis on points of interest in the annual meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with which the Emerson Centenary falls in happy conjunction. The triennial meeting of the National Conference of our Churches, to be held at Liverpool in April, brings round the twenty-first anniversary of the founding of the Conference, to be celebrated in the place of its birth; and then, in September, come the meetings at Amsterdam of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

WE are glad to hear from Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden, who is acting as hon. secretary to the Committee in Holland, that preparations for the meetings of the International Council are well advanced, or, as our Dutch friends prefer to style it, the Internationaal Congres van Vrijzinnig-Godsdienstigen. There is to be no official language at the meetings; some of the speeches and papers will be in Dutch, but other languages will be used. The printed programme is not yet issued, but the general procedure is already fixed. On Tuesday, Sept. 1, morning and afternoon will be devoted to the Annual Meeting of the Liberal Ministers of the Dutch Church, and in the evening there is to be a religious service in one of the churches, followed by a reception of the foreign delegates to the Congress. Wednesday morning and afternoon the International Congress will meet for the President's Address and the hearing of papers, and in the evening there will be a reception at the house of the Burgomaster of Amsterdam. The mornings of Thursday and Friday will also be devoted to the work of the Congress (we hear there are altogether twenty papers on the programme), and for the afternoons excursions are planned. We trust that many of our friends will note the days, Sept. 1 to 4, for a visit to Holland, which cannot fail to be of the greatest interest, as well as a service rendered to the cause of Liberal Religion.

WE have read with great interest and sympathy, in the Christian Register of Dec. 4, the publishers' notice and the editorial thereon. The Christian Register is the very able representative of the Unitarians of America, and is conducted with an enterprise and resource far beyond anything we have yet attained. Five years ago, in the hope of a largely-increased circulation, the annual subscription for the Register was reduced from $3 to $2; but the result has been a total loss in the five years of $25,000, that is over £5,000. A thousand a year is more than the publishers feel justified in spending even on so admirable a piece of missionary work as the Register, and they have therefore reluctantly returned this year to the old price of $3 annually. With such papers as ours, it is not a question of making any profit, but of how much generous supporters feel justified in spending on the good work. To the Christian Register all honour and the most cordial good wishes for the New Year!

IT was a welcome piece of news on New Year's Day that, through the representative of the United States, President Castro had, in general terms, accepted the proposals of Great Britain, Germany, and Italy that the matters in dispute between these countries and Venezuela should be submitted to the arbitration of the Hague Tribunal.

ON Sunday Canon Henson, than whom there are few Churchmen more respected by non-Churchmen, made an "impassioned" appeal to his Nonconformist brethren to abandon party action and all that savours of sectarianism, and to join, for the sake of the children, in a spirit of loyal co-operation to make the Education Act a success. There is something in his appeal that must wake a responsive thrill in every sincere lover of his country and his race; and we would that the mood for which he appeals could prevail. But there are circumstances in which it is quite in vain to talk of peace and loyal co-operation. The answer of Nonconformists, as given by Dr. Clifford and others, has been immediate and unmistakable. They say, in effect, the appeal to think only of the children should have been made earlier by Churchmen to Churchmen, and that the negotiators who have squeezed every possible advantage out of an abnormal political situation, and whose tactics in Parliament have been described over and over again by speakers on their own side as mean and tricky, have certainly no right to expect a lamb-like demeanour in their defeated opponents. We can but regret that Canon Henson's Christmas address should meet with so unwelcome a response; but he must remember that "not peace but a sword" is the proper watchword in the presence of iniquity, and no less than this is charged against this Act.

AT a recent meeting of the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society the passing of the Education Bill through its final stages and its having received the Royal Assent were reported. Whereupon it was resolved:—

That in view of the passing into law of the Education Act, 1902, and particularly in view of the unconstitutional methods adopted, with the sanction of H.M.'s Government in the later stages in both Houses of Parliament, this Committee records its sense of the disgrace and injury which have been inflicted upon Parliament itself and the nation. They realise too the injury done to education by the violation of the principles of Civil and Religious liberty upon which, as Lord Rosebery recently said, our free Constitution has been built up. They trust that the effect of this disastrous measure will be to convince the electorate, in increasing numbers, of the necessity for the disestablishment and disendowment of the State Church.

It was also announced that the following gentlemen had accepted offices in connection with the Society, and would aid in promoting the forward movement decided upon by the Westminster Palace Hotel Conference held shortly before Christmas—namely:—President, Rev. Dr. Clifford; Vice-Presidents, Mr. Lloyd George, M.P., and Mr. Carvell Williams; Treasurers, Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., and Mr. William Carpenter. The Committee resolved to immediately start a fund for greatly extending the Society's operations all over the country.

A WRITER in the Free Methodist, speaking of foreign missions, declares that the quality of the Christianity planted in China is equal to anything that the world has ever seen; that the Churches there are not sickly and stunted growths, but vigorous trees of righteousness; that the converts there have shown that they can bear persecution in its cruellest forms, and while suffering unspeakable horrors pray for those who despitefully use them. He adds: "Missionary work now, largely through the faithfulness of the Chinese converts, commands universal respect and esteem." Supposing this representation to be just, or approximately just, there must be somewhere a detailed record of admirable work done by Methodist missionaries in China, and admirable results achieved. If a frank and fair statement of the efforts made, the difficulties overcome, the temptations resisted, the spiritual successes gained were made generally accessible, it surely would suggest valuable lessons for every Christian Church; for every Church, when it is a Church, not a mere club, has something of the mission spirit, and needs to learn how to conduct missionary operations, and to create and direct missionary energy.

THE motive power at the back of some of the best of these Evangelical missions is explained in a sermon printed in another Methodist paper, preached by the Rev. S. Chadwick in the Central Hall, Manchester. The preacher calls this motive power "vicarious faith," and thus describes it:—

Vicarious faith despairs of no man, and that is the sort of faith you want in a mission, and wherever you are doing the work of God, a faith that believes in the infinite possibilities of all men in and through Jesus Christ. Vicarious faith says that there is power in Jesus Christ to save the worst, and to save them under the worst conditions, and to make a good life possible to any man who lives anywhere outside hell. We say that grace is stronger than nature, that the power of God is stronger than surroundings, and unless we believe that we had better shut up shop.

There is manifestly a limit to the optimism of the faith thus bluntly described; but as that limit only affects the destiny of man after he has gone out of this world, it does not check, but rather seems to stimulate missionary activity. It is to be feared that the vast majority of those who indulge in a still "larger hope" have not the definite concrete belief in their own capacity for giving spiritual assistance to any sort or condition of man, which seems absolutely essential for successful missionary labour. The whole subject of Christian missions will bear further investigation and further study.

THE funeral of the Archbishop of Canterbury took place last Saturday in his cathedral city, with something of the simplicity which he desired, and with much impressiveness. There was a great gathering in the Cathedral, where the Archbishop of York, Dean Farrar and other distinguished Churchmen took part in the service. With Mrs. Temple and her sons were Mrs. Benson and Miss Tait, representatives of the Archbishop's two predecessors in his high office. The grave is in the Cathedral garth, the open grassy space within the cloisters, on which the great tower of the Cathedral looks down. Of Dr. Temple's character and work we have spoken more fully in a leading article.

A TRIBUTE to the late Professor H. L. Withers, of Owens College, Manchester, in the Athenæum of Dec. 20, makes one realise how grievous a loss his early death has brought to the cause of enlightened education. He was only thirty-eight when he died last month, but he had shown the highest capacity and enthusiasm, and was already recognised as an authority in his subject. From King's College School he went to Balliol, where he won an open classical scholarship, and subsequently, to gain experience, taught in an elementary school at Oxford. From 1893 to 1899 he was principal of the Borough-road Training College at Isleworth, and in the latter year was appointed to the Chair of Education at Owens College. Of the character of his work and influence the writer in the Athenæum speaks in the following terms:—

No one who knew him there (at the Borough-road College) will forget his stimulating power, his masterly skill, his wholly beneficent rule over the youths he had to mould into teachers of the rising generation. He was inspired by the vision of lofty ideals, towards which he pressed with all the directness of a strong and simple nature. In the Chair of Education at Owens College he wielded even a wider influence, which was rapidly increasing. He gave valuable advice to the educational authorities of the nation in 1901 with regard to the improvement of the teaching of history throughout elementary schools, and his suggestions are embodied in a published memorandum. He was elected the first chairman of the Council for the Registration of Teachers recently instituted by the Board of Education.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—At the close of the Michaelmas term the annual school supper was held. The headmaster, Mr. Lewis, presided, and the resident masters and matron and all the boys were present. Among the guests were the Rev. S. A. Steinthal (chairman of the Governors), Rev. H. E. Dowson and Mrs. Dowson, Mr. G. H. Leigh (the treasurer) and Miss Leigh, Mr. H. P. Greg, Mr. A. H. Worthington (the hon. secretary) and Mrs. Worthington. After supper the senior boy proposed the health of the guests and referred to various topics of interest in the school-life. The Chairman of the Governors, Mr. Steinthal, replied on behalf of the guests, and in doing so alluded to the great satisfaction the Governors felt in the successful establishment of the school, and their pleasure in knowing from what they saw and heard to-day and on previous visits how cordial was the relationship between the boys and their masters. He particularly referred to the Governors' confidence in the headmaster, and spoke of the friendship and esteem which the Governors and the boys alike felt for him. After supper a concert was given under the direction of Mr. H. L. Jones, one of the resident masters. The programme consisted entirely of songs and instrumental pieces performed by the boys, several of the masters joining in the choral items. A very enjoyable evening was spent.

To pray "not my will but Thine" is to open the doors of the soul and admit the unseen life of God. A new potency rises within us. The soul expands, and, as by magic, a mean hovel is a palace—fit habitation for the King of Glory who has entered in. It is as though a freshet of heavenly rain upon the hills swept through the channel of our life.—Every-Day Papers.

FOR THE NEW YEAR.

BY THE REV. STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

WE are all in contact with two mighty worlds of boundless interest—Nature and Humanity; and at every moment they open before us a new page, if we have the eyes to see and the heart to read it. But we read little, if we are thinking how soon life will be over; or if we are thinking how much we wish it over. Imprisoned by these thoughts in ourselves, we cannot see what is going on outside the high walls we have ourselves built up. If we only could get out, we should cease to regret life's brevity, or cherish any anger at its length, in the rushing life and change, in the beauty and terror, in the awe and glory of the world. And the moment we lost ourselves in this vision, we should be kindled by the living spirit of the Universe, and gain the powers that question it; pierce into its interests, sorrow bitterly with its sorrow, rejoice with its joy, and, in sorrow as well as in joy, find in us that new life which in its every movement animates and freshens, because it is impassioned.

The World ever New.

The sun rises every day upon a new world. Every day the woods are new, and the streams that gloom and glitter through them. Every day the mountains and the clouds live together a new life; there is not an hour in the growth of grass and flowers in which they do not know and feel new things, and put on new garments to welcome what is new; and through and over all, and around all, rushes the wind, and pierces and sweeps the sunlight, and washes the great ocean—the living changers of the world, themselves in incessant change! No novelty? All is novelty! And even were not all things for ever new, we ourselves might make them new, if we could change enough. Changed thought makes a changed world. New feeling recreates the common fields, the gardens, the woodland paths where we have walked a thousand times. And the more we change aright, the more we see and love; and the more we see and love, the deeper becomes feeling, and the deeper feeling is, the more beautiful, enchanting, life-giving, life-inspiring, is the World of Nature.

The Glory of Self-forgetting Life.

So is it also in Humanity. "Too long, too long, is life!" Yes, perhaps, to some whom sorrow gnaws, or apathy makes cold, who are mastered by the battering of fate, or who yield to the deadening power of the passions. For all passions bring death or life in their train, according as we live in them. But far too short is life for those who are not its captives, but its conquerors; who, impatient of all enthralment, find out that the root of all defeat and gloom in life is self-thought; and in utter abhorrence of the slavery of always brooding on themselves, or on their troubles, break loose from the prison, and open the doors of their heart to every comer, to every new interest of mankind, to new hopes, new joys, new love, new faith in men, new work; and if these impulses fail and die, leave the dead to bury themselves—with tender regret, for all that has once been lived in lovingly is for ever dear—but still with faces set towards a new morning, a heart free for a new life, and a hand burning for new work. To these Humanity is for ever new. These are like voyagers in a new land. They may be tired, ill, wretched at intervals, but they wake each morning eager to penetrate still further into the mysterious country of Humanity; and every day, in their love of it, and of their work in it, both personal and public, they forget to feed the wretched, craving worm of self within, who lies coiled like Fafnir round its fatal treasure, so that at last it starves to death. These live, and know that life is endless. "Three score years and ten," they say; "it is impossible that this should finish me!" Immortality rises before them like a dream. And ere they come to die the dream is reality.

And, in truth, it is to that as the only solution these things point.

Our Present Wisdom.

But put the question of life to come aside at present, for we have to do now with life on earth. If there is so much treasure in it, and so short a time in which to find the treasure, how shall we best find and enjoy these riches?

"Haste," say some, "and take all you can when you are young, while you are able to have delight. Win from every moment its own peculiar flavour. Once fled, it will never come again. Pluck every rose in the garden, and now; who knows the tempest may not come in the night, and none be left to-morrow. To-morrow? Why, to-morrow we may be with the yesterdays of twenty thousand years! Waste not your momentary hour of joy in trouble, in work which will not help a fleeting race, in vain disputes of past or future. Be quick to seize and squeeze the orange dry. Remember, while you muse or wait, the hour slips by, is lost for evermore, with all its joy: O, make haste!"

The Disappointments of Greed.

Is it too coarse to say that that advice does not bear washing? It is not more coarse than the advice itself, nor than the end to which it brings a man if he follow it. It lands him finally in the hogstye of Circe, and keeps him contented there. Or, if not contented, because of a little grain of conscience, the "little grain of conscience makes him sour"; and then self-contempt and scorn of men make old age bitter, and memory like a cup of vinegar.

Moreover, even in the height of life, the advice does not gain its end. Pleasure is not won save for an hour. To drain the cup at a draught is not to taste the cup. To pluck the rose is to see it wither before its time. All true joy is won as slowly as true success. The goal is not worth reaching unless we have felt with growing pleasure every step of the way.

Christ's Better Way.

The true way to win the world, to make enough of things, to get all that our seventy years can give us, to drink deep of beauty from Nature, to receive and give that love to men in which joy is found, is not, as these others say, to win impulse from the world without, but to bring impulse from within to the world without; is, not to watch in order to gain joy and pleasure from the outward, but to gain a certain beautiful temper of soul. That is Christ's way of turning things. As he said, "It is not that which cometh into the mouth that defileth a man, but that which goeth out of the heart," so he would say, "It is not that which cometh from without that delighteth a man, but that which cometh from within." The state of heart is that which makes or unmakes joy, which makes earth a paradise or a hell, and man a wonder that we love and honour, or a beast, whom we despise or hate. And when we have the true state of heart, then every impulse that comes from without—of sense which brings beauty, of noble speech or act which bring with them kindling and hope—does tenfold work upon us; does not pass away, but endures, being met by that in us which is kindred to the impulse. The outward is all-powerful for good when the inner life is true.

And what is this temper? Generally speaking, it is the temper of self-forgetfulness. But that is too large a term, and says nothing to those who are not self-forgetful. No one understands what it is to be freed from self until he is freed. Therefore, it is wise to listen to four sayings of Jesus Christ, which may replace those of the Epicurean, and which will lead us, if we follow them and live by them, to that temper of self-forgetfulness in which we shall receive joy from the world of Nature, and the world of Man.

Blessed are the Meek.

The first is: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." We may not think that Jesus meant that those who were of a patient, unobtrusive, gentle, submissive temper, were those who won kingdoms, and lands, and wealth. Christ was not blind to facts; he knew well enough, for he was himself meek and lowly, that it was not an earthly inheritance that the meek possessed. But he meant, and the saying is the fine expression of a habit of his soul, that habit out of which grew his vivid reception and delight in all things in Nature—that to those who had this temper all beautiful things belonged, belonged through the joy which they imparted. Those who care for Wordsworth will know what Christ meant when he spoke of the blessedness of the meek in their relation to Nature; for though the poet did not own a rood of land, he possessed as his inheritance the whole of the north country. Every mountain, stream and fell, all the emerald of spring and the crystal of winter, the gold of autumn and the fulness of summer were his inheritance by the rapture he had in their grace and glory. Nature does not care for the laws of property, and all she has she gives to the heart that says to her—"I love you, I lay my whole being open to your power; submissive to receive, joyful to receive, made gentle with gratitude for beauty." Yes, that is the temper of soul which inherits the earth, and seas, and skies; every flower that blooms, every mountain side, all the forests of the world, all the clouds and stars, the gold of the sunrise, and the pearl of dawn.

Unanxious for the Future.

And the second saying is this—"Take no thought for to-morrow." Be not troubled about the future; about cares and business and riches, and what we shall do a year hence. Do not let life be absorbed in these things. They are not life; the true life is within us, in faith in God who will watch over us; in the glory and beauty of the world, in the love and hopes of men. If we are overwhelmed with cares of self and cares of family, if our soul is choked with thorns, we shall see nothing fair, and hear no music, and be joyless all our life. He has no freedom to love, no power to receive, who is always thinking—What shall I do, where shall I bestow all my goods, what shall I eat, and wherewithal shall I be clothed? Let us give enough attention to these things to make outward life possible, honest, of use to others—for care of others has none of that blinding or choking influence that care for ourselves possesses—but, for ourselves, let us take but little trouble; have no anxiety for all these worldly matters. Consider the lilies of the field, and try to live a little in their way. That is part of the temper which will make all our seventy years full of delightful change, quick pleasure, active interest. To such a heart Nature opens her arms, and Human Nature unfolds itself each day.

The Blessedness of Giving.

The third saying is this—"Give, and it shall be given you"; and this is different, strangely different, from the practice and teaching of the world. "Take, and we shall have; keep, and we shall possess." So speaks the world—so is its law of life.

Give away, said Christ, and it shall be given you. But what are we to give and then receive? Goods, money, material things? If we give these away shall we get them back? No; Christ knew what he was saying. If we gave these things away with the hope of receiving them back, he would not have thought that to be "giving" at all. What he meant was to give ourselves, give our heart to Nature and to Man; pour forth all that is in us of love, and joy, and interest. Then we shall receive the love and joy and rapture that we give, aye, and more than we give; for Nature, that sends all her tide of life into such a heart, is greater than we; and Humanity, that opens her thousand arms to such a heart, is infinitely more than we are. The whole world is ours. Then, and then only, we shall understand the way in which Christ filled up that saying, and his meaning—"With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Good measure pressed down and running over shall men give unto your bosom."

The Vision of the Pure in Heart.

And the last saying is this—"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." That is the highest of all, the crown of all. To see God in Man and in Nature is to see in them Goodness, Truth, Purity, Love, Power, Infinity, Absolute Joy, Perfection—and all these working with everlasting creativeness in Nature, pouring forth themselves with the passion of eternal Fatherhood towards man. It is a vision which whoso sees is freed from the false joys that perish and end in scorn; from the apathy which corrupts life, from the regret that life is so short, from the misery that thinks it so long.

Then, having that purity of heart which secures righteousness within our thoughts, and right conduct among men, we see God moving and loving in Nature, and the vision frees us for ever from the curse of seeing ourselves in Nature.

Then wherever we go we see Him in mankind, and the vision enables us to rejoice in men, to hope for them infinite hopes, to labour for them with certainty of success, to see beyond all sorrow and hate and pain, the glorious close. And what we see in both, in Nature and in Humanity, we see purely, because we are pure in heart. Nature is always clean and clear to us—men are always lovable and true to us. Out of that springs, day by day, joy, passionate interest, unbounded desire to go forward, quick, incessant life. Not an hour, not a moment is without its movement, without its progress, without its loveliness. The beauty of the Lord our God is upon us. And our three score years and ten are filled, more than filled, for now we know, having felt life, that it cannot die, that the term of earth is but the threshold of eternal life, eternal love, eternal joy, eternal peace. Here and hereafter, God has prospered our handiwork. To enter the New Year with these thoughts, and to live in them, is to enter the palaces of God.

LITERATURE.

THE HEXATEUCH.*

It is an interesting and encouraging sign of vital interest in the study of the Old Testament in England that a fresh issue should be demanded of substantial portions of Carpenter and Harford-Battersby's great book on the Hexateuch. This book, as readers of THE INQUIRER are aware, consists of an elaborate history of the criticism of the Hexateuch, together with a fresh exposition of the results finally reached in all their bearings, and a reproduction in parallel columns of the different constituent elements of the Hexateuch itself, carrying out the analysis more consistently and in greater detail than had ever been done before. The work in this complete form was at once the fullest introduction to the Hexateuch and the fullest analytical edition of it produced in this or in any other country. It covered and extended the ground of such works as Kuenen's Hexateuch on the one hand, and the polychrome edition of Genesis-Joshua on the other.

From the new issue the analytical edition of the documents themselves has been dropped, but all the rest of the material, historical and critical, including the word lists and analytical tables, has been preserved. The volume now constitutes a complete and exhaustive introduction and handbook to the study of the Hexateuch, and can be used with any of the existing analytical editions; or will enable the reader to construct his own edition as he goes along. Even apart from the perennial interest of the subject with which it deals, the volume has a unique and monumental significance as the record of a continuous inquiry carried on generation after generation through many windings, retrogressions and aberrations (in which, however, the clue has never been wholly lost), to final conclusions so stable and so secure as to win the assent of the most divers schools of thought. "Other foundation can no man lay," and advocates of the most varied views of the history and theology of Israel must needs build upon it if they are to build at all. It may well be doubted whether physical or linguistic science can point to any more august record of research or any more triumphant and secured acquisition of objective truth.

Those who have in any degree followed Professor Carpenter's multiform work during the years that have elapsed since the issue of the former edition will be filled with wonder at the evidence of the minute attention with which, amongst all his preoccupations, he has not only followed the most recent contributions to the criticism of the Hexateuch, but has continued to extend and deepen his knowledge of the older literature. Not only are the works of Holzinger, Steuernagel, Gunkel, and others continuously dealt with in the notes, but such points as the double ascription of Genesis vii. 24 in so early a writer as Astruc are noted for the first time in this edition. The most important new investigations that are noticed concern the attempt to analyse Deuteronomy into two sets of documents by means of the use of the singular or plural number in the numerous direct addresses to Israel—a phenomenon to which Mr. Carpenter allows only secondary importance—and the developments or alternatives suggested by Kuenen's hypothesis that the Book of the Covenant (Exodus xx.-xxiv.) was originally represented as promulgated in Moab—a point as to which some uncertainty of handling in the former edition was pointed out in THE INQUIRER review. These and other modifications are relegated to foot-notes; but the text has also been revised and enlarged, as, for instance, in the elaborate treatment of the affinities between the first creation story and the Mesopotamian mythology. The general structure of the work, however, is entirely unaffected by the studies that have appeared since the issue of the full edition, and, so far as any department of human study can ever be said to have been worked out, one may surely regard the criticism of the Hexateuch as having now reached its goal and made its definitive contribution to the elucidation of history and the formation of critical and historical method.

On a single point of detail we feel some perplexity. One of the numerous convergent lines on which Professor Carpenter works, consists in demonstrating that every Biblical author of whose date we can be reasonably certain shows acquaintance with those portions of the Hexateuch which, on internal grounds, we should place earlier than his date, and ignorance of those portions which we should place later. In this chain of argument one of the most important links used to be found in Jeremiah's ignorance of the Levitical legislation. He declares (vii. 21, 22) that Yahweh gave no commands to Israel when he brought him out of the land of Egypt as to the difference between "sacrifices" and "burnt offerings"; which subject is, however, treated in the Priestly Codex.

It seems to follow that that codex did not exist in Jeremiah's time. But this piece of evidence is not (that we can find) cited by Professor Carpenter in either edition. Are we to understand that he thinks undue stress was laid on it by the critics of twenty years ago? This, at any rate, appears to be the opinion of Dr. Oort in his great Dutch commentary on the Old Testament, but old-fashioned students of the Hexateuch, such as the present writer, would like at least to be told what has become of their antiquated weapons. Well, in his first edition, Professor Carpenter declared that any journalist who should lightly talk of "sweetness and light" "might safely be placed with Matthew Arnold in the second half of the Victorian Age"; but since some audacious reviewer or correspondent has (apparently) pointed out to him that the phrase was used by Swift, he boldly declares in the second edition that this derivation "really strengthens the argument," since it was Arnold that gave the phrase currency. Perhaps, after all, the suppression of Jeremiah's evidence is only intended to "strengthen the argument" by showing that while all the hostile evidence is carefully weighed it is unnecessary to cite more than a selection of the favourable testimonies. Or, perhaps, the text duly appears, but has eluded our search. P. H. W.

THE SCRIPTURES TO-DAY.*

IT is barely forty years since an Anglican bishop was virtually deprived of his see, inhibited from preaching in English pulpits, and held up to universal reprobation, for having published a work impugning the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and the literal accuracy of the Scriptures. Had anyone then foretold that, before the century was out, the views for holding which Dr. Colenso was disavowed as a heretic by all his episcopal brethren would have become the commonplaces of all competent scholarship, he would have met with angry incredulity; while, had he added that in the year 1902 another Anglican bishop would proclaim the identical views in a popular shilling primer, without so much as suffering loss of popularity, one wonders what fate would have befallen the prophet!

We are inclined to regard the publication of the Bishop of Ripon's "Introduction to the Scriptures," in the form of a companion volume to the justly popular and now completed Temple Bible, as of an importance out of all proportion to the mere scholarly value of the book. Dr. Boyd-Carpenter tells us quite frankly that he is not in any sense an expert, but merely a populariser who "has not closed his eyes to the advance of knowledge." The important circumstance lies rather in this, that, in the opinion of those whose judgment may be trusted, the time has now come when the publication, in cheap and popular form, of the main conclusions of Biblical scholarship may be considered both safe and desirable. And still more important is this publication seen to be, in the light of its authorship and the immense circle of readers which that authorship guarantees. The issue of a work like the "Encyclopædia Biblica" is a fact of vast interest—to the learned; or again, the results of modern criticism might be put forward succinctly from some unorthodox quarter—and fail to find a public; what was wanted was that the higher criticism should be brought to the people by a favourite writer of approved soundness—and this is precisely the want which the Bishop of Ripon's little book supplies. Written in a manner which is at once persuasive, conciliatory and sympathetic; destined, for the reasons already adduced, to reach the hands of a large constituency of Sunday-school teachers, Bible-class leaders, and the like, whose views it cannot fail to revolutionise, this "Introduction" is a most welcome sign of the times—it is, in effect, the official episcopal sanction of the higher criticism.

Dr. Boyd-Carpenter's position is made quite clear by himself in his opening chapter: "I make no secret of my own conviction that, though some critics have been rash and unskilful, the general results of what is called the higher criticism and its scientific methods will come to be accepted." And with consummate tact he tries to make his possibly-frightened readers understand that, as regards subsidiary facts at any rate, there is no need for any literal accuracy of the Biblical record; that the spiritual truth is sometimes, as in the case of the parables, wholly independent of the historical accuracy of the narrative; and that even if the stories of Balaam or Jonah be largely charged with a poetical spirit, the bond between God and man is not weakened by such an admission. In an excellent chapter on "Poetry and Prose" he expresses himself as follows: "It is not too much to say that a very large proportion of what are called Bible difficulties would never have existed had Western readers realised the tendency to highly poetical and allegorical forms which was so natural to the Jewish writers." Still more significant is his statement that the judicious student [of the Bible] will not feel bound to accept the writer's interpretation of everything which he narrates; and he gives as an instance the story, in John v., of the angel's supposed stirring of the waters of the pool of Bethesda, where "the modern would speak of the pool as a medicinal spring. The fact is the same. The mode of description is different." What would Dean Burgon have said of such an exegesis? Or what of the paragraphs in which the Bishop plainly hints that the belief in demoniacal possession current at the time of Jesus was but another instance of the ignorance of natural causes characteristic of the ancients, and that Jesus himself shared that ignorance, having, "in accepting the limitations of humanity, accepted the limitations which marked the scientific knowledge of his own day?"

Having discoursed with wisdom and charm on "The growth of the Bible," "The Idea of God in Israel," "Inspiration" and "Revelation"—and Dr. Boyd-Carpenter is always readable and often eloquent—having made such important concessions by the way as that "the love of the miraculous evinced by some writers constitutes a difficulty in accepting their narratives" (p. 94); he arrives only in the eleventh chapter at an explicit, though necessarily brief presentation of the views held to day with regard to the various groups of documents incorporated in the Hexateuch, the groups known respectively as J, E, D, and P. Of his treatment of this subject it will suffice to say that it is marked by candour and clearness, and should appeal to the minds of all except the hopelessly prejudiced; and similar remarks apply to the author's observations on the historical value of the Bible, where he, e.g., admits that it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a tribe or an individual is spoken of by an Old Testament writer, the tendency being to blend the two.

Nor does the Bishop sympathise with those who would exclude criticism from the New Testament—an attitude which he regards as not only vain, but unworthy; and he proceeds to explain the well-known theory of a primitive tradition underlying the Synoptics, this earliest, or "common-stock Gospell," being described by him as "The most valuable and authentic recital of the story of Jesus Christ." But what will probably startle the average orthodox reader most is the following paragraph which, in view of matters that have occupied much public attention of late, it will be best to give in full: "Now, in the common-stock Gospel, the miraculous accessories connected with the birth and resurrection of Jesus Christ do not find a place. These accessories are found in the group of secondary witnesses, i.e., in narrative common to two Evangelists. Upon these, in the first instance, we have purposely refused to lay stress. Our belief in Jesus Christ must be based upon moral conviction, not upon physical wonder. The argument that he was wonderfully born and miraculously raised, and that therefore he was of God, does not evoke, at any rate to-day, an adequate and satisfactory response." The Bishop of Ripon's position is, of course, not that of his Dean; nevertheless, it is at least novel to find the virgin-birth and bodily resurrection of Jesus spoken of as mere "miraculous accessories" by a prelate of the Established Church.

The Fourth Gospel "carries us beyond Time," leads us "from facts to the interpretation of facts, from the Jesus Christ of history to the Jesus Christ of all time," and its value, therefore, is not primarily historical, neither is the Johannine authority, in the strict sense of the term, defended as a corner-stone of the faith, the embodiment of a Johannine tradition being all that is insisted upon.

The critics' processes completed, what is left? The Spiritual value of the Bible remains. "That is the Bishop's conclusion, and the conclusion at which he wishes his readers to arrive, on being thus introduced to some of the methods and results of modern criticism. We heartily echo it, and agree with him in rejoicing that "we no longer need to read the Bible with the blinds of our intelligence half drawn down." Of one thing we are assured, and that is, that this little primer will do more than scores of elaborate treatises towards the drawing up of many cob-webbed intellectual blinds throughout the country. FOR THE NEW YEAR.

How many years have flown, how many more
Must pass me by with varied joy and grief!
New vistas stretch on every side, and now
The way seems longer, yet the time how brief!

I must arise, with forward gaze, and on,
Not asking "why" when life's great voices call,
Leaning on Strength that greater is than mine,
Fearful of nothing, yet prepared for all.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ROBERT BLATCHFORD'S "BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH."

SIR,—In a recent issue of THE INQUIRER a contributor, "Laboris Amicus," reviewed this book in an adverse fashion, commenting upon the kind of teaching which its readers were likely to receive from it perusal. Since reading this review I have read the book, and I hope you will allow me to enter my respectful demur to the, as it appears to me, very one-sided and limited view taken of the whole book and its teaching by "Laboris Amicus." I find that the quotations, some of which your correspondent rightly traverses, are taken, with one exception, from two chapters only out of nineteen, and that these chapters are not part either of the main argument of the book, contained in the first ten, or the practical political advice which is given in the last three, but are part of what may be described as discussion of side issues, outside buttresses of the argument of the book. I join with "Laboris Amicus" in thinking Mr. Blatchford mistaken in some of these "side issues."

I cannot see, however, that anything which your correspondent urges can be taken as controverting the main contention of the book as contained in the first ten chapters.

In order to show how unfair are his quotations as any real guide to the teaching of the book, allow me to quote some passages culled from its pages spread throughout the work, and not from any particular part.

Mr. Blatchford's use of the prayer in the Church Service, "That it may please Thee to defend and provide for . . . all that are desolate and oppressed. That it may please Thee to have mercy upon all men"! strikes a high note at the commencement which is well held through certainly the first half of the book. I proceed to quote without comment:

To reject an idea because it is new is not a proof of shrewdness and good sense; it is a sign of bigotry and ignorance.

Forget that you are a joiner or a spinner, a Catholic or a Freethinker, a Liberal or a Tory, a moderate drinker or a teetotaler, and consider the problem as a man.

Nearly all the wealth of the nation is produced by the workers . . . most of it is consumed by the rich . . . leaving the majority of those who produced it, not enough for human comfort, decency, and health.

In London 37·8 per cent. of the whole population get less than a guinea a week per family.

It is estimated that 3,225,000 persons in the British Islands live in over-crowded dwellings with an average of three persons in each room.

Ten-elevenths of all the land in the British Islands belong to 176,520 persons. The rest of the 40,000,000 own the other eleventh.

The shoddy science which talks so glibly about the weeding out of little helpless children is too blear-eyed to perceive that the same condition of inhuman life which destroys the "weeds" breed the weeds.

I grudge no man his wealth, his fortune. I want nothing that is his. I do not hate the rich, I pity the poor. It is of the women and children of the poor I think when I am agitating for Socialism, not of the coffers of the wealthy.

Every word of censure uttered by man is a word of error growing out of ignorance. As the sun shines alike upon the evil and the good, so must we give love and mercy to all our fellow-creatures. "Judgment is mine, saith the Lord." I do not believe in force, and I do not believe in haste. What we want is reason and right, and we can only hope to get reason and right by right and reasonable means.

Socialists demand a higher morality than any now to be found. They demand perfect honesty.

I leave it to those who read the book to decide which set of extracts most fairly depict the tone and argument of the book, mine or those of "Laboris Amicus." If any are sufficiently interested in the subject to read the book and form an opinion on it, I am quite certain that if they are, indeed, friends of labour, and friends of their kind, they will not regret it.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—After the vituperation with which this Bill has been assailed during the last nine months, it was refreshing to see the letter in its defence in THE INQUIRER from Mr. Ellis, a gentleman whose liberal opinions and thorough concientiousness no one who knows him can doubt. I consider the Bill an honest attempt on the part of the Government to place Voluntary schools for the first time under popular control. It does not, I admit, meet all our wishes, but in my opinion it goes as far as the majority of the public are at present prepared to go, and I doubt, even if the Opposition came into power at once, they could carry a more liberal measure. If the electorate do their duty it will only be in a comparatively few cases that the clergyman can obtain sole control of the schools. The proposal of some extremists to refuse to pay the rate appears to me childish; others might decline to pay income-tax because part of the money has been expended upon a war to which they were opposed. Let the Bill have a fair trial; it may want amendments, but no good will be gained by placing obstacles in the way of its working.

UNITARIAN WORSHIP AT CAMBRIDGE.

SIR,—The fact of my having a daughter, who has just completed her first term at a Cambridge college, has led me to consider the possibility and desirability of making a second attempt to provide at Cambridge, for those students who are children of Unitarian parents, an opportunity of attending a place of worship in which the services would be in accordance with the religious opinions in which they have been brought up. I understand that the Congregationalists, Baptists, and Presbyterians, all have at Cambridge congregations largely composed of undergraduates. It seems to me that we Unitarians ought not to continue to allow ourselves to be unrepresented at the seat of so important a university as Cambridge.

It is not likely that a self-supporting congregation could be established, but arrangements might be made for holding services in some hall or room for twenty-four Sundays in the year, which is all that would be required, in the first instance, at any rate.

Before taking any steps in the matter, however, it would be interesting and helpful to know the number of students at Cambridge who might be expected to attend such services as I have mentioned. With this object I should be glad to be favoured with the name of any Unitarian parent who has a son or daughter at Cambridge.

ST. FRANCIS AND ST. DOMINIC.

SIR,—I am sincerely sorry if I have hurt Mr. Hargrove's reverence for St. Dominic, and shall be no less glad if he can prove to me that he is really worthy to stand beside St. Francis. I confess, however, that I find the plea of his letter quite unconvincing, and I believe that many historians of weight would agree on the whole with my verdict. Unfortunately I have not the same familiarity with the sources for St. Dominic as in the case of St. Francis, but I should be glad if Mr. Hargrove can tell of other lives which have a claim to be called contemporary besides the one by Jordanus, his successor as general of the order, which is printed in the Acta Sanctorum. Moreover, can it be claimed that Jordanus gives an actual portrait in the sense in which the Speculum, Thomas of Celano and the Legend of the Three Companions give us a portrait? Is it not rather to be compared with the ecclesiastical life of St. Francis by Bonaventura? Mr. Hargrove must also be aware that there is grave doubt about the traditional friendship between the two, and that Dante's reference belongs to a time when the Franciscan legend had hardened into conventional moulds. It cannot therefore be accepted as an historical judgment of character. One word more—is it right to claim that St. Dominic devised a rule for his order at all? He accepted one, which was already in existence, from the Pope; and it was modified subsequently to bring it into closer harmony with Franciscan methods. Is it not also true that much of his success came in the last year or two of his life, when he had resolved frankly to imitate one much greater than himself? The delay in his canonisation is further contemporary evidence, if, indeed, more evidence is needed, of his inferiority to St. Francis in genius, originality and personal impressiveness. I am not concerned to defend every word in the passage of my article which Mr. Hargrove thinks is so much open to criticism, but I see no reason to modify the judgment which the words are meant to convey.

W. H. DRUMMOND.

THE title which Mr. Herbert Rix had given to his forthcoming volume of lectures, as announced in our issue of Dec. 27, proves to have been already used by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton. Mr. Rix has therefore altered the title of his book to "A Dawning Faith: or the World as a Spiritual Organism."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! That is what we all wish one another; and then, if we mean what we say, we set about trying to make it happy for someone, and to find new ways of helpfulness.

A friend sent me as a Christmas greeting a calendar for 1903, made into a charming little book, and for each month there is a page of sayings in prose or verse about friendship. These are some of the verses:—

The friendly word, the genial smile,
The answer soft, wrath to beguile,
The cheery greeting, kindly thought,
The ready help bestowed unsought:
And all to crown, the look so bright
That sheds on all around a light,
That sees, however dark the shroud,
The silver lining to each cloud:
A cheerful friend—God send to me
Such friend to find, such friend to be.

Think well what those verses mean, and they will help you to make it indeed, both for yourselves and for others, a happy New Year. EDITOR.

About Enjoying Oneself.

ALL of us have been thinking and speaking a great deal about "enjoying ourselves" lately. "I hope you will enjoy yourself." "Did you enjoy yourself?" How many times have we not said this, or something like it? I wonder if we have thought what we meant by it.

Why—you are thinking—it means at Christmas time to have lots of presents, to have a nice Christmas dinner, to have a Christmas tree and games, to go to the pantomime, to be asked to a great many parties. It means to crowd into a fortnight all the entertainments and all the fun we can. That is what we mean by enjoying ourselves.

Well, that is very much what most of us grown-up people first think of when we talk of enjoying ourselves. But, after all, is that quite what it means? All this is enjoying—isn't it?—something outside ourselves. It is enjoying the gifts or the games; enjoying what others do for us; enjoying the brightness and the gaiety about us; enjoying the pretty things; enjoying the novelty and excitement of the holidays. This is all very pleasant. And it is quite true that if there were no Self we couldn't have this enjoyment. But there is more than this in the words "enjoying oneself."

I read the other day two stories which made me think a great deal about this. One story was about a king—a king who had all those things which, as we think, make us enjoy ourselves all the time. He had a magnificent palace to live in. He had all the fine clothes and jewels and furniture he wanted. He had no end of cooks and waiters and people to entertain and amuse him. Everybody was flattered by being asked to Court. People gave him rare and costly things to please him, and if he wanted to make a present he didn't have to ask if he could afford it. In short, it was Christmas all the year round with him.

But when his birthday came he wanted to enjoy himself especially. He made a great dinner for his lords and generals and the grandees of the Court. All of these came in their uniforms and stars and orders, or whatever corresponded to these—a splendid show, you may be sure. If you and I had stood with the crowd outside the palace gates to see them arrive, how we should have admired and, perhaps, envied them!

The palace was aglow with soft lamps, the tables glittered with gold and silver. There were all the delicacies of the season, whatever they were, and the most costly wines. There were flowers and perfumes and music. And all these were to help these distinguished and grand people to enjoy themselves.

After dinner there was something artistic. A princess—a real princess—came in and danced for them; danced so gracefully that they all went wild with enthusiasm, and the king most of all, so that he called the princess to him, and bade her ask anything she pleased of him, and he would give it her, even to the half of his kingdom.

How they must have enjoyed themselves, especially the king!

I am not so sure about that. For deep down in this king's mind, at the very core of his self, was an uneasy sense of something that must not be looked at. Some time before this he had done an evil deed in taking the beautiful wife of his brother to be his own wife. Most people in those days thought no great harm of this, but one brave and upright man had told the king plainly that this was wrong. Like many other men who do wrong the king respected the man who dared rebuke him, without, however, paying any attention to what he said. He knew he was wrong, but he went on just the same.

And now the princess asked of him the head of this same brave man as the reward of her dancing.

All the brilliancy and gaiety of the feast went out for the king. How could he go back from his promise given before all his guests? Against his will he had to give the order. And by-and-by the ghastly thing was brought in and given to the princess.

King Herod had all the world can give to enjoy (so it seems to us), splendour, riches, power; but he could not enjoy himself. A memory and a terror haunted him. When a rumour reached him of another great preacher having appeared, his fear spoke out: "It is John whom I beheaded. He is risen from the dead."

The other story is in the same book, some pages further on. It is not about kings and palaces, but poor men and prisons—two poor men who felt they had a message from God, and were going from place to place trying to find those who would listen to it.

They had come to a great city, and were preaching as usual, when a great mob got together and dragged them before the magistrates, accusing them of disturbing the religion of the country and trying to bring in a new religion which was against the law. Then the magistrates, yielding to the mob, ordered that the men should be cruelly flogged and then put in prison, bidding the jailer by no means to let them escape. And the jailer, to make sure of his prisoners, locked them in the inner prison, and, to be still more secure, fastened their feet in the stocks.

Now I want you to think of the miserable plight of these two men. Suffering horribly from their wounds and bruises, in the dark, without food, in this painful posture, without a word of sympathy from anyone, uncertain of what the morrow would bring them—how wretched and forlorn must they have been! What do you suppose they were saying to one another? Pitying themselves, no doubt, complaining of their hard fate, wondering what would become of them.

Well, listen to what they were doing.

"About midnight, Paul and Silas were praying." Ah, yes, that is what people do when they are miserable and hopeless! "They were praying and singing hymns unto God!" What, singing? Then they could not have been miserable. People may pray when they are miserable, but they never, never sing. So then Paul and Silas were "enjoying themselves." There was absolutely nothing outside or around them to enjoy, but they were enjoying themselves.

What a wonderful thing this Self is!

Take away all our surroundings, our comforts, our friends; take away our gifts and learning and accomplishments, and there in the centre of our being sits this Self—this sense that I am I.

Or give us all these. Heap around us luxuries and delights. Give us the talents or the skill which make men famous. And there in the centre sits still this same Self. If that is right, all is right, and if that is wrong, all is wrong.

If that is at peace, if that is cheerful, hopeful, content, all is well in the midst of things that try, or hinder, or trouble us. If that is fretful, envious, uneasy, then we are unhappy in the pleasantest surroundings. These may excite us for a moment, then we fall back into the old discontent.

Ah, let us try to have a Self that we can enjoy. For if we can only enjoy our self we shall be sure to enjoy everything else, and if we can't enjoy our self, then nothing—nothing will be really sweet to us.

May all the children who read this column—ENJOY THEMSELVES.

"BORN TO-DAY."

"ONCE of old," the people cry,
"Came a Saviour from on high."
Every day, I tell ye true,
Is that Saviour born anew.

Simple watchers every night
See the blaze of holy light,
Hear the chaunting seraphs' story,
"Peace on earth is heavenly glory."

Every morn from baby eyes
Beams the Soul that never dies,
And the nestling mother hymns
Power divine in infant limbs.

Way-worn Wisdom, all our days,
Bends to Love and homage pays;
With the song, "Mine eyes have seen,"
Faithful age departs serene.

Shepherd, angel, manger, star,
Still His signs and heralds are;
Dawn and sunset, circling, bring
Still the Advent of our King.

"Once of old," the people cry,
"Came a Saviour from on high."
Every day, I tell ye true,
Is that Saviour born anew.

OUR GREAT INHERITANCE.

ON the threshold of a new year one is glad to stand for a few moments in quietness, with girded strength preparing for the new period of service, and contemplating the life into which we are called to enter more perfectly. It is a life, as we know, rich in possibilities of good, rich already in a great inheritance of spiritual treasures.

Those who maintain THE INQUIRER as a Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life are believers in spiritual freedom and in the power of truth as the unfolding revelation of GOD ; they are believers in the effective religious life of Free Churches, as an essential contribution to the life of the nation, striving after the establishment of the veritable Kingdom of GOD on earth.

We are set, therefore, to maintain a constant witness to truth and the true life, to strengthen and encourage all whom we can reach, who are pledged to that high service, and to rouse others, if it may be, out of faithless apathy or the pursuit of baser ends, to join our company and take a like vow of dedication to the service of the Highest. It is our privilege to draw many solitary thinkers and workers into the circle of our fellowship, and we are eager to reach many more, both at home and abroad, to strengthen the silent bonds which unite us together in this service, with an ever deepening sympathy, and a great gladness in the growing knowledge of GOD. And at the same time there is the closer union of our Free Churches, with their happy fellowship of worship and of work. We have no more earnest desire than to be an organ of their best life, to be a constant helper of their unity, their unselfish service, their witness to the truth of GOD.

It is, indeed, a great inheritance that we possess, even the solitary in the loneliest outpost of duty, and still more those who are within reach and have a share in the life of the Churches—an inheritance the greatness of which is a measure of the solemn call to duty, and the opportunity of service, which is ours.

Inheritors of truth, in the freedom of the Spirit, we have that wonderful sense of a calling which is of GOD, and the great joy of knowing that we are to be led in His way. It is a present revelation, simply all the truth that is clear to us, and all the new light that may come, not ours, but His, a gift the richness of which is to be ever unfolded in new beauty and power. When we contemplate the actual treasure which we now possess, we see that it includes the wisdom of the ages, of all great teachers, the seers and prophets of GOD. It includes all the grace and truth, which appeal to us with such uplifting power, in JESUS and in the world-wide fellowship of the Christian life. All is given us, as present living truth, by the inward witness of the Spirit, and our service is humbly and reverently to accept it, with joyful faith, and to make it manifest in the power of a faithful life.

For truth cannot be separate from life, and knowledge brings the most urgent call of duty. What we know sets before us the ideal of life for the children of GOD, in that true brotherhood of which JESUS spoke ; but that knowledge loses its hold, and becomes something of an hypocrisy, if we continue to profess it, yet are not urged into a strenuous endeavour to do the will of our FATHER, who is in heaven. Thus our great inheritance opens out to us the field of active duty, in which every effort is bent on the service of the Kingdom, in which we are not strangers to the way of the Cross, while yet the light of victory shines over it in heavenly radiance.

We are set to face the actual duty of our day, in the common things of this working world, to know herein the strength of eternal righteousness and the all-conquering power of love. Each one, as citizen, as friend, in the great brotherhood, has his own appointed work, and the Churches in their united strength have their work, to find ways of helpfulness, to resist that which is base and cruel, that which is selfish and worldly, to bring a purer breath of life into the foul places of the earth and a new light of truth and beauty, a new touch of human tenderness, into its dark and desolate places. The true spirit of brotherhood will be ever seeking to bring relief to the over-burdened, while wisdom labours for a better ordering of the whole community, the opening of richer opportunities for all alike, a fuller sharing of the best gifts of life. Each year the prayer, "Thy Kingdom Come," must touch us with a new insistence ; and with all the thankfulness and gladness, which go with us into the new time, there must be this very earnest purpose, to be among those who are ready to labour and make sacrifices, as the way opens, and duty is clear, for the Kingdom of GOD's sake—the kingdom of a genuine brotherhood among men.

Truth is held in clear conviction of the spirit, and steadfast doing of the FATHER's will ; and thus we are fitted to enter into the inner shrine of worship in a living Church. Here again is part of our inheritance and the great trust committed to our care. We enter on a New Year, and in our Free Churches must seek the spirit of a more devout and heartfelt worship, that shall kindle the deeper life in others and feed hungry souls. The reverent mind, the steadfast will, the prayerful spirit, these are asked of every one, all to be made perfect in love. Then will the knowledge of GOD increase, and the strength of our life in Him. Then will the communion of the seen and the Unseen become a more living reality to us, and with a new depth of thankfulness we shall understand the life to which we are called in the great Household of GOD.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP.

WITHIN the space of a few weeks the foremost minister in each of three different denominations has passed away. Dr. TEMPLE was a man whose character stood in sharp contrast to that of Dr. PARKER, and was equally unlike that of Mr. HUGH PRICE HUGHES. The Churchman was utterly free from that strain of the histrionic, that calculated eccentricity, which marked the Congregationalist leader. He had none of the mercurial excitability of the Methodist, none of his demagogic instinct, his too-easy eloquence, his incurable hyperbole. Dr. TEMPLE was plain of speech, even to bluntness, sober of statement, temperamentally averse to shows and trappings. To shrink from sentiment, and cloak warm feeling under cold language, is supposed to be an English characteristic. It was certainly characteristic of this Englishman, who often repelled and wounded people by the dryness of his speech and manner at the very moment when he was possessed by a warm sympathy for them. He did not owe his advancement, and the respect with which he was generally regarded, to any meretricious elements in his personality. Nor were they due to any eminent intellectual endowment or achievement. The long life-time of solid work, from which he rests at last, was unadorned with purple patches. The turmoil that encircled his name some thirty-three years ago, at the beginning of his episcopal career, was caused rather by the bigotry and dulness of his opponents than by anything remarkable in his own doings. He was a respectable scholar, but has left no mark on the history of scholarship. He will hardly be remembered among great preachers. He has not made a place for himself in literature. Even in the polity of his own Church he took no such commanding part as did several of his predecessors in the Primate's chair. In spite of the fact that he rose to the summit of dignity in his order, and became a constant object of popular attention, most of his work was done out of sight and underground. The value of such work cannot be estimated by mankind. It would need powers of perception, and skill in tracing links of cause and effect, greater than belong to our race, to assess the real result of so much quiet toil. But if we cannot estimate the work, we can at least honour, and in our own measure imitate, the conscientious worker.

There was in Dr. TEMPLE something akin to the best type of Republican Rome. He possessed the great Roman virtue of gravitas. Upon no man did the sense of active duty press more constantly, or translate itself more naturally into effort. His motto might have been agendo, and the worn phrase, mens sana in corpore sano, could hardly be better illustrated than by pointing to him. He had no obsession. Those great pulses of enthusiasm which by mastering a man make him the master of many were outside the possibilities of his nature. There can be no doubt that for his strong good sense as well as for his enormous power of work he was indebted to his unusual bodily vigour. That vigour he maintained by temperate living and incessant exercise, and used to its last ounce. A pathetic incident in the Coronation ceremony, and the almost tragic scene in the House of Lords which brought his public life to a close, are testimony to the ruthless way in which Dr. TEMPLE spent himself in the service of duty. Such a character has, of necessity, its negative aspect. No man can work regularly for fifteen hours out of the twenty-four without calling in the aid of routine. He loses somewhat of his respect for unapplied principles, and tends to depreciate the reflective and inventive forms of energy, which must nevertheless have their place, and a place anterior to the merely practical, if work is to produce its best possible result. He prefers to administer, rather than to reform; the temptation to make his work tell will lead him to side, whenever he may, with the stronger party. He grows, in effect, conservative and opportunist. This has been the course of Dr. TEMPLE'S metamorphosis: though, indeed, it is easy to exaggerate the degree of his earlier liberalism. Its one striking and unambiguous expression was Dr. TEMPLE'S advocacy, during his headmastership of Rugby, of Mr. GLADSTONE'S Irish Church policy. When, in due course, Mr. GLADSTONE nominated Dr. TEMPLE to the vacant See of Exeter it was inevitable that the Opposition should represent the appointment as a reward for political services. There was, however, another and a much more serious objection raised to his consecration. A committee was formed to oppose it, and the opposite poles of English Churchmanship, Dr. PUSEY and Lord SHAFTESBURY, made common cause against what they regarded as a great danger and "a very grave scandal." The essay which Dr. TEMPLE had contributed to "Essays and Reviews" was an innocent paper on "The Education of the World." It maintained what is now a commonplace, and even in the early sixties was no very monstrous proposition, that GOD has appointed for mankind a gradual growth in moral and religious truth, and that such a progress can be traced even in the Old Testament. But the volume which contained this essay was anathema. It contained also a review by Dr. WILLIAMS, of Lampeter, of BUNSEN'S Biblical Researches, in which the reviewer taught that the Bible was not verbally inspired, and expounded, if he did not adopt, heretical views on Propitiation and Justification. The contagion of this lamentable heterodoxy spread through the book. Heresy was detected in more than one of the other papers, and Dr. TEMPLE'S essay was assuredly guilty—if not of direct heresy—at least of constructive heresy, by the countenance which it gave to sinners. Dr. TEMPLE was earnestly begged by his friends to dissociate himself, by a public statement, from the obnoxious views of his fellow-essayists. Now it seems to be the truth that Dr. TEMPLE did not share those views. He had been utterly deceived as to the real policy of "Essays and Reviews," and had made that clear to his personal friends at Rugby long before there was any question of his elevation to the episcopacy. Now, however, when a disavowal of what he could in all sincerity disavow was demanded in order to his personal advancement, he closed his lips. Neither the public onslaughts of DENISON, nor the opposition of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, nor the desertion of some of his friends, nor the eager entreaties of others, could induce him to buy immunity for himself by denouncing his fellow-writers. Every possible obstacle was placed in the way of his consecration; and not until they were all overcome, and he was Bishop of Exeter, did he say one word in vindication of his own orthodoxy. Not even then did he repudiate, in any degree, his joint responsibility with the other Essayists and Reviewers. There was not one ounce of coward or sneak in the whole man.

The same happy blend of moderation and courage has been shown in his work for temperance. Dr. TEMPLE avowed himself a teetotaler when teetotalism was most unpopular. He has worked, in his own indefatigable way, for the cause of national sobriety, throughout his public life, and has done as much, perhaps, as any one man to gain such progress as may have been made. On the other hand he never profaned the cause by using the intemperate language which has been so unhappily associated with its advocacy. Strong, brave, laborious, honest, practical, he leaves behind him a memory and an example which appeal not only to the members of his own communion, but to all his fellow-countrymen.

THE PRE-EMINENCE OF LOVE.

ON CHRISTMAS DAY.

WE rejoice at the birth in Jesus Christ of goodness. New grace and truth came into the world with him. A new way of looking at things, new ideals, new hopes, new determination, a new kind of success entered into human experience. The world has not been the same since. It has been a better place to live in. There has been more sympathy with what is noble. Truth has had a larger opportunity. And a further birth of the Christ Spirit is what the world above everything needs. That Spirit alone helps us forward. Nothing else is worth mentioning in comparison with it as a factor in human progress. The increase of wealth and comfort, and machinery and knowledge, do not mean progress unless goodness increases with them.

So when we shake hands and wish one another a Merry Christmas, we mean a better happiness than good health and worldly prosperity, valuable as these things may be. We mean a better time for our less fortunate brethren, a more perfect realisation of our good aims and purposes, new strength to the causes of righteousness, a deeper faith in God, and a surer trust in Heaven.

It is, indeed, a sacred day. We are ashamed to be cross or ill-tempered in it. We want to forget injuries, to be at peace with our fellow-men, to be friendly with everyone we meet. We are ready to think well of all people to-day, and to believe in human nature. It cannot be a Christmas to us if we have not the Christmas spirit in our hearts, which is a spirit of peace, kindness, and forgiveness. And as there are times in our individual lives when we feel at peace with ourselves, hours when we are at our best, which seem to tell us of what we might be always if the Spirit of Christ dwelt constantly in our hearts, so Christmas Day gives a foretaste of what human civilisation will one day become when justice and mercy have taken the place of selfishness, and co-operation has superseded strife—when the Kingdom of God shall be a reality on earth, embodied in our laws and methods of business, and no longer an aspiration and a dream. An age is coming, and we are working for it, much sooner, I believe, than some imagine, when the goodwill of Christmas will have overflowed into the long year, and brought healing and hopefulness and consolation to suffering and embittered souls.

Love has many names, according to the objects to which it directs us. "It is reverence," says Dr. Sadler, "drawing us to the great and good; it is compassion for those who are cast down by misfortune and poverty and who need help; it is sympathy in joy and in grief; it is friendship; it binds us together in families; it welcomes us into the world and follows us out of it; it is as strong and valiant as it is gentle and easy to be entreated; it is zest in the noblest pursuits; it is the bond of perfectness."

Without love what would life be? It has been said of flowers that they will not grow to their best unless the gardener loves them. It is true even of an engine that the driver who loves it, who hovers affectionately over its machinery, gets the best work out of it. How much truer, then, is it that the man who loves his brother-man sees the best in him and draws the best from his nature? Let no dry and heartless observer imagine that he knows anything of humanity. Childhood, womanhood, manly strength, feeble old age do not unlock their secrets to his cold glances.

Let me quote a few sayings about love by the great Greek philosopher Plato, one of whose writings was a treatise on what to him was the "Kingdom of God," though instead of this Hebrew term he employed the Greek expression "Republic." He said: "At its touch everyone becomes a poet, even though he had no music in him before." You remember the Greeks thought much of art. They worshipped beauty in all its forms. Poetry and music were elements in their religion. Is it not significant that, in Plato's opinion, these forms of culture which the Greeks regarded so seriously, and of which they have left so many matchless examples, owed their life to love? He says again, "It is birth in beauty, whether of body or of soul"—meaning that a beautiful woman is not truly beautiful until she forgets and loses herself in something or someone she loves; and that a man's character is not truly gentlemanly, however accomplished he may be, until he is kind. Even more emphatically he says, "Love is fairest and best in itself, and the cause of what is fairest and best in all other things"—a statement not far short of St. Paul's, "The greatest of these is love"; or St. Peter's, "Above all things have fervent love among you"; or St. John's, "If we love one another God dwelleth in us." Think of it—Plato, Peter, Paul, and John all agree in giving pre-eminence among the virtues to love!

One other saying of the Greek philosopher has a peculiar resemblance to a passage in Scripture. It is, "He whom love touches not walks in darkness." We are immediately reminded of St. John's words, "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. But he that hateth his brother is in darkness and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes." How true, how grandly true this is! Whoever hateth his brother walketh in the midst of groundless suspicion, prejudice, and jealousy. He mistrusts when he ought to have confidence. He stands aloof when he ought to be near. He is tormented by unhappy recollections which will not allow him to enjoy the beauty that is spread all about his path. But whoever loveth his brother is not worried by anger and hostility. He is free to revere the great and good. He walks along with friends by his side. Others follow him with grateful thoughts for the pity he has shown them. His look, his tone of voice give people pleasure—they are encouraged by his presence:

The charities that soothe and heal and bless
Are scattered at his feet like flowers.

And more than this—the man who loves, far more than the man who is learned and clever, "knoweth whither he goeth," and whither all good men are moving. He sees light upon his path from the land afar off, the light of another world more divine than this one, whence love and goodness and heavenly peace descend upon our earthly flesh. The deeper his affections and longings the more he believes in that Infinite Sunrise, where "the day breaks and the shadows flee away."

HOPE REBORN.

"The light that shone when hope was born."—Tennyson.

In Tennyson's "In Memoriam," that wonderful story of the voyage of a human soul from the quiet harbour of faith across the stormy sea of doubt and on at last to the shelter of a surer faith than of old,—in that wonderful song of victory and life arising out of defeat and death, three Christmas-tides are depicted. The first Christmas follows immediately after the death of Arthur Hallam, the friend here celebrated. It is with trembling fingers and sorrowful hearts those who are bereaved weave the holly once again around the Christmas hearth. It seems almost a sacrilege to keep Christmas Eve as of old. But on Christmas Day itself another feeling creeps into the poet's heart. The dead rest, he says, their sleep is sweet; and then a prophecy of the resurrection of the soul from the sorrow of loss is uttered:—

Our voices took a higher range;
Once more we sang: They do not die
Nor lack their mortal sympathy,
Nor change to us, although they change.

Rapt from the fickle and the frail,
With gathered power, yet the same,
Pierces the keen, seraphic flame
From orb to orb, from veil to veil.

Rise, happy morn, rise, holy morn,
Draw forth the cheerful day from night;
O, Father, touch the east, and light
The light that shone when Hope was born.

"The light that shone when Hope was born" is a line full of genius. For the world up to that time had not been a very hopeful place, and what hopes men had once cherished had mostly died away. There were many virtues admirably exemplified in that ancient world—courage, fortitude, patriotism, justice, the sense of law and order, but hope was not of the company. Only in the Hebrew prophets do we hear that exhilarating music. They, indeed, looked forward with an assurance, with an intensity of expectation, singing songs of a fairer social day which have been the inspiration of mankind ever since. But at the time of Christ's birth, that prophetic hope had almost ceased to be a factor in the Jewish mind, while in the great Gentile world, whatever hopes had once brightened the outlook had given way to hard despair. Consider that awful description given by Matthew Arnold of the Roman Empire, then at the height of its sway, arrayed, like the Apocalyptic harlot, in gems and purple, its heart stony with cruelty and diseased with vice:—

On that hard Pagan world disgust
And sated loathing fell,
Deep weariness and sated lust
Made human life a hell.

In his cool hall, with haggard eyes,
The Roman noble lay;
He drove abroad, in furious guise,
Along the Appian way.

He made a feast, drank fierce and fast,
And crowned his hair with flowers—
No easier, nor no quicker passed
The impracticable hours.

It was a world without hope. It had no hope for the down-trodden masses; no hope of healing for sorrow but stoicism; no hope of any brighter future for the world; no vision of a happier life beyond the grave. It was a Pessimistic world in which there was only one way of escape from trouble—the way of suicide.

Into that world Jesus was born, and with his birth the lamp of Hope was re-kindled, never again to burn down. No one can mistake the bright hopefulness of the Gospel. All its key-words are glowing with the rosy beams of hope—Peace, Love, Rest, Goodwill, Grace, Truth, Joy, Mercy—these are words that have the silver ring of poetry, and no one can deny that they are totally opposed to all the words and moods of pessimism. If there ever was an optimist it was the Master.

Jesus saw the human race in the light that illumined his whole life, and held out to men the hopes that sustained his own soul. Pagan poets had placed the age of gold in the far past; Hebrew prophets referred it to a distant future. Jesus dared to say it might be here and now. It was the glory of ancient prophets to imagine a Kingdom of Righteousness that would yet be established on earth, with outward sanctions of authority. It was the glory of the Nazarene to set up the Kingdom Righteousness within the heart with the sanctions of immortal love. The highest reaches of optimism have never imagined for the world half of what was in the heart of Jesus. His unconquerable hopefulness arose from two sources—his faith in God and his faith in Man. All the forces of the universe were to him the expression and energy of the loving will of God. God was not, as to so many, far away, impersonal, Titanic. He was a wise and loving Father, working all things together for good.

God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world.

And men too were divine. The Pharisees of his day regarded the crowds of common folk, the labourers in the fields, the fishermen, the artisans, as so much moral refuse, the unavoidable débris of the workshop when that finished product of art, the Pharisee, might be seen. With Jesus the common folk were just the raw material of the Kingdom of God, rich in all the possibilities of character and manhood. He moved among men with an imperishable expectation of finding good there; expecting great things of the most unlikely. And he found what he sought. An unbounded faith in God and man fed his hope.

Once again we have been listening to the chiming bells of Christmas, to the sweet old carols with their quaint recitation of the lovely legends that grew up around that lowly birth. It is a message and a light of hope they give us, as we face the pilgrim's way that leads through the untravelled continent of another year. Once again we listen to the exquisite strain, "Comfort ye. Comfort ye, my people, saith your God," and take it with us as a talisman into the new time. I know not that our decadent age, with its miserable pessimism preached in art and literature, needs anything half so much as a message of hope. Neither do the friends and companions of Liberal Religion need a more precious gift for their enterprise.

Hope is our strong self awakening from the spells of discouragement, bitterness, apathy and despair. It is a moral virtue and duty, for in its highest form hope is a real act and striving of the will and the moral nature. The act of hope is often a choice of difficulty. It is a refusal to be borne down by defeat, and cowed by the multitude, and disappointed by delay; a refusal because it is not right to indulge in melancholy and become slack in effort. Hope plays a great part both in the inner life of the soul and the outer life of endeavour. It enlists imagination on the side of God; it is a charm against dark dreams and terrors. We are saved by hoping, and by hope the good cause is urged onwards. We are often tired of working for better things, depressed by all the ignorance, apathy, sin, and failure around and within; out of heart, out of patience. There is so much we cannot alter; so little we can do. Yet there is one effective thing we can do—we can choose whether we will walk on the shady or the sunshiny side of the street; whether we will live this new year in the light that shone when hope was born, or whether we will live in the glooms and mists of an unbelieving mind. Hope is a duty, and not just an indulgence of the spirit which we may or may not experience; nor is it simply a matter of temperament or circumstance. Not to hope is to sin against God's high goodness; not to hope is a crime against the teaching and spirit of Jesus. Hope is a force to be won by effort and cultivation. It is a man's duty, and therefore it is in his power to turn round from the darkening west and face the east where the dawn will soon appear!

JOSEPH WOOD.

THE BISHOP OF WORCESTER'S APOLOGETIC.

WE have already commented, in our weekly notes, upon the earlier lectures in the short series which Dr. Gore recently delivered in Birmingham on "The Historical Trustworthiness of the Gospels." The final lecture was devoted to the most interesting and important part of his task. It dealt with the Resurrection and the Virgin Birth of Jesus. The task which the lecturer set himself in this course was to vindicate, from a critical point of view, by critical methods, after due concession of the accepted Synoptic theory, the historic validity of the Gospel stories. In his third lecture, however, Dr. Gore introduced an utterly different dialectic principle. So far as it relates to his opponents this is what Touchstone called the reply churlish—he disables their judgment. If Dr. Cheyne, reviewing the evidence for certain alleged miracles, finds it inadequate, this is clearly "because of an antecedent determination that the thing could not have taken place." The pre-determination, on the other hand, which Dr. Gore himself entertains, that it not only could, but actually did so happen, all considerations to the contrary notwithstanding, is called "spiritual capacity," or "the religious consciousness," or "the inner witness," or "the childlike temper and willingness to believe."

What is the meaning of this sudden substitution of a subjective for an objective criterion? Why should the Bishop call away our minds from the consideration of evidence, and threateningly inform us that if we disagree with his interpretation of it we forfeit all claim to spiritual capacity? There can be but one reason for this. It implies a confession that the evidence, in itself, is insufficient to convince a perfectly candid mind. The bias of an eager desire must be added. What seems to favour the satisfaction of that desire will then, in most cases, receive an exaggerated significance; what tends to disappoint it will be ignored, belittled, or explained away. Dr. Gore does not yet perceive that this "inner witness," which is to be called in to supply the defect of external testimony, is the most subtle and obstinate foe to true thinking; is, indeed, the chief begetter of delusion, and the quality from which a sincere seeker after truth should pray most earnestly to be delivered. The only sense in which "willingness to believe" can be regarded either as an intellectual or as a moral virtue is a sense in which it may equally be called, with regard to any one proposed opinion, "willingness to disbelieve." The Bishop of Worcester seems, indeed, to have fallen into the commonest apologetic fallacy, the assumption, to wit, that there is in the whole world of thought but one doctrine to which "belief" can be conceded. The real issue is not whether we shall be believers or disbelievers, but which, out of the various interpretations of the evidence, has the greatest claim on our faith. At one time Dr. Gore used to settle questions of this kind by a summary appeal to the authority of the Church. He now confesses that this is to prejudge the event, since the claims of the Church are themselves based upon a particular set of results in Gospel criticism. For the Church he now substitutes the "inner witness," and is not yet awake to the fact that the same fallacy is implicit in the new device which vitiated the old.

It is not unnatural that out of the fulness of his "spiritual capacity," Dr. Gore should greatly overstate the merely critical case for the authenticity of the Gospel stories. He admits, indeed, that the evidence is not compulsory, but nullifies this concession by adding that "historical evidence never is compulsory." When, therefore, he asserts that "the evidence, regarded from a literary and historical point of view, is in the highest degree cogent and sufficient," Dr. Gore must intend to ascribe to the bodily resurrection of Jesus, and his birth of a virgin, an evidential certainty as great as belongs to any fact in history. Again, concerning the birth-stories, he uses the words—"historically, then, these documents bear the mark of genuineness upon them." It is clear that the man who so speaks is no longer addressing himself to reasonable inquiry, but to dogmatic prepossession.

A logical analysis of the argumentative portion of the Bishop's address might be extended to a tedious length. It would reveal the fact that in every several judgment the decisive testimony is that of the "inner witness." Again and again, in his own terminology, the lecturer tells us that if we already possess a strong conviction that these things must needs have been so, then we shall have no difficulty in admitting the evidence that they were so. There is, however, one point of peculiar interest. Dr. Gore himself shrinks from that view of the Resurrection, derived from Matthew and Luke, which looks upon it as a revivification of the dead body of Jesus. He regards the body which Jesus wore after death as "purely and simply a transcendent organ of the spiritual faculty," and quotes in support of his view an incident and a phrase from the Fourth Gospel. The Fourth Gospel is not in question, and, so far as concerns the Synoptics, this insistence on the empty tomb, on the consumption of food, on the possession by the risen Jesus of "flesh and bones," seem designed to make any such refuge for outraged reason impossible.

To a really critical reader the greatest interest of these lectures is still the personal one. Dr. Gore is a man of distinguished ability and scrupulous honesty, reverent and studious. How long will he find it possible to defer the inevitable choice between the principle of free inquiry and that of predetermination? And when he chooses, into which camp will his decision lead him?

A CHAPTER OF NONCONFORMIST HISTORY.

THE monthly meeting of the Nottingham High Pavement Historical Society was held in the Schoolrooms on Friday evening, Dec. 19, when the President (Mr. J. C. Warren) read a paper on "Early Independency in Nottingham, and the History of Castle Gate Congregational Chapel." The chair was occupied by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and there was a good attendance, including the Revs. J. C. Grant and Dr. Forbes (Presbyterian), and a large number of members of the Castle Gate congregation. Mr. Warren, after giving a brief outline of the rise of Independency, and contrasting its spirit and aims and its ideas of Church Government with those of the adherents of Episcopacy and Presbyterianism respectively, spoke of Independency in Nottingham at the outbreak of the Civil War. It was clear that the town was then and for long afterwards greatly disturbed by religious differences, especially between the Presbyterians and Independents. The former were far the stronger body in Nottingham, and great complaints were made of their intolerant behaviour to the latter, and it is recorded that Colonel Hutchinson, then Governor of Nottingham Castle, and himself an Independent, had frequently to interfere on behalf of his co-religionists and others who were molested on account of their opinions. As early as 1643 there was an Independent minister in the town, one Thomas Palmer, who in that year became a captain in the revolutionary army, but subsequently resumed his ministerial work, and was, in all likelihood, the pastor of the Independent Church which was first gathered in Nottingham in the year 1655.

After the Act of Uniformity their minister was driven away, and they became "a destitute people," as their old chronicler quaintly put it. They were severely persecuted during the period prior to the Act of Toleration, and, while the Presbyterians were sufficiently powerful in the town to openly conduct their worship both before and after the Declaration of Indulgence in 1672, the Independent minister suffered from six years' imprisonment and constant distress warrants. On the passing of the Act of Toleration in 1689, the Independents erected a meeting-house in Castle Gate, as the Presbyterians did on the High Pavement, the foundation-stone of the former being laid only five days after the passing of the Act. The deed of conveyance of the land on which the Castle Gate Meeting-house was built contained absolutely no trust, nor did any of the deeds which from time to time assured adjoining property to trustees on behalf of that congregation contain any trust. It was not until 1796 that a trust was declared, and that was simply a provision to the effect that the premises were to be used "as a meeting-house or place for the worship and service of God by the Church of Protestant Dissenters known as the Castle Gate Society," without any doctrinal trust whatever.

The High Pavement Chapel was also the subject of an equally free and open trust. That the theology of both congregations was at the date of the Toleration Act practically the same was shown by their holding joint week-night services, and registering joint meeting-rooms, and by the close association of their respective pastors. Yet in 1736 they found that a member of Castle Gate was excommunicated for unsoundness on the doctrine of the Trinity ("all other means for his recovery out of the snare of Satan" having been used in vain), and joined the High Pavement congregation, by some of whose members he seemed to have been supported; while in the following year a resolution was passed by the former Church declining to admit to membership any member of the High Pavement congregation who had joined that body after a certain date "without giving in their experience." They found, too, that in reply to an account of the excommunication given by the expelled member (to which was prefixed the famous "Prefatory Discourse in Defence of the Common Rights of Christians," by Dr. John Taylor, of Norwich), violent attacks were made by the Castle Gate minister and others on the "Arian heresye" and its adherents, to whom it was more than hinted that the High Pavement congregation belonged. They had thus the interesting fact that two congregations, both founded with equally open trusts, and at one time closely allied, alike in doctrine and in sympathies, had within less than fifty years diverged so greatly in theological beliefs that one was to the other anathema maranatha. The minutes and other records of Castle Gate were of the most complete and interesting character.

One noteworthy feature was the constant practice of prayer for guidance in almost every event of church and national life. Meetings of supplication were held with regard to the choice of ministers, elders (for the Castle Gate Independents had adopted the Presbyterian custom of a ruling elder) and deacons, the dealing with refractory members, and, for example, the seasons and the harvest, for protection from foreign invasion, the divine blessing on George II.'s arms against the French and Prince Charles Stuart, and as to the earthquake at Lisbon, while they solemnly thanked God for victories at Dettingen and Culloden. There were also numerous interesting records of discipline, and among other provisions in the Minute Book was one with regard to "burial in woollen as the Act directs." The most interesting entry in the baptismal register was that relating to Henry Kirke White, the poet, which ran: "April 13, 1785; Henry Kirk (sic) son of John and Polly White."

At the close Mr. Warren was thanked for his lecture on the proposition of Mr. Abbott, seconded by Mr. Sheffield, both deacons of Castle Gate Chapel.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE New Year, which breaks as these lines fall into type, will be marked, so far as we see, by four outstanding events in our Unitarian world. Named in chronological order, there will be the meeting of the National Conference at Liverpool, the Whit-week meetings of the B. and F.U.A., the International Council at Amsterdam, and the autumnal meeting of the B. and F.U.A. at Manchester, where already arrangements are being made for an exceptionally important series of meetings. The pleasing cares of hospitality will thus fall only once in the four to London; but, in addition to the features which render the B. and F. anniversary attractive to increasing numbers of people, there will be one of special significance. The centenary of the birth of Emerson—"the friend and aider of all who would live in the spirit," as Matthew Arnold called him—will occur in the week before Whit Sunday—the actual date is May 25. Nothing would be more fitting than that the Essex Hall Lecture should be upon Emerson and his influence, or some other connected topic; and certainly the effort will be made to secure a lecturer worthy of such an occasion and such a theme. In addition, I believe there is a possibility of hearing an American preacher of repute at the anniversary service, so that there should be a decided freshening of thought at our great national meetings at Essex Hall.

But another centenary, of a very different kind, brings the imagination back from these wide surveys to the contemplation of our own proper and perpetual sphere of work. It was on the bright, clear, early morning of a September day in 1803 that Wordsworth, looking eastward over the broad river below Westminster Bridge, wrote that memorable sonnet—"Earth has not anything to show more fair." London was already vast a century ago, and the poet's heart throbbed with the thought of "all that mighty heart" lying so still beneath the pure heavens. But now how much vaster, and what multitudinous energy and passion pulse through it daily! This is our sphere of work; and our work—what else is it but as far as we may to help and aid all who would live in the spirit, and to beget a willingness in those who as yet would not?

Some of us are apt to feel dwarfed into little better than nothing by the contrast between the broad fields, white to harvest, and our scanty band of labourers. The "religious census" which has been started by the Daily News has certainly not given "us" flattering figures. In so far as the numbers are small because of the indifference and irregularity of our people there must be cause for shame, but otherwise there is no necessary humiliation in lowly proportions. I believe our new lecturer, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, has been promoting a special census of his own amongst our churches and allied institutions, and that the impression he has received is that considerably more activity exists than is sometimes thought. And as to disparity between our little band and the huge population around us, we need not appeal to the example of David and Goliath. If the verdict is to go by size, the great globe itself and all its preachers, workers, players, and sinners, make no very significant mark in the solar system, not to speak of the universe! So we get right down at last to the importance and perfect satisfactoriness of doing just all we can just where we are.

Our London pulpits are now all "full"—would it not be a "Happy New Year" if the sittings were all "full" also, or even as full as they could be, were we only thoroughly earnest and loyal? The Sunday-schools appear to be prospering, and I believe a good deal of profitable work is being done for young people of riper years, though not very ripe yet. As each church is able, there seems to be a real effort made to let its light shine. Not all have equal opportunities or similar gifts. Thoughtful, earnest discourses, appealing to audience fit though few, are given in some; more popular addresses in others. My impression is that in many places the worship tends to grow in richness and tenderness. Literature is freely diffused here and there—why not everywhere? I often hear of persons who have been led to join our work and devotions through the perusal of some tract or leaflet, or by seeing our weekly literature at the Public Library. In some churches very little is done in this direction. Why not make a New Year departure, and amend?

The ordinary "Church News" columns have told a good deal of the recent history of the congregations, but everyone knows that a good deal, and perhaps the best, remains unrecorded. It is to the continuance of steadfast, intelligent, and energetic toil—nothing less—that we must look for progress; but paragraphs can hardly be made up about that. The names of the fellow-labourers are in "the book of life"—let that suffice, as it well may. Of external history, however, I may add a note or two.

The final disbursements have just been made from that portion of the Bazaar Fund, raised in 1900, which was allotted to congregations having building schemes in hand. The two last to share thus in the bounty of the Fund were Kilburn and Lewisham, and it is matter for congratulation all round that these courageous young congregations have raised sufficient themselves to secure the substantial grants offered to them. They each have now a good solid nucleus of a building fund for the developments of, it is hoped, a near future. At Acton, too, there is so much evidence of genuine life in the newly-formed congregation that steps are being taken to secure some plot of land for a temporary church. I may here mention that this congregation will celebrate its first anniversary, Jan. 18, and that the congregation at Wandsworth will celebrate its twenty-first in February. There are two or three other churches that should be shortly holding festival on attaining their "majority." Of course, it isn't much to boast of, and yet it is something to be thankful about, for the infant mortality of "new movements" is rather high.

Among the most pleasant things to record is the continued success attending the Rev. Stopford Brooke's services at Little Portland-street. The congregations are large, and though they include a considerable number of strangers from Sunday to Sunday, there is a good "core" of regular worshippers; and the presence of casual visitors is exactly what we should expect in a city so attractive to travellers from distant parts. We must all devoutly trust that the great preacher's strength will be maintained for long years to come, so that he may give fully of his ripest harvests to the world.

Our brethren in the East End, especially, report that, after allowing for much foolish exaggeration, there is unusually deep distress among the poor. Ministers in better-to-do districts generally manage to get a Poor's Purse for cases of urgent need; but where the church is chiefly supported by people of humble means, it is difficult to press them for charitable funds. (I hear, nevertheless, at times, of very touching acts of benevolence by these same people, poor themselves.) May I be pardoned if I suggest that a New Year's gift to some one or more of our ministers in the poorer districts would be a specially safe investment with which to begin 1903? And, may I add, reverting to Wordsworth's sonnet, and contrasting the beauty of the city on a summer morning with the dreary grey that enwraps it on many a working hour, and especially with the sorrow and pain and shame of many a dark night—may I add that there is a deeper distress than that which bread can feed and clothes can cover? What are we doing to feed the hunger of the soul?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdeen.—The bazaar on behalf of the new church turned out to be one of twenty similar adventures made during December. On the eve of it its promoters wondered if any money could possibly be left for it. It was opened by Dr. Farquharson, M.P., on the 24th, and continued for two days. The second day was very stormy, and kept people indoors. But a fair result was attained. When all the accounts in connection with it are made up there may be nearly £200 to credit it with. The large quantity of goods left are reserved for a supplementary sale, and it is hoped that, after all, the sum originally aimed at (£300) will be reached. The affair depended mainly on the members of the church, and they wrought very heartily and with self-sacrifice.

Bridgend.—The Glamorgan Gazette is publishing a series of articles under the heading, "Among the Bridgend Churches." A recent issue contained an article nearly two columns long on our own church. The description of the building is by no means flattering, but that of the service, conducted by the Rev. W. J. Phillips, minister-in-charge, is very appreciative.

Clifton.—On Sunday evening the Rev. Dr. Warschauer delivered his annual lecture on "The Dead of the Year" in the Oakfield-road Church, dwelling especially on the character and work of three men of incontestable greatness—Temple, Rhodes, and Zola. In the course of the service the sacred cantata "The Story of Bethlehem" was rendered by the choir.

Deal (Resignation).—The Rev. T. Shakspeare has resigned the pulpit, which will become vacant at the end of March.

Gateshead (Resignation).—The Rev. Arthur Harvie, having accepted an invitation to Northampton, as already announced in these columns, has resigned the charge of Unity Church, and will conclude his ministry there at the end of the present month.

Gee Cross.—The congregation of Hyde Chapel are establishing a new feature by the issue of a monthly "Calendar," the first number of which is issued for the present month. It is hoped that it will be the means of bringing all the members of the congregation into closer touch with one another and with the life and work of both chapel and Sunday-school.

Guildford.—The Christmas festival in the Ward-street Church extended over last Sunday, when Mr. W. H. Shrubsole was the preacher. On Christmas morning Mrs. John Cooke presented bound volumes of "Young Days" to the younger children of the Sunday-school. During the past year minister and congregation have had the advantage of help in the Sunday services, not only of neighbouring ministers, but also of several laymen.

Llandyssul.—The annual tea-party and concert was held on Christmas Day, given by Mr. Evan Evans, The Shop. The concert was thoroughly successful and greatly enjoyed by all.

London: Bell-street.—The newly-appointed missionary having not yet arrived, and the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, who has been in charge of the Mission for the last six months, being away from town, the service at the People's Hall on Sunday evening last was conducted by Mr. Delta Evans, of Watford, who preached an appropriate sermon for the last Sunday of the old year.

London: Essex Hall.—The Central Postal Mission Soirée and Religious Conference was held at Essex Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 19. Correspondents were invited, and several availed themselves of this opportunity of social and friendly intercourse. After over an hour's tea and talk, the chair was taken by Mr. Edmund Grundy, of Hampstead. The Rev. Joseph Wicksteed gave an address on "Religious Doubts Solved by Reason and Experience." The meeting was also addressed by the Chairman, and by Mr. Herbert Smith and the Rev. T. J. Hardy, and several others spoke. The discussion would have been continued longer if there had been more time.

London: Forest Gate.—Mr. Perris gratefully acknowledges gifts of money or clothing from J. H., Miss P., H. M. Y. (London), G. W. C. (Dover), Mrs. B. (Brighton), H. G. B. (Eastbourne), S. S. (Burnley), for the West Ham poor.

London: Kentish Town.—On Sunday evening the preacher at the Free Christian Church was the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, whose discourse from the text, "Love is Kind," was much appreciated. Progress is necessarily somewhat slow, but it is hoped that an increasing number of hearers will be drawn to the ministry of the Rev. George Critchley.

London: Plumstead.—On Friday, Dec. 26, Mr. H. Burrows (Chairman of the Church Council) and Mrs. H. Burrows, Park Villa, Shooter's Hill, entertained the members of the church, as well as many other friends, at an evening party, which, for convenience of space, was held in the cosy little church hall in Plumstead Common-road, the building being tastefully decorated for the occasion. Over eighty guests sat down to supper, and a long and varied programme of music having been enjoyed, the party separated at midnight. On the previous Monday evening the children of the Sunday-school had their party with a Christmas tree, which was greatly enjoyed. A few words of good wishes to all from the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones brought a happy evening to a close.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—The first half of the winter season has ended with an encouraging record of progress compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year; the evening services show a marked increase in the average attendance, which has now reached upwards of a hundred. There was a large congregation on Dec. 14, when a helpful and inspiring address was given by Principal Gordon. More than 500 scholars and parents attended the Christmas party, and everything points to continued activities and usefulness for the new year.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—On Sunday last, Dec. 28, the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., terminated his ministry at Upper Chapel. He has held the pulpit for thirteen years.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—On Sunday evening last a musical service was held, when selections from the "Messiah" were rendered. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin conducted the service, and preached on "What we owe to Jesus of Nazareth," stating that we were indebted to him for a sublime manifestation of the goodness and love of God, for a new ideal for humanity, a conception of the perfect man, and also for having put forth in his own life a type and model of the highest conceivable manifestation of a divinely human life. At the conclusion of the service Christmas carols were sung. There was a large congregation.

Walthamstow.—A special service was held on Sunday evening, when Mr. A. W. Harris brought a contingent of his Band of Hope and Mercy Choir from Stamford-street. They sang several Christmas carols—both solos and chorus—which were greatly appreciated, and also led the singing, in which the congregation heartily joined. The Rev. W. H. Rose gave a bright address for the young people present, and he and Mrs. Rose kindly entertained the visitors and a few friends to tea before the service.

Whitby.—As the result of a protest by the Rev. F. Haydn Williams, a member of the School Board, the prayer used in one of the schools containing a petition "against him who goes about seeking to destroy our souls and bodies" has been discontinued, and the Lord's Prayer substituted for it.

Wigan: Park-lane.—The Shaw Memorial Schools, bequeathed to the Park-lane congregation by the late Miss Ann Elizabeth Shaw, were opened on Wednesday, Dec. 17, by Mr. F. Monks, J.P., of Warrington. A procession of Sunday-school and congregation was formed at Bryn Railway Station, and joined by a number of visitors on the arrival of the afternoon train, and then, headed by the band of the Lancashire Hussars, proceeded to the schools, where a massive silver key was presented to Mr. Monks by Mr. W. Britton, one of the trustees. The building having been entered, Mr. Monks took the chair, supported by the Revs. George Fox, C. J. Street, J. J. Wright, E. W. Lummis, R. S. Relfern, S. Thompson, J. Moore, J. E. Stead (resident minister), and H. Wilson (Congregationalist), Drs. Latham and Winstanley, Messrs. W. Britton, P. Gorton, and others. The Chairman spoke of his first visit to Park-lane nearly forty years ago, and of the long connection of the Rev. G. Fox with the congregation, and then referred to the Education Bill, which, if fairly administered, he believed would prove a great stride in the progress of national education. The Rev. G. Fox, as executor of the late Miss Shaw, then presented the keys to the trustees, and addresses were given by the Revs. C. J. Street, G. Fox, and J. E. Stead. After tea a successful evening meeting was also held.

THE Rev. J. Brierly, B.A., as "J. B." in the Christian World, addresses a great audience every week, and thus exercises a regular ministry of a very helpful kind. The other day he preached from Dr. Horton's pulpit at Hampstead, and referring to the religious census of London on which the Daily News is at present engaged, spoke as follows:—

The results of the religious census now being taken are not only serious, but are appalling, for they spell the doom of our Church institutions unless we adapt them to the needs of to-day; and the tragedy of it all is that, if only the Church would adopt proper methods, it would secure the harvest which is waiting to be reaped. For though the figures show that men and women stand outside the Church as if the plague were in them, yet in the centre of their life, behind their business, behind their pleasure, behind their politics, is religious interest and yearning after spiritual things.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—A. A. C.; E. E.; A. V. G.; H. G.; J. A. H.; R. J. J.; J. M. K.; C. R.; J. R.; H. S. S.; A. D. T.; W. V.; J. H. W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE service this (Saturday) afternoon in Little Portland-street Chapel, for the unveiling of the memorial of Dr. Martineau's ministry in that chapel, takes place on the eve of the third anniversary of his death, and will be an occasion gratefully embraced for the gathering together of those who revere his memory. The service, which begins at 2.30 P.M., is to be enriched by the reading of passages from Dr. Martineau's writings and the singing of at least two of his own hymns. Addresses before and after the unveiling of the memorial are to be given by two of his old pupils, the Revs. Philip H. Wicksteed and J. Estlin Carpenter; on Sunday, as we announced last week, special services having reference to the memorial will be conducted, in the morning by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, and in the evening by the Rev. H. S. Perris, minister of the chapel.

THE second number of the Hibbert Journal, as it seems to us, more than maintains the high promise of the first. Of that number three editions were rapidly called for, and there is every promise that the new journal is assured of a real success. Our notice of the January number we must reserve for next week. From Dr. John Watson's article on "James Martineau: a Saint of Theism," we have quoted in our leading article.

THE January number of the Essex Church Calendar and Seed Sower announces a course of six lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, to be given on Tuesday evenings in Kensington Town Hall (the small hall), beginning on Tuesday, Jan. 27, at 8.30. This is the course of lectures which has recently attracted such great and widespread interest in different parts of the country. Tickets for the course, which are 2s. 6d. each, may be had at Essex Church. Admission to the first lecture is free, and other single lectures may be attended by paying 1s. at the door.

ON Thursday of last week the Viceroy of India held the Coronation Durbar at Delhi, amid circumstances of Oriental splendour, which have proved quite overpowering to the reporters. The Duke and Duchess of Connaught were present, with the Viceroy and Lady Curzon, and nearly all the ruling Princes of India. The Viceroy, having proclaimed the Coronation, read a message from the King, from which we quote the following passages:—

"My desire, since I succeeded to the Throne of my revered mother, the late Queen Victoria, first Empress of India, has been to maintain unimpaired the same principles of humane and equitable administration which secured for her in so wonderful a degree the veneration and affection of her Indian subjects.

"To all my feudatories and subjects throughout India I renew the assurance of my regard for their liberties, of my respect for their dignities and rights, of my interest in their advancement, and of my devotion to their welfare, which are the supreme aim and object of my rule, and which, under the blessing of Almighty God, will lead to the increasing prosperity of my Indian Empire and the great happiness of its people."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, having completed his visit to Natal, has reached Pretoria, and on Tuesday was entertained at a banquet at which among the guests at the high table were Lord Milner and Generals Botha and Delarey. Mr. Chamberlain, replying to the toast of his health (as reported in the Daily News), said:—

The policy of His Majesty's Government in South Africa was the policy of every lover of the country—namely, unity and conciliation leading to union. . . . The duty of Britons was not merely to secure alliance with, but to bring about also the fusion of all the white people of South Africa, and to avoid anything that might be construed into an assumption of social and political superiority. But that duty involved a reciprocal obligation on the part of the Boers, and especially by their leaders, several of whom he rejoiced to see present that night. He absolutely accepted the assurances of those leaders as to their acceptance of the conditions of Peace.

DR. CLIFFORD has replied to Mr. Balfour's pamphlet on the Education question by an article in this month's New Liberal Review. He finds little or nothing in the pamphlet that calls for detailed reply. "Mr. Balfour," he says, "does not cite a single inaccuracy, or refute a single statement of fact, or prove a single error." We need not enter on the question of "style," which the Prime Minister made so much of. It is more noticeable that Dr. Clifford clings to his belief that the Act sprang from a conspiracy against popular rights by Romanists and the extreme Anglicans, and, so far from sitting down quietly under it, he intimates the strongest determination to fight against it, notwithstanding the entrenchments it affords to the clerical party. He defines the ideal system, for which "free men in a free State" must struggle, as one which shall,—

(1) really co-ordinate and unify our administration of elementary and secondary education; (2) retain the interest of the people in this the chief work of its collective life, by the recognition of the right of the ratepayer or taxpayer to the immediate choice and direct control of those who administer education; (3) supply that chief need of Britain, an adequately equipped, perfectly unfettered, and sufficient teaching staff; and (4) create an educational machinery free from the enfeebling presence of sectarianism, and devoted to the making of strong, wise, and patriotic citizens rather than the production of Churchmen of this or that particular type.

The contest at Newmarket, although not so directly fought as some others recently on this issue alone, has proved equally ominous to the Government as showing on which side in this matter the judgment of the majority of electors really stands.

VERY timely at the beginning of a new year is the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in the January number of the Mill Hill Pulpit, on "Will Power, the greatest of all our needs," opening as it does with the reminder that the way to Hell is paved with good intentions, and including among its apt quotations, this from the old book of Proverbs: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty in war; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." We must educate the Will, says Mr. Hargrove, exercise and train it to full development, as we do with our muscles.

A right judgment, a strong will, these make the man. An education which does not make these its chief objects is nothing worth: and the education which has these for its chiefest concern should go on as long as we live.

I have an idea that we are going to appreciate this obvious truth during the twentieth century, as we never have done before. Hitherto religion has too much insisted on the passive virtues, on the sense of our dependence on a Higher Power, on Submission to the Supreme Will. Good people have been afraid of firm resolutions, of a strong determination to do or forbear, lest it should seem like reliance on one's own strength. To say "I will, I won't" has been deemed presumption; so the exercise without which Will cannot grow and be strong has been positively checked by those who most wished to reform it and to subject it to God.

Even prayer has been made a confession of helplessness, instead of what it should be at its best, a divine alliance—a self-assurance that doing good, bent on good, fighting with evil, we have Omnipotence on our side.

In the pastoral letter sent out for the New Year by the President of the Wesleyan Conference there are general expressions of thankfulness for good work done, and for blessings received; also this personal testimony:—"In recent journeyings I have been greatly impressed by the abundant evidences of solid, intelligent piety." Two main defects are noted—1. "Important circuits in which population has trebled or quadrupled during the last thirty years have no more chapels, hearers or members than before." 2. (This numbering is not found in the letter.) There is a reluctance on the part of young men to become local preachers, and to enter the regular ministry. What is said of the advantages of the latter is worth quoting:—

> The hardships of the itinerancy are often exaggerated and its advantages overlooked. We doubt whether there is any ministry in which a finer field of usefulness is offered with lighter sacrifices than among ourselves. While there are no great prizes, every minister is assured of a field of toil without break or uncertainty, reasonable wants are fairly met, and the distractions from spiritual service are as few as anywhere. In outward possessions our ministers are more nearly on a level than in any other Church. This is one explanation of the peculiarly strong sense of brotherhood prevailing among us. Merit has as clear a field as is perhaps possible on earth. There is room for the luxury of self-denial. The ministry of the Church needs and deserves the best service the Church can offer—the best talent, and culture, and enthusiasm. There is no sphere in which we can better serve the cause of God and humanity, and so better fulfil life's highest end.

The Annual Settlement Party at Ancoats Hall, Manchester, held early in the New Year, is remarkable for unconstrained mingling of all sorts and conditions of men and women. The friendliness and goodwill which united day-labourers and university graduates, hard-working "mothers" of the poor, and cultivated women of all Churches and no Churches, was something to be felt with happy hopes of a better day when all unreal distinctions would vanish and the Christian Message be heard and made the basis of life. Somehow the folks at the Ancoats Art Museum have got the reality of the settlement ideal, and their Christmas party would have rejoiced the heart of Arnold Toynbee or Canon Barnett. Between 600 and 700 took tea together in the recently-acquired large recreation room, and afterwards, at the Ancoats Hall, a Christmas tree of huge dimensions, brilliantly lighted, shone out in a darkened room while carols were heartily sung. Associates of the settlement and their friends provided dramatic entertainments, an excellent concert, and other amusements in various rooms. The strutting bagpipes-man was a wonder to behold and hear, and dancing was done as they do it in Ancoats, and altogether it was a joy to see the hundreds of faces free from the lines of care and anxiety that are the besetting ugliness of Manchester men and women. To see "the people" crowding one of the ancestral halls of England, beautifully decorated with evergreens and flowers, and walking about and joining in all the entertainment with the confidence that it was for them without any payment of servility, on the common ground of manhood and womanhood, was one of the very happiest sights of the season.

The Methodist Weekly has taken pains to answer at length with many details the statement of the Bishop of Manchester in the House of Lords that in Manchester there was an area containing 100,000 souls in which there was not a single resident Nonconformist minister, and that the pastoral work of this district depended wholly on the clergy of the Church of England and the priests of the Church of Rome. Statistics given prove that apart from what other Nonconformists may do, the Wesleyans do a very great deal of systematic visitation, tract distribution, Scripture reading and all forms of pastoral work. The Methodist Weekly's closing paragraph is, we think, perfectly justified.

> The Church of England does valuable work, but when the Bishop of Manchester insinuates that if it were not for their clergy the work of pastoral visitation in Manchester would be entirely neglected, and that the people would grow up "practical pagans," we have no hesitation in saying that such an insinuation is very wide of the truth, and that the pastoral work of the Nonconformist ministers and laymen will compare most favourably with that of the clergy.

Recent references in our own columns show that the Manchester Domestic Mission must be reckoned among the earnest and effective agencies for good in Manchester: the work done by our missionaries is admirable, is distinctly "pastoral" work, and is capable of great extension whenever funds for the purpose shall be forthcoming.

A memorial to the late Professor Tiele, of Leiden, of rare value has been erected by his widow. The greater part of Professor Tiele's library was bequeathed to the University library, and Mrs. Tiele, anxious that the books should not be scattered, succeeded in transplanting her husband's study to one of the rooms of the library, henceforward to be known as Tiele's room. It has been furnished just as his study was. Everyone who knew Tiele feels here something of his fine spirit. One almost expects to see him enter and sit down at his writing table. At the same time Mrs. Tiele gave a capital sum, for the purpose of completing and enriching the collection, especially on the subjects of Assyria and Persia, to the study of which, among ancient religions, Professor Tiele felt himself particularly drawn. He lived for his science, and Mrs. Tiele could not have found a better way of honouring his memory than this, which must keep his influence alive and continue to promote the study that was dear to him. The room is open to visitors.

We quoted last week from the Athenæum a tribute to the late Professor Withers, of Owens College, Manchester, and add here the following interesting passage from a private letter written by Professor Withers, Nov. 30, 1900, also given in the Athenæum:—

> I fear that the poor type of novel most commonly read is, as it were, a symbol of the poor starved training in the "humanities" which is all that the children get, whether in primary or secondary schools. There is so little humanity, so little literature, in our education. Matthew Arnold told us all so, forty years ago, but what has been done? All the popular cry is for commercial and technical education. . . . I hope you and all others who work for education, not in its professional aspect, with examinations in view, but in its relation to life—human life as well as individual life—will continue to fight, heart and hand, for more literature and more humanity in the schools.

The Methodist Recorder furnishes particulars of the life of the late Judge Waddy with a life-like portrait. It is interesting to note that as Judge of the Cheshire Courts Judge Waddy was a successor to Thomas Hughes, author of "Tom Brown's School Days." Wesleyans, and others, are indebted to him for "A Harmony of the Four Gospels in the Revised Version"; but he seems to have possessed but common-place literary gifts, and his version of Psalm xxiii., which is to be included in the new hymn-book, would hardly have gained acceptance, so we think, but for the name of the author.

FOREGLOW.

There is a crimson glow that floods the west
After the sun is down,
Like a sweet memory lingering in the breast
Of hours of radiance flown.
It leaves a brightness on the watcher's face,
And peace within his heart,
But soon the roseate glory will depart,
And night come on apace.

There is a flush that decks the eastern sky,
When night's dark mists are riven,
And all the hills and fields expectant lie
Beneath the opening heaven.
It fades to palest gold and soon is gone,
But evening's light must fail
To thrill with such a joy the hearts that hail
This foreglow of the dawn.

Ye whose thoughts cling about the gracious past,
With treasured stores of good,
Well may your dreaming eyes be backward cast
In calm and gratitude;
Yet lo, we stand in wonder, as the dawn
Sends forth its herald rays,
And in the foreglow lift our song of praise
To greet the coming morn.

CHARITY AND THE SEASONS.

THAT charitable relief should vary with the seasons, both in amount and kind, is natural enough, and up to a certain point desirable. The needs which the different seasons bring with them, or at any rate suggest, are different and must be met in different ways. In the summer country holidays, Homes of Rest, Convalescent Homes, keep us busy; in the winter, want of employment, cold, hunger, and Christmas treats make a heavy if somewhat confused demand upon the purses and energies of the benevolent. But there is, I think, a tendency to exaggerate seasonal fluctuations, and to forget to how great an extent the best charitable work goes on steadily, if unobtrusively, all the year round. Sickness, accident, misfortune, pay no regard to seasons and claim their victims as much in summer as in winter; the needs of the old are permanent; and even want of employment does not confine itself to the winter months.

But there is no doubt that winter distress appeals more strongly to the sympathies of donors; they give far more freely after the first frost, and a fall of snow brings the money flowing in to the various charitable agencies. The pinch of winter reminds us of a duty which has been perhaps too long neglected; and treasurers and secretaries wisely make the most of this expansion of feeling to replenish exchequers depleted by a year's work. I, too, would take advantage of the season, and endeavour to exploit the sympathies of my readers in favour of the charity which will not allow two months of stress to obliterate the claims of the remaining ten.

I am inclined to think that it is a distinct misfortune for the northern hemisphere that Christmas occurs in the winter months; that if, like New Zealand, we could celebrate our festivity in the summer it would be a gain all round. For, if you think of it, there is a great tendency with us to confuse the two very different issues of festivity and distress. To give a Christmas treat to the children, the old people, the Sunday-school, or whom you will, is one thing, and may be very delightful; though as we grow older we may just suspect ourselves of overestimating the delights of a combination of hot room, weak tea and plum cake. To meet real distress caused by sickness or want of employment is quite another thing, and calling for much more serious and devoted effort. Yet I am not exaggerating when I say that in the majority of cases the sole idea of how to meet real winter distress is by applying some modified form of the Christmas treat. To gather numbers of people together for an occasional free meal, or to start a soup kitchen, or to deal round garments of chance shape or size—how many of us have got beyond this naïve and elementary idea of how to fight the great enemies of hunger and cold and poverty? It would be well, I think, to try to keep the two ideas entirely apart. Let us give the children their "treat," including their presents; but do not let us deceive ourselves into thinking that we have even touched the problem of "winter distress." That must be dealt with in quite another fashion; and I will suggest in a brief sketch the plan of campaign which might be adopted by those engaged in the work. It will be seen that at every point it involves summer work as well as winter.

First of all we must remember that the confusion of ideas I have referred to will cause many to apply for relief who are not really in distress at all, but think, not unnaturally, that they should have their share of whatever is going. If we ourselves are consistent in reserving our help for those in real need, these will soon learn to appreciate the distinction and restrain their demands. This will relieve us of a large number of the applications which pour in about Christmas time.

Next we may, with skilled assistance, weed out the idle and drunken, the professional tramp and mendicant, of whom we have allowed such a devastating army to grow up amongst us. It is they who are always loudest in their clamours in the winter, and who snatch the lion's share of help which should go to very different people. It is false sentimentality of the worst kind which encourages these people to spend their lives in idleness and self-indulgence, knowing that in summer they can "get along," and that in winter they will be maintained by charity. And, like all sentimentality, it is cruel even to its objects; for charity of this type is never equal to all it undertakes, and now and again leaves its victims to perish of cold and starvation. Here, again, we might see more clearly if it were not for the glamour of Christmas; and we might let it be clearly understood that workhouse and workhouse discipline is all that those need expect who will not work through the summer.

Having defended our stores from those who would plunder them on the way, we may now hope to get them to the sick and wounded, and those engaged in manfully fighting the battle against heavy odds. And, first, no distress can appeal to us more rightly and urgently than that of families reduced to poverty through the illness or death of the bread-winner. We shall often hear of these first in the winter, when heavier expenses exhaust the resources of savings, club money or friends; but it will be more than a winter's work to restore the family to independence. Yet true charity will not rest satisfied with less than that, if once we put our hands to the work. The home must be kept together, the children fed and clothed, the devastations of poverty warded off until the bread-winner is restored to health; or if it is death which has been at work, until some other member of the family is ready to come forward and take up the burden. It is no easy task to give help of this kind, and yet not to lose sight of the fact that charity must be a means to independence, and not a substitute for it; but though difficult—or perhaps because difficult—it is the work which is best worth doing.

Next we shall find many families with whom winter distress is periodic. They get along through the summer, but any money they have to spare goes to paying off debts, or redeeming articles from the pawn-shop, or possibly in some form of mild extravagance. These are mostly the people whose work is always more or less slack in the winter; and the more intelligent of their trade as a matter of course lay by enough in the summer to carry them through the normal number of slack weeks. We do not hear much of these, there is nothing to bring them before our notice; but they are probably still the large majority. But what of those who make no such provision? They are a difficult problem to handle. They are not idlers; they say, and truly, that they are ready enough to work when they can get work; and when they cannot their claims upon our sympathies seem strong. On the other hand, we do not want to encourage an increase in the numbers of those who cannot remember that winter follows summer every year. Shall we give or not give? The answer, I think, is clear: that if we give we shall not only give. The help given in winter must be followed inevitably by the "Provident Collector" in the summer, who will help the family to handle its income so as to meet the needs of the whole year. The unvarying success of the plan when thoroughly tried offers a real clue to the solution of this problem. With its help, though hardly without, our winter's work may really be the opening of a successful campaign which will leave the enemy weaker instead of stronger the next winter.

In times of "exceptional distress," such as we have been threatened with this winter, we may have still another class of people needing our help. There are many families who wisely order their lives so as to provide for all ordinary emergencies, but whose margin is too small to enable them to meet a prolonged strain of illness or "out of work." These surely deserve the most considerate and sufficient help we can give, and it is help which should be given as unobtrusively and quietly as possible. It must, of course, be done with care. Our great aim should be that not one member of this class should fall to the level of those with whom distress is periodic and not exceptional. The mere being out of work for a long period, the sense of hopeless waiting, may sap the energy and vitality of a man, and it is here that the need of a friend comes in. In some cases the work in question may have left the district permanently, and then migration or emigration must be pressed upon the family if it is not to fall into the ranks of unskilled labour.

One thing, I hope, will be clear from what I have said—that in every case the help given must be carefully calculated to meet the needs of the particular family, taking into consideration its own resources. This will mean that we abandon entirely the system of "wholesale" work, and refuse to undertake more than we can do thoroughly and with complete knowledge. We shall have to be satisfied, no doubt, with smaller figures in our reports, hundreds, or even tens, instead of thousands "assisted"; but then "assisted" will have received an altogether new and richer significance.

Secondly, all our help will be given in the home, and as far as possible to the head of the family. To give it in the home is not only the safest guard against attracting the worthless class we wish to avoid; it is also the only basis for the supplementary work which alone can make "winter relief" useful. We will turn our backs regretfully but firmly upon free meals and soup-kitchens—some of us, perhaps, without regret in the latter instance, since we are now told that the great soup panacea has been a great physiological fallacy, and that soup has practically no nourishment in it. The housewife finds difficulty in believing this; but that wholesale soup is an economic fallacy we may all agree who believe in the greater respect and knowledge involved in the individual treatment of those whom we wish to help.

Finally, to those who can give money but have no time to work themselves I would say, avoid winter "funds" and all wholesale methods. Strengthen the hands of those who are permanently working amongst the poor, who know their districts and their people, and who will carry on through the summer the work which is only begun in the winter.

LITERATURE.

THE PROGRESSIVE OUTLOOK.*

The object of Mr. Sanders' book is not as large as its title. The object is "to indicate some of the difficulties and problems which will have to be overcome before the advocates for the movement for the establishment of a third political group can attain their end." If this object is to be achieved by regulations for the mechanism of Parliamentary representation, by a plea for paid political organisers, by giving prominence to certain aspects of Trade Unionism and Co-operation, and by some obiter dicta on leadership, Mr. Sanders has succeeded in his purpose, and has produced withal an interesting epitome of the rise and progress of the "third group" since the Chartist movement.

But Mr. Sanders' title is "The Political Reorganisation of the People," and we cannot enter too vigorous a protest against the term People being identified with one section of the State. There is a passage in which Mr. Sanders himself suggests the difference: "The party that we are considering would not be limited to . . . what is generally understood to be the objects of Labour representation. It would aim at the formation of a programme which would express the democratic view of all vital and social problems before the country." (P. 83.) Nevertheless, political reorganisation is treated throughout the book as though it were limited to the objects of Labour representation.

As such there is nothing particularly new in the work, and no position respecting which anyone fully alive to the facts of the times would differ from Mr. Sanders. His picture of a derelict Liberalism has a melancholy reality, and his stricture of "Little Englandism"—in the sense of a purely negative attitude towards aggressive Imperialism—as having given to Conservatism the advantage of seeming to be the genuine patriotic party, cannot be too well pondered by certain sections of Liberals as the sort of outcome we may expect from a purely critical and opposition attitude. Whatever may be our opinion of the events that resulted in the return to power of a Government of such abnormal strength as the present Government, it is impossible not to deplore the delay of those social reforms, of that Home Policy, on the expedition of which so much of our national efficiency depends, and not to see in an opportunism so lacking in foresight as to embark on an enterprise the expense of which puts social reform to any great extent out of the question for years to come—not to see in this a signal evidence of the absence of any vital and co-ordinating principle worthy of guiding the nation's course.

Such a co-ordinating principle—the lack of which is the weakness of Liberalism and the menace of progress—will not be reached by concentrating on the Labour problem, which is only one of a number of sections into which Liberalism is split up. A broader standpoint is taken up by Mr. Alfred Hoare in his suggestive article on "Liberalism in the Twentieth Century" in the first number of the World's Work. Mr. Hoare tells us that the old Liberal watchwords of Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform are, in their party sense, played out. The substitute he suggests is that of "municipal progressive movement"; the identification, e.g., of liberalism with the progressive home policy of the L.C.C. and similar organisations elsewhere (particularly, we would suggest, in Glasgow), which would then fall into line as constituent items in the general movement of Liberalism. Such would be a truly patriotic party, a true "political reorganisation of the People," a true Imperialistic policy. It would be such because its principles would be to render England the nation of the cleanliest cities, the happiest workers, the honestest markets, the broadest culture, and the noblest life. If it is possible to conquer South Africa it is possible to do this. It is to be done by taking advantage of that wave of municipal movement so evident in Europe to-day. The kind of policy it suggests is broad and positive enough to admit not only of toleration of Conservatism, but co-operation with it. Party spirit would not vanish; it would be utilised, the more reactionary type of mind performing its natural function of a critical brake on the more progressive.

It may seem a far cry to the realisation of this, but we believe the distance is to be measured entirely by education. To return to Mr. Sanders: we find him lamenting that so few of those who have been attracted as leaders to the social movements of the last twenty years are now to be found therein. No doubt many of them lacked the dogged persistence and the organising faculty necessary for leadership, but no doubt also the main stumbling-block lay in those they had to lead; in the well-nigh invincible narrowness of the working-class outlook, a narrowness only equalled by that of the privileged classes. The moral is the want on all sides of education in citizenship and in domestic life. In primary schools and at Eton and Harrow the individual must be trained to look at his interests in the light of the interests of the whole; to regard the Empire as the personal concern of every citizen. Without this there is little hope of progress. The time is passed when, in Watson's words, England "stumbled on the prize," and "now the day is unto them that know." But prior to this is the need that we make up our minds that it is the best citizenship we are aiming at. The foremost need of the day is the ascertainment of Principle. A party may be good, a leader may be good, but without education, and without the principle whence it flows, parties are helmless, and a leader is a voice crying in the wilderness, and the political reorganisation of the people will have to wait.

A LAY COMMENTARY.*

So the title-page calls this set of twenty-three essays from the Spectator. The editor of the Spectator furnishes a brief introduction, and there is a good deal of the Spectatorial style in the essays themselves. It is not the loud Amen of the ignorant man that we hear. The Amen is never loud, though it is sometimes emphatic; more often the accent has an upward turn like that of the woman who answered Jesus by saying, "Truth, Lord, yet——"

It is very comfortable exercise to walk to and fro with the writer among Bible characters and Bible doctrines. He is on speaking terms with them all; introduces us to them, explains their peculiarities, defends the position they take, occasionally seems very gently to dissent from them, but always respects them, and at the same time feels quite at home in their presence. Mr. St. Loe Strachey's phrase, "the exegesis of sympathy," expresses very well what we have here. For a layman who did not know very much of Holy Scripture, who had not well attended the church, or who had there heard an incompetent parson, and thus had not taken very much interest in Biblical matters, this book would be an excellent introduction worth several volumes of Oxford "Helps." He would learn (as he might have learned from Tom Brown if he had read that story) that Biblical characters are real, that the doctrines therein discussed are living, that it broadens a man's ideas to know something about them. Not every essay is equally successful. The opening essay on "The touch of Nature in St. Paul" was to the writer of this notice distinctly disappointing. Paul has so many touches of human nature, he "lives along the line." The Corinthian letters alone show him to us in so many moods, and every mood so intensely interesting; his generous appreciation of what is really praiseworthy, his hatred of the sensual and mean, his overbearing temper when kindled by some great moral issue, his perfect gentleness to the penitent and the peace-making, his withering scorn for the self-conceited, his proud attitude of self-defence, the reaction of his humility; did ever man give such a varied, and withal so admirable a delineation of himself in some thirty pages? Any essayist would have a difficult task who attempted, by any other means than that of reading his main letters, with here and there a word of explanation, to give us an adequate presentation of St. Paul, and the present essayist has hardly succeeded. But taking the book as a whole it does what it attempts. One finishes almost every essay wishing it had been a little longer. The one on "St. Luke as an Artist," for instance, is a delightful little talk, making the reader wish to hear again of this matter, or sending him back to his New Testament with fresh hope and expectancy.

That is the case, too, with most of the essays. The essay on "Friendship in the Bible" does not seem to carry one very much beyond the obvious; but in the few pages devoted to the Sermon on the Mount, we have an attempt, by no means unsuccessful, to translate some of the main precepts into the language of modern common sense, and to clear away difficulties founded on misapprehension. An element of important truth is brought to light in these two sentences: "Christ's peculiar teaching—those auxiliary Commandments which he gave to the world—applies, as we believe, only to the individual. No State is bound to pardon, for no State can feel personal rancour." In the exact form here given both halves of the latter sentence may be questioned. But the saying brings out an important principle of the connection of forgiveness with the feeling of personal wrong. We close the book with the sense of being edified as well as entertained. The editor's saying that these essays could not have been written without scandal "perhaps" "in any country in which the spirit of the English Church did not prevail," may be intelligible to Churchmen. Why a book dealing in the same easy but reverent style might not have come out, say, from the office of the Revue Chrétienne Heaven and the Churchmen only know. On p. 85 there is what looks like a clerical slip; where the name St. Paul occurs the second time St. Luke is meant. J. RUDDLE.

A GOSSIPY BOOK ABOUT EUCLID.*

THIS pleasant and useful book is unfortunately misnamed. He who takes it up in search of more knowledge concerning Euclid's life and system than every matriculant possesses will be disappointed. After an impatient flinging-over of fifty-five pages he will discover on the fifty-sixth that "When we venture to speak of Euclid as having made an epoch, we are to be understood as speaking of him as author of 'The Elements'; and when we speak of 'The Elements,' as meaning Books I.-VI. thereof." The shock of this discovery has indeed been broken by an admission on p. 54: "Of Books VII.-X. we say nothing, because we know very little." To be perfectly candid the clause should have run, "Of Books VII.-X. we say very little, because we know nothing." In either reading the pronoun refers, not to the learned world, but personally to Dr. Smith. His outfit as a mathematical historian is as slight as his knowledge of Euclid. It consists of an acquaintance with De Morgan, Ball's "History of Mathematics," Allman's "Greek Geometry," and Dodgson's "Euclid and his Modern Rivals," to which very accessible books the serious student had better betake himself direct. Montucla is mentioned, but there is no evidence of a first-hand knowledge of that author. We find, too, in the introduction a little flourish about Proclus and Pappus. But Pappus is in the same case with Montucla, and as for Proclus' Commentary, "we do not profess," a note on p. 14 admits, "to have read it fully, or to have fully understood what we have read."

The only part of the book which makes any real addition to knowledge is the criticism of Euclid's First Book, contained in a few pages near the end. The method adopted for eliminating I. 16.,

> A blot
> Which so much beauty would do well to purge, is especially ingenious and elegant. After I. 4 Dr. Smith inserts a new proposition, 4*, to prove that two triangles are equal in all respects if they have one side, an adjacent angle, and their area respectively equal. Then for I. 16 he is able to substitute, "The three internal angles of every triangle are together equal to two right angles." This proposition, with two simple corollaries, includes Euc. I. 26 and I. 32. In this way we are led up to a treatment of parallel lines which is at once more elegant and more rigid than that of Euclid. But the attempt, on p. 213, to prove as a theorem Euclid's 11th "axiom" is a failure; it includes a disguised assumption of the demonstrandum.

The book is, nevertheless, pleasant and useful. It is useful because it gives the general reader an impression, such as he cannot gain elsewhere, of the real and immense influence of Greek thought upon modern science. Incidentally he will obtain from Dr. Smith, who is a sound mathematician and a most lucid expositor, some insight into the nature of logarithms, fluxions, the differential and integral calculus, and other weird devices, and he will be stimulated to think, and exasperated into strong feeling, on some scores of worthy topics.

The book has a charm for those who will hardly find much instruction in it, for the author allows himself a licence of digression as great as does de Quincey himself, and justifies it by a sustained vivacity, and a clearness of articulation, which also remind one of the Opium-eater. Here are a few excerpts from the index of this book on Euclid:—Britannia rules the waves, 123. Bœthius, 73. Caxtons, Lord Lytton's, quoted, 169. (Cleopatra, St. Columba, Bishop Cotton, lead up to) Criticism, historical, 6, 68, 164; biblical, specimens of, 173, 177. Cyril, was he a party to the murder of Hypatia? 61.—The rest of the alphabet is equally full of jack-in-the-box delights.

As a specimen of Dr. Smith's engaging style is appended his sketch of Euclid's personality, which, purely fanciful as regards that ancient teacher, is said to be true if applied to the late Professor Wallace of Edinburgh.

> Euclid was a man somewhat over middle age, with noble forehead and grave aspect; profound of knowledge, and ever seeking more. Accurate himself, and painfully exacting accuracy from others. Occasionally absent-minded as he listens to demonstrations which he has heard hundreds of times before, yet quick as lightning to be "down on" every slip. Patient—within limits—of ignorance and stupidity; and, when these limits are overpast, checking the expression of contempt and scorn which is ready to break forth, and substituting for it some snappish utterance in which humour and sarcasm are happily blended, the humour as genuine as if sarcasm were unknown, the sarcasm—bitter it may be, but never sour—as sharp as if humour had no place in the composition. Such was Euclid, as he stood from day to day in decent academic gown, ever liberally powdered with chalk, and rejoiced in the thought that in the course of his long occupancy of the chair he had turned out one or two who might possibly become mathematicians, unconscious that every session he turned out a whole class of friends.

EDWARD EDWARDS.*

EDWARD EDWARDS was a hero of the uneventful life, and we are glad to have this kindly and sympathetic record of his work and the principles by which it was inspired.

We are so prone to take our privileges as matters of-course that it seldom occurs to us they were not called into existence without a struggle, and, therefore, we too usually do but scant and tardy justice to those who faced the struggle for us. Have we free libraries nowadays in most of our more important townships? Then how and why? Not, indeed, wholly from one man's effort. Yet if there was a protagonist in this great struggle it was Edward Edwards; and the pages of this biography give some idea how severe his struggle was.

We will not take the cream off the book by summarising its salient features. But so much we may permit ourselves. Born in 1812, in London, he early became a student at, and assistant curator of, the British Museum. Removing thence, owing to friction with the authorities, he became librarian at Manchester, and subsequently assistant at the Bodleian Library; and died in the Isle of Wight under circumstances pitiable in themselves and discreditable to the civilisation which boasts such lives as his amongst its highest products. He was not the easiest of men to get on with. And to faults of temperament must be largely chargeable the disappointments to which the record of his life bears witness.

A dour, irascible, sardonic, formal, punctilious, reflective, narrow-minded, "genteel" old bookworm. Such he would appear to have been; and, withal, the most devoted of sons, the most generous of brothers, and, well—the most tolerant of husbands.

This is a volume in which entertainment and instruction are happily blended. While point by point we are put in contact with the workings of a strange strong human soul, we are kept amused by the lighter touches of the bye-play, which is never more comic than in the most critical junctures of the tragedy. And through all we are tracing step by step the growth of that great scheme for the promotion of Public Libraries which to-day is so well accomplished that voices are already heard demanding whether it has not done more harm than good!

Mr. Greenwood writes:—"It is doubtful if there is a parallel instance on record of the chief pioneer of a large and widespread public improvement being so generally unrecognised, even within the circle of his own profession."

It is too late to do justice to the man now!

"Not with the fleeting breath of praise would we do thee honour, but with life-long admiration, and the effort, if strength be given us, to emulate thee."†

It is not too late to attain to a worthier attitude towards great public questions and those who make it their life's work to solve them.

And this biography has a real value not only as a readable and appropriate tribute to the memory of a good servant of his generation, but for many lessons which in this direction may help us not a little.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Creation Story of Genesis: a Sumerian Theogony and Cosmogony, by Dr. Hugo Radau. Dr. Radau identifies in the first chapter of Genesis, in addition to the admitted traces of the Babylonian creation epic, certain other features which point to a theory of creation as a natural process of generation and perpetuation. These he explains as of Sumerian origin. The details of the proof could be tested only by the expert Assyriologist, and they are necessarily delicate. Apart, however, from its particular argument, his essay offers explanations of several outstanding difficulties connected with this chapter. The creation of light on the first day, although the sun is not made till the fourth day, is ascribed to the needs of the Priestly writer for a seven days' scheme, and the retention of the attribute of Marduk, the god of light, when it was necessary to leave out the name of the Babylonian divinity. The description of sun and moon as the two great lights is accounted for on the ground that the Hebrew writer could not use their names because they would connote idolatry, as names of Babylonian deities. Again the reckoning of the day as made up of evening and morning, in that order, is traced to the predominance of the moon-god over the sun-god. Dr. Radau's treatise is of first-rate importance to the student of the Creation-myth in the Old Testament. (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

Joseph and Moses, the Founders of Israel, by the Rev. Buchanan Blake, B.D. Mr. Blake gives firstly the text of the Yahwist narrative of Joseph and Moses, and follows it up with a "historical setting," freely interspersed with edifying reflections. The same plan is then carried out with the Elohist narrative. Mr. Blake is too confident that these narratives were composed for different audiences, the former for Judah and the latter for Israel. Thus suggesting reasons for the fact of divergence. He is not, however, anxious about harmonising: his argument is that the Biblical writers do not write history for its own sake, but for the conveyance of spiritual lessons. His book is likely to be useful to Sunday-school teachers and others. (Edinburgh: T. and T. Clark. 4s.)

The Essex Hall Year Book for 1903, with its roll of Unitarian ministers and its admirably compact store of information concerning our churches and associations and kindred societies, appears in the form with which we have now been long familiar and which has approved itself as most serviceable. What is new in this year's issue, beyond the inevitable changes in the ministerial roll, marks the welcome progress that has been made in the establishment of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, and the preparations for the meeting in September at Amsterdam of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers. An alphabetical index takes the place of the former table of contents. From the Preface we learn that in December, among the 364 places of worship included, there were fourteen vacant pulpits, and of the 371 ministers on the roll twenty-two were open to accept appointments. (B. and F.U.A., Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

Of our penny monthlies the Seed-sower, edited by the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, begins this month a new series, and is to be commended as an admirable parish magazine, for home reading, and for localisation among the churches. The Unitarian World enters vigorously upon its second year, and has received a cordial welcome abroad as well as at home by friends of "Liberal Religious Thought and Work." The Christian Freeman, which is now to be published in Belfast, aims at being a useful "Sunday-school monthly," and makes a bid for popularity with a serial "Story of Failure, Madness, Love, and Fame." Young Days has already a wholesome popularity among our children well assured. A pleasant group of some of the Winifred House children, with "Sister," is among the illustrations of the new number.

THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

We referred recently to the remarkable series of articles, with the above title, contributed by Dr. J. H. Crooker, of Ann Arbour, Michigan, to the five November Sunday numbers of the Springfield Republican, setting forth in a very lucid manner the results of modern criticism of the Gospels, and showing with earnest eloquence how the real Jesus, the great prophet of the spiritual life with God, is brought back to us again with new power for the inspiration of our present life.

The substance, at least, of these articles we must hope that Dr. Crooker will make still more widely available in book form, but we trust that we shall be forgiven, if we make here some further extended quotations from the articles themselves.

And first we will reproduce the concluding passages of the second article on "What Gospel Criticism Finds":—

"When destructive criticism has done all it can, what may we positively affirm of Jesus? This is the point of greatest religious importance. And the relief of our anxious hearts is near at hand in the discovery that our gains are after all greater than our losses. Some things that once seemed essential we do lose, but the central things remain, and they come into new prominence and larger power. For a conclusion something like this is warranted: Uncertainty increases respecting specific incidents of Jesus's life, but the essential quality of his character shines in clearer light and exerts upon us a more helpful influence. We can now make fewer positive assertions respecting some of the details of his career, but we can assert more confidently and positively than ever before his transcendent greatness as a religious genius.

"Before passing on to a general application of this principle, let us see what help it brings us respecting two of the most difficult problems in this connection—the birth stories and the accounts of the resurrection. We cannot now accept as a literal record of historic fact the accounts in Matthew and Luke, which tell of a special star, the visits of angels and the strange birth. All this is poetry—beautiful and interesting poetry—but poetry. What these poems really say to us is this: The friends of Jesus were so profoundly helped by him that they felt sure that he had a special divine origin. But what interests us is not their particular explanation, but their testimony thus given to Jesus's spiritual influence upon them. These stories are not 'records' of his childhood, but 'products' of his character; not the story of his birth—it is something more valuable, the record of the spirit and power of his life.

"We may apply the same method of interpretation to the accounts of the resurrection. Every year the conclusion gains a wider acceptance among religious scholars that these divergent statements cannot be harmonised; that they do not afford an adequate demonstration of the bodily resurrection of Jesus. Historical science and physical science compel us to surrender the old belief that Jesus's body came out of the tomb and that he lived again among his friends. All this is evident. But the very fact that the disciples did come to believe in Jesus as risen from the underworld and alive at God's right hand is the best possible evidence, not only of his grandeur of character, but of the immortality of the soul. What survives all critical analysis and scientific objection is the fact that Jesus so lived that he made his friends absolutely sure of his immortality and their immortality. This is historical. We make the best use of the story of the resurrection when we find in it the illustration of that spirituality of life which is the root and spring of our hope of heaven."

Dr. Crooker's third article brings out the essential greatness of Jesus, and shows how the necessary limitations of his knowledge as regards the outward order of the world left his authority as a moral and spiritual teacher unimpaired.

The following passage refers to the attitude of Jesus towards the Messianic Hope of his people:—

"A great man could no more arise and and labour successfully in Palestine 2,000 years ago and ignore the Messianic Hope than could a Lincoln ignore the anti-slavery sentiment of his day. In both cases the overmastering popular sentiment furnished the platform on which to stand and the motive power by which to conquer. It was inevitable that Jesus should associate himself with the popular desire for a Deliverer. That he felt himself to be the Messiah of Israel is evident. We frankly acknowledge that we cannot trace the origin and growth of this conviction in his mind. We cannot explain all that he meant by the term or describe all that he believed about himself in this connection. The modern scholar cannot indulge, like his predecessors, in definite assertion and precise description at this point. The records are so imperfect that great uncertainty will always surround the matter.

"But about one thing—and that is the one thing of most importance—there is no uncertainty: Jesus reinterpreted the Messianic Hope, and gave it a supremely ethical character. He touched what was a temporary political passion, and it became a permanent spiritual influence. He had the genius and ability to lay hold of this popular sentiment, and re-shape, refine, and re-apply it. He claimed to be the Messiah, but in a new and higher sense. He purified the Hope and gave it a spiritual quality and a universal application. He did not fulfil the old Hebrew predictions (about which great misconceptions still survive in the popular mind); he transcended them, being a Messiah after a new and original pattern.

"The divinity of Jesus is not to be proved, after the fashion of the old apologists, by showing that he was just what Isaiah and the other Hebrew prophets foretold. His real divinity is revealed in the fact that he was vastly superior to the ancient ideals. He said: I am your Messiah, not to drive out Romans from the land, but to drive out sins from your hearts; not to establish a political organisation, but to spread abroad a new spirit of life; not to subjugate your enemies, but to teach the forgiveness of enemies; not to enable you to rule, but to teach you to serve. I am a Messiah who is to show you by my own death how to save your life by losing it! I bring you a cross, not a sceptre; a yoke to bear, not a throne to occupy. I come to establish an eternal kingdom of love. However scant and imperfect the records, this is perfectly clear and historical. And just this is all that is really important."

One other passage from this third article we will quote, dwelling upon the wonderful quality of the teaching of Jesus:—

"The significant fact is that we have this large body of teachings at all. It is often said, in a tone that implies discredit or uncertainty, Jesus himself wrote nothing. Very true; he wrote nothing on parchment. But to have done that would have been an easy matter. What he did do was vastly greater and incomparably more significant. He wrote these spiritual truths so powerfully upon the hearts of men that they fixed themselves there as seeds of life. It is easy enough simply to say things, but to say things so that people make our words a rule of life—that is the evidence and test of greatness. The sayings set forth by Jesus were indeed seeds of life, so vital with truth, and planted with such dynamic power in the hearts of people, that they became authoritative commandments. They not only stuck in memory, they became sources of a new life.

"Here is the remarkable fact: That his teachings touched the centres of life, and remained there with permanent regenerative power. They were treasured by people in their hearts as a precious and persuasive guide to conduct. Jesus put them into the human soul in such a way that the hearer said: 'This is what I must be.' Each word has been a storage battery of inexhaustible spiritual vitality. This could be possible only as those things were said by a transcendent personality. They were first lived out in the lives of his disciples, and then written out in our gospels. They do not make clear the incidents of his daily life, but they do make clear the quality and spirit and power of that life."

Birthdays.

THE New Year brings a kind of birthday for us all, and it is a good time to think what it ought to mean to us.

It should mean, first of all, great thankfulness for the life God gives us in this beautiful world.

How beautiful it is to be alive!
To wake each morn, as if the Maker's grace
Did us afresh from nothingness derive,
That we might sing: How happy is our case,
How beautiful it is to be alive.

Then, too, birthday gladness is a very unselfish joy. At least we should make it so. We should remember that whatever the date of our birthday we can none of us say, "This day is my birthday only." No, for in England, in America, in France, in countries all over the world thousands of boys and girls have birthdays on the same day as you; and it is very nice to think that although, perhaps, we do not know any of our birthday-mates there are such, and that, although we do not hear their rejoicing voices or see their happy faces, our gladness is yet their gladness, our fun is theirs, and He who watches over all of us smiles on the thousand birthday kings and queens of every day in the year. They, too, have a dear encircling home; they, too, have clustering friends; they, too, see and hear the things that make our hearts leap; they, too, are learning the great sweet lessons of life. It always increases pleasure to know that others have the like.

I remember that in my old home the boy or girl whose birthday it was used to stand with back to the wall, straight up and without shoes, and then a book or ruler was laid on our heads and a short line drawn with a pencil on the wall, and the name and date and year written by it, as the record of our height. So we used to see how much we grew in a year. Sometimes there would be a big interval, an inch or two, from one year's line to the next, sometimes less. And it is a fine thing to be able to see for yourself that you are growing—growing from year to year.

Some people do not grow fast enough, others grow too fast. And there are different ways of growing. It is the growing of our bodies that we notice most at first. That is the easiest to measure, and we ought to go on growing in this way, tall and stout and strong, until we are men and women. But there are other ways of growing quite as important, and in the end more so. We can grow in mind, and we can grow in heart. By growing in mind I mean growing in knowledge, in thoughtfulness, in wisdom. By growing in heart I mean growing in love, in kindness, in the pride of rightness, in courage, and in honour.

There is a story of a very extraordinary boy whose name was Tuflongbow. He grew very fast and he grew very tall. But I remember it was said of him that although he grew very tall and strong and clever and bold he never grew higher than his mother's heart. What was the meaning of that? It meant that he never grew conceited, never grew too big or too clever to look up to his mother and think her better than himself. So as the birthdays come round, and you see how much you have grown, never grow conceited and vain.

We sometimes talk of growing into and also of growing out of things. We say, "So-and-so is growing into a fine boy—into a healthy, bright girl," and we grow out of our clothes, we get too big for them. We grow out of silly habits and bad tempers, and for the same reason: we get too big for them, too big in heart and mind.

I remember how we once found the skin of a snake. It was perfect in every detail, even to the skin of the eyes. The snake had crawled out of this skin because it was too small for him. After a time his new skin would become too small, or rather he would grow too big for it, and a cleft would come in the neck and through it he would crawl out of that, too—thus marking, we might say, his birthdays by growing out of his old coat and growing into his new one.

We, too, do very much the same, and I want you boys and girls all of you to bear this in mind, and when you come to your birthday just try and think of some of the things you ought to leave off and get out of them; leave them behind as the snake does his skin. Say to yourself: That foolish habit mother has often told me of belongs to the old years I am growing out of, to the baby years; I will not carry it with me into my new year, for to-day I'm 8, or to-day I'm 10, or 14, as the case may be!

Do you know—and this is a most wonderful thing—every seven years we grow out of one body into another? We do not do this suddenly as the snake gets out of his old skin, but for seven years we are gradually taking our body to pieces, wearing it out and at the same time building it up with fresh materials, just as if someone were continually picking bricks out of the walls of our houses and putting new ones in their places, and in seven years replacing all the bricks in the house and so making a new house of it. And this goes on all our lives.

Well, just so we are being renewed, rebuilt, every year more or less, all our lives through, and I hope you will always be trying to let no year go by without a great deal of new and beautiful building going on in your hearts—getting out all the dull and sad and surly bricks, and putting in their places bright, fresh, joyful, brave and loving ones.

Now try and take these lessons on a birthday and remember them when yours next comes round. And let us all take them to ourselves at the beginning of this new year. H. M. L.

FATHER, I see the hills on fire!
The flames are leaping up higher and higher.

My child, the sun has just gone down,
And has laid on the mountains his golden crown.

Father, look at the sky in the ground!
I see the blue, and the clouds all round.

My child, it is the light in a pool,
For even the earth of heaven is full.

When I look into mother's face, soft and thin,
The firelight seems to be under her skin.

The gleam is the love of her heart, sweet boy;
She's shining and glowing with blessed joy. H. M. L.

JANUARY REVIEWS ON DR. MARTINEAU.

THE publication last October of the "Life and Letters of James Martineau" has brought into the January Reviews several notices of that work and tributes to his memory and to the greatness of his influence and personality, to which, by a happy coincidence, we are able to call attention as, on the eve of the third anniversary of his death, the memorial of Dr. MARTINEAU'S ministry in Little Portland-street Chapel is about to be unveiled.

In the second number of the Hibbert Journal there is a striking article by Dr. JOHN WATSON, on "James Martineau: a Saint of Theism" (which is to be followed in the April number by a study of "Martineau's Philosophy," by Professor Pringle Pattison), while in the Contemporary the place of honour is given to Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S article on the same subject. In the Expository Times there is not only a series of interesting notes, to be commended specially to students of ethics and the doctrine of sin, but also an article, doubtless from the pen of the Editor, Dr. JAMES HASTINGS, which, together with warm tribute to MARTINEAU'S greatness as a moral philosopher, contains some passages of very curious criticism. Finally, in the Expositor, Miss JULIA WEDGWOOD writes on "James Martineau, and the Heterodoxy of the Past," with some vivid touches of personal reminiscence, for in the old Liverpool days Miss WEDGWOOD was a pupil in Miss RACHEL MARTINEAU'S school, where she recalls a lesson in botany from the brother :—

> Almost always when I think of the "Origin of Species" I remember the very pattern of the oil-cloth at the long table and him at its head leaning forward with the earnest gaze that might have been bent on a set of learned and mature men instead of a few school-girls, and I hear the deep, rather hollow voice that seemed, though perfectly distinct, not to bring all its sound from the lips, but as it were to express a thought as much as an utterance, and once more I catch the nuance of a latent surprise—so it seems to me—in the voice I still hear as of a speaker only just silent.

Perhaps we ought to refer at once to the strange conclusion of the article in the Expository Times. Dr. HASTINGS has high praise for Professor UPTON'S part of the "Life and Letters." "His exposition," he says, "is a surprise of lucid philosophical writing. Nowhere else can Dr. MARTINEAU'S philosophy in particular, or the tendency of present philosophical thought in general, be more easily read and mastered." And of the subject of the biography Dr. HASTINGS declares : "It is certain that Dr. MARTINEAU'S fame will rest upon the work he accomplished in philosophy. It is even possible that he will be recognised by the generations that are to come as the greatest moral philosopher of the nineteenth century."

Then follows an account of MARTINEAU'S emancipation from the necessarianism in which he had been trained,* a reference to the great year in Germany, and an exposition of his Unitarianism. At the end of this comes the passage to which we have alluded. Dr. HASTINGS has referred to the change which came over MARTINEAU'S feeling, which led him to cease to pray in the name of Christ. "Yet, strange to say, he never ceases to worship Him." Then after a quotation from the Christian Reformer paper on "A Way out of the Trinitarian Controversy," the article concludes :—

> What shall we say—that James Martineau was really a Trinitarian, but unevangelical?—that he believed in the Deity, but not in the Cross, of Christ?—that he was strong on the Person but weak on the Work?

This, we must suppose, is meant to be taken seriously, and although left in the form of questions without any answer, to represent the writer's actual conclusion as to Dr. MARTINEAU'S belief. Yet it is so utterly absurd and in such flat contradiction to everything that Dr. MARTINEAU wrote, that it passes our comprehension, how or why such a suggestion came to be made! Dr. MARTINEAU never worshipped CHRIST. He had the profoundest veneration for the "great Chief of faithful souls," but to the heavenly FATHER alone his worship was ever rendered. The whole point of his argument in "A Way out of the Trinitarian Controversy" was that the second Person of the Trinitarian theology (GOD the Son, not the JESUS of his veneration) was invested in the believer's mind with those divine attributes which Unitarians recognise in the FATHER, while "the FATHER" of the Trinitarian scheme is a colourless being, beyond the range of practical religious experience. Hence, it might be urged, Trinitarian and Unitarian had actually the same object of worship, under different names, but to Dr. MARTINEAU, as to all other Unitarians, CHRIST was certainly not that GOD.

Dr. FAIRBAIRN has no such illusion. He speaks of MARTINEAU'S system of thought as "essentially theistic and ethical," and "only nominally Christian," a judgment which we may accept as clearly pointing to the absence in MARTINEAU of any vestige of the Trinitarian scheme, but from which we should none the less emphatically dissent, if we had to defend the true nature of Christian faith, as the faith of JESUS and his spiritual followers. But, indeed, we may leave Dr. FAIRBAIRN with his dogmatic judgment, to turn to his generous appreciation of MARTINEAU'S religious nature, and, above all, his work as a philosopher. Dr. FAIRBAIRN recognises the moral fervour of the Unitarianism in which MARTINEAU was reared, and the intensity of his religious faith.

> While men were thinking of the Eucharist, of the priestly office, of absolution and the confessional, he was thinking of God and how to vindicate the faith in Him and His being to faith. A distinguished Anglican, long gone from our midst, once asked me if I did not think Martineau more than any other man fulfilled Novalis' aphorism as to Spinoza, a "God-intoxicated man." It was true! God possessed him, inspired him, ruled him. His ambition was to hear God speak in conscience and to obey the law God proclaimed there. And this ambition Martineau largely owed to his Unitarian birth and breeding.

His main significance as a thinker, however, Dr. FAIRBAIRN holds to be philosophical rather than theological. "It is as an interpreter of our ultimate philosophic and ethical ideas as constituting the basis and essence of religion that he has a claim upon our grateful remembrance. He realised, as no other man of his age did, the intellectual worth and the moral value of the theistic idea." The whole of this article in the Contemporary should be carefully studied. (Dr. FAIRBAIRN attributes to EMERSON an influence over MARTINEAU, which he himself disclaims.) The notes on the phases of Socinian and Unitarian thought are of great interest, and also the contrast between MARTINEAU and JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, which should be compared with Dr. WATSON'S in the Hibbert Journal. Here we must be content to quote one other passage from Dr. FAIRBAIRN :—

> There is no finer example in the history of thought of the value of the theistic temper or of the victorious force that lives in moral idealism. It is largely owing to him that our age was not swept off its feet by the rising tide of materialistic and pseudo-scientific speculation. The qualities of his rhetoric made him the more efficient an apologist for his theistic idea, and clothed it in an elegance of form that commended it to the fastidious in literary feeling. He commended it with a fervour that made it impressive to the religious emotions. He justified his criticism by psychology, and made the man who lived in an age of doubt realise the intellectual energy and the ethical force that lived in our ultimate religious ideas. The services he rendered on this side of his activity are hardly capable of critical appreciation. I am content for my own part to speak as a pupil and as a distant admirer, and say that at critical moments the name of James Martineau was a tower of strength to the feeble, and his words—like Luther's—were not only half battles, but equal to whole victories.

* Dr. Hastings says that Martineau taught the necessarian philosophy "for ten years of his professorial life," and again in the notes (p. 147) "for ten dreary years taught it to the students of Manchester New College." This is a mistake. He taught it to classes of young people in Dublin and Liverpool, but in 1869 he was already converted, as Channing thankfully recognised, and only in the following year he was appointed to his professorship in the College.

He was a prophet of the ideal and the ethical, and we can devoutly say: Would that all the men who prophesy were as pure in thought, as noble in purpose, and as spiritual in imagination as he.

Dr. WATSON'S appreciation in the Hibbert Journal is not less eloquent than Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S, and is characterised by an equal warmth of feeling. "WATTS' well-known portrait," he says, "is absolutely fascinating, and holds your attention as by a charm, for you are looking upon a part of the spiritual world when you gaze into MARTINEAU'S eyes."

There are many passages in Dr. WATSON'S article which invite comment, and one or two corrections to be made,* but we must allow ourselves only two further quotations. To the question whether MARTINEAU can be rightly called a mystic, Dr. WATSON replies as follows:—

> It is a question of delicate and academic criticism whether Martineau ought to be classed as a mystic. Certainly no writer of modern times has so powerfully expanded and enforced that "life with God which is an ascent through simple surrender to the higher region of the soul," where "spirit may meet spirit"; and it is open to believe that when his "Seat of Authority in Religion" is no longer read, his "Endeavours after the Christian Life" will have a place upon the shelf of devotional literature, second only to the "Imitation" and "The Pilgrim's Progress." He was also so profoundly affected by the ethical and intellectual shapes of knowledge, that it is equally fair to hold that he approached the things of the spirit through the things of the intellect and the conscience, and that he is at his strongest in the "Types of Ethical Theory." If a mystic be one whose knowledge of God is the direct vision of the soul, unaided and uncontrolled by the intellect or the conscience—a revelation as in a glass—then Martineau had neither the abandonment nor the directness of the mystical faculty; but if mysticism be communion with God revealed within the soul upon a throne which is high and lifted up among the purest affections, but firmly established upon reason and conscience, one is fain to believe that Martineau was the most profound because the most reasonable mystic of the modern type. Martineau realised beyond most men that certainty of God and that communion with the soul which cannot be touched either by physical science or literary criticism, because it is a spiritual intuition tried and confirmed by reason, and which has been perfectly described,

> Speak to him thou, for he hears, and spirit with spirit can meet;
> Closer is he than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.

Referring once more to Dr. FAIRBAIRN'S statement that MARTINEAU'S thought is only "nominally Christian," we may set against that judgment this concluding passage of Dr. WATSON'S article:—

> He may never have been able to hold the Catholic doctrine of our Lord's person, and he may have latterly made large admissions to criticism on the Gospels, but Christ was ever to him the Prince of Saints, who revealed the highest possibilities of the human soul, and the example of habitual communion between man and God. It was by the spirit of Christ he was led, and in the steps of Christ he followed, and seldom has the Christian life been brought nearer or made more radiant. During his long course there is no trace that he ever once disobeyed the light God gave him, or did anything which his conscience condemned; that he ever failed to respond to the demand of duty, or that he was ever moved by private ends. His was "the path of the just which is as the shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day," and that day came when he entered into the heaven which in its earnest of light and holiness he had so long carried within his soul. And as one turns from a too slight study in the life of this champion of the soul and faithful follower of Christ, and as one thinks of the place where the shadow has lifted from the unsolved mysteries of earth, and holiness has obtained her crown, he is moved to pray "sit mea anima cum illo."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.—The Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., of Birmingham, has been offered and has accepted the Chair of Philosophy at Manchester College, in succession to the Rev. C. B. Upton, and is to enter upon his duties in October next. Mr. Upton's resignation takes effect at the end of the Summer Term, but he will continue as Professor Emeritus to deliver occasional courses of lectures, and the students will, we trust, long be able to enjoy that personal intercourse with him which for many years has been of such signal benefit to successive generations of students.

* Martineau in 1840 was not appointed "Professor of Modern Philosophy," but of Mental and Moral Philosophy (p. 262). It was not a question at Dublin of taking the Regium Donum "any longer," but of taking it at all, when it fell to him on the death of his senior (p. 263). Dr. Watson may be allowed his small joke, if he does not think it too small, about "Rocked in the cradle of the deep," but that "Vesper at sea" was not introduced into Martineau's hymn-book to replace "Rock of Ages" (p. 267).

THE CHURCH OF THE FUTURE.

I DO not know by what name it will be called; the Future is not yet born, and so it is wise to refrain from baptising it into any name that we can invent. The Church of the Future is the Land which God will show us in His own good time; and we can neither enumerate its conditions nor give the date when men will gather into its communion. A lecturer was once insisting, with great iteration, on the fact that there was "a good time coming"; and, at last, an impatient member of his audience rose to ask, "Please, sir, can you name the date?" And students of prophecy have always been anxious to name the hour and the day. But all attempts to read the sealed pages of the Book of Fate have proved such hopeless blunders, that it would be rash to wear the prophet's mantle or to try to forecast the events of coming years.

I am giving no details; I am supplying no dates. All I want to affirm is this—that, in the great principles for which we stand, the fellowship of our Free Churches does give some indication of the Church of Humanity that shall be the consummation of spiritual faith, and in whose Gospel shall be found the salvation of the world. The Eternal Fatherhood of God, the Universal Brotherhood of man, these are the corner-stones upon which we are building; and, with such a foundation, no prophecy is too wonderful to forecast the splendours of that Living Temple which shall, at last, be unfolded in all its beauty as the shrine of the Divine Presence. Fatherhood and Brotherhood—you cannot speak two grander words to describe the character of God and the destiny of man. Those two conceptions it will be impossible to outgrow, but we shall have to grow up into their infinite wealth of meaning; they are the permanent elements of the mighty faith which shall still be the heritage of our race, even in that age when of ancient temples not one stone shall be upon another. That is the reason why we cannot regard many of the churches of Christendom as prophecies of the Church of the Future; they have bound themselves to the past, and they foreclose their growth into larger truth; they lay intolerable conditions upon the Eternal Fatherhood; they erect artificial barriers to the Universal Brotherhood; they dash, with awful despair, the final destiny of vast numbers of immortal souls. Around not one of the creeds of these churches is it possible for a living faith to organise as the supreme revelation of God to men. Every one of these theological formulas, which once seemed a terminus, turns out to be only a wayside station. Instead of being pillars of fire to guide us into the Promised Land, these creeds are the milestones which record the stages we have already passed; they exist on purpose to be left behind—left behind in our onward pilgrimage to the City of God. Now, it is out of this discontent with old theological conditions that there has been born into us an unconquerable desire for a Faith that shall make us inheritors of the glorious freedom of the children of God. Already we can trace the gradual development of a Faith that grows out of the primal relations of the Living Soul to the Living God. The Soul and God in vital union and mystic fellowship—that is the essence of the Spiritual Gospel which shall supplant the mediatorial theologies, when, as Paul so bravely puts it, even the Son shall be made subject, that God may be all in all.

Of such a religion our churches are, surely, the heralds and pioneers. By our own experience we know that spiritual freedom may be the means of deepening faith, kindling aspiration, and quickening all the filial relations of the human to the divine. We know that Christian Fellowship and Common Worship can be maintained apart from the imposition of theological tests or submission to any ecclesiastical authority; and our own maintenance of Freedom and Fellowship gives us a confident assurance that Religion will still survive all the theological changes and ecclesiastical convulsions which may rend Christendom during the twentieth century.

One of the finest things the Apocalyptic Seer said concerning the City of God was this: "And I saw no temple therein"—thus, by one swift stroke, wiping out the very possibility of sectarianism in our vision of the great company of the redeemed who share the divine beatitude. If there had been a temple in the New Jerusalem everything would have been spoilt; all the old contentions would have arisen; sects and parties would have struggled for the sole possession of that shrine; everybody would have wanted to call it by some particular name; there would have been endless disputes concerning the monopoly to which it should be devoted. But, thank God, these quarrels cannot continue in that Church of the Spirit of which the New Jerusalem is the symbol; there is no temple to quarrel about: "I saw no temple therein." There the redeemed children of God walk the golden streets with no possibility of sectarian strife, theological tyranny, or despotic exclusiveness. They walk in the light of God, for from the greatest to the least they are all found welcome in His sight. There the vision of the perfect love which fulfils all law is completely realised.

> There is neither bond nor free,
> Great nor servile, Lord, in thee:
> Love, like Death, hath all destroyed,
> Rendered all distinctions void!
> Names and sects and parties fall:
> Thou, O Lord, art all in all!

That is the glorious consummation, of which prophets have spoken and poets have sung, gladdening the weary hearts of the pilgrims of time by the anticipation of a kingdom of peace. And yet, even as we commence the third year of this twentieth century, that kingdom seems so far away. But, come it will; the oath of God is pledged for its advent. The strife with darkness must be crowned by the victory of truth. Divisions and animosities must be ended by the supremacy of love. The Past is inexplicable, unless the Future vindicates its groans and travail pains. And, in the evolution of Eternal Providence, we must take our place in the strenuous apostolic succession, without whose labours the world would, by this time, have been lost in superstition and crushed by tyranny. "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God;" and in that army we are comrades of all the apostles and prophets since the world began. Indeed, at the commencement of each new year, oppressed by the seeming failure of the divine army to achieve its victory, we must rally ourselves by the thought that to the Omniscient Mind every spiritual Ideal is eternally realised, and every supreme purpose is for ever crowned with its fulfilment. We must do more than hope that Goodness will conquer some day; we must assure ourselves that God is only another name for the conquering Goodness that is for ever making an end of sin. So shall we attain not merely to the patience of hope; we shall also become possessed by a flawless serenity, surveying the work of time as the process of a perfect and inevitable Will.

In a very profound sense Jesus affirmed that the kingdom is already here, within us and among us. Let us, children of the spirit, commence this new era of advancing time with a victorious mien; amidst the invasion of mortal things let us live as immortals to whom change and death are only passing details in the immensity of our divine vocation. So, with every new year's dawn, we shall rouse ourselves to welcome the sublime opportunities which await us:—

"AN OBSTINATE FALLACY"?

SIR,—In THE INQUIRER of Dec. 27 appears an article by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, entitled "An Obstinate Fallacy," which is in part a criticism of part of a paper read by me at the recent autumnal conference of the Midland Christian Union, and published in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 29.

I should be glad to be allowed space for reply on a few of the points raised.

(1) Mr. Lummis accuses me of making two utterly inconsistent statements in two successive clauses, when I say: "Freedom of thought exists to preserve the health of belief; it exists so far as religion is concerned," not for its own sake, but "solely for the sake of" (obviously, to preserve the health of) "that theological belief which is the expression of a man's religion." Freedom of thought on any matter is to preserve the health of belief about that matter. Freedom of thought so far as religion is concerned is to preserve the health of thoughts about religion—i.e., theological belief. Where is the inconsistency? Of course, if it be assumed that only Unitarianism can flourish in the atmosphere of freedom of thought (and freedom of thought in matters of religion does very generally but not always lead men to Unitarianism), and if it be further assumed that Unitarianism is a rigidly fixed and finally settled collection of theological beliefs, then the two statements are "utterly inconsistent." But why make these assumptions? They are surely, to say the least, unnecessary. Certainly I did not make them. Indeed, I maintained with some fulness the exact opposite. But perhaps this is one of the parts of the article which does not refer to my paper. Freedom of thought may lead a man to Trinitarianism, Swedenborgianism, Positivism, Secularism. Many holders of these positions will maintain, and rightly, that they have freedom of thought equal to that which Unitarians have. Is freedom of thought then (never, as was pointed out, absolute, but always conditioned, where there is organisation, whether of individuals into a congregation, or of congregations into a union of churches) the differentia?

(2) Why should it be assumed that since Unitarianism (but not Unitarianism alone) flourishes in the atmosphere of freedom of thought, Unitarianism is either "the last, full, perfect revelation of truth, or else it is so vague and elastic as to be meaningless?" Is there no other alternative? Surely there is. The Unitarianism of our manhood is not the Unitarianism of our childhood; the Unitarianism of to-day is not the Unitarianism of fifty years ago, nor that the Unitarianism of 100 years ago. Is it all so vague and elastic as to be meaningless? As well might it be said that seed, leaf, flower, fruit are all useless because the last is derived from the first. Or, is it an orderly development, a growth of surpassing interest, and does the change in Unitarian thought of God and life and destiny during the last 100 years mean a fuller revelation of God as great as that of any five centuries antecedent? Unitarianism is what Unitarians make it. The policy of subordinating Unitarianism to freedom has the effect of narrowing the application of the term to a particular school of Unitarians, instead of allowing it to be wide as the universal religion to which the high religions of the world are tending.

(3) "Let us not write over our church doors, 'Here you must think as we think.'" I have a fairly wide knowledge of various forms of Unitarian thought, I think; but I never yet met the Unitarian who wished to do this. I believe he does not exist. Surely here, and not only here in the course of his article, Mr. Lummis is setting up a dummy for the pleasure of knocking it down. And I am afraid it does something—I need not say I do not mean intentionally—to confuse the issue. It is one thing for a congregation to say, "This is what we hold to be the fullest revelation of God made to man: this is our bread of life: this is our message to the world"; and quite another thing to say, "You may not enter unless you believe as we do." A man can worship anywhere, but best where the form of worship has least that is to him untrue. A particular form of worship is the reason for any Church's existence. It is the most important thing in connection with any Church. It is what differentiates it from other Churches. And it should be proclaimed with no uncertain, hesitating voice. Only so can those who know it not yet learn what it is.

(4) "Our churches are based on worship." "Let us write over our churches, 'Here you may worship God.'" Is there an altar, a temple, a mosque, a church in all the world to which these words do not apply equally with our own churches? Has there ever been one? All are for the worship of God, and in the overwhelming majority of cases any man may worship there. That being so, all other churches being for the worship of God, and our churches being for the worship of God, why should our churches exist? Why should we continue to support them? Why should we not close them, and join with the worship of the many elsewhere? What joy it would be if we could. But we cannot, because in our churches is a form of worship, an expression of religion, i.e., a theological belief, most in harmony with our individual theological beliefs. Because the form of worship in other churches has too much that we believe to be untrue, we can therefore best worship in our own churches, and with greatest zeal work to help the cause they stand for. If this difference of theological belief ceased to exist, it is possible some few of our larger congregations might continue to exist, certainly the majority would disperse.

(5) In religion, I wrote, we may not differ from others; their and our adoration of God, and self-consecration to the will of God and so on, may be equal. It is in beliefs about God, and our relation with Him here and hereafter, that we differ. "Could a better reason be found," Mr. Lummis asks, "for basing our societies upon religion which unites men rather than on theology which divides them?"

I answer:—No society can be based upon religion unless it is also based on theology. Religion and theology are inseparable. Theology is religion articulate. Not a thought can be formed, not a sentence can be uttered on any matter of religion, but it is explicitly or implicitly a statement of theological belief. To take the inmost heart and highest height of all religion and all theology—"God is love." To be conscious of the love of God is religion. To make the statement "God is love" is to make a statement of theological belief. Without theology religion is inarticulate, and we could have no communication with one another on the subject; still less could a Church be established. It is general agreement in theological belief which gathers a congregation together, which is the reason for the existence of any Church.

My paper took the form it did because I believe that this standing vaguely for worship (which must lead to "one man churches," admiration for a preacher rather than adhesion to a special form of worship and devotion to a cause) or primarily for freedom of thought is, so far as it has way, doing incalculable harm to our churches and our cause. It is as dangerous as dry-rot in a house, and eventually as fatal as leprosy to the human frame. We have a definite and important message to deliver, which shall bring peace of heart and courage and hope with assured faith, to others as it has to ourselves. Our message is not in the first place freedom, but the truth of God, which, in freedom, has been revealed to us. The truth we have, that is our message, and it may not be second to anything. It is that which unites us in congregations. It is that which must unite the congregations in all their organisations. Our message can only be fitly delivered if our churches are organised, individually and collectively, upon the basis of this Unitarian message, and for its proclamation. The widespread ignorance even among educated people that there is such a thing as Unitarianism, the still wider spread ignorance as to what Unitarianism is, is largely due to the fact that our churches have not been, and are not, so organised. Where Unitarianism is hidden away in church life or provincial organisation, it still exists, for it is the cause of the existence of the churches, but its life is stunted under the chilling influence of silence.

So far as we are known to the world at large we shall and must to the world always stand for Unitarianism. To deny it is not to negative the fact, but is, in my opinion, to hinder the spread of the light, to prevent the world from receiving the message; it is to put the light under a bushel and weaken influence for good which should be ours. Because we believe more truth will be revealed, is being revealed, we should not the less zealously unite and devotedly work to establish and spread the truth we have.

That which has no name does not exist, and that which has a divided name dissipates its energy. R. DAVIS.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF ST. FRANCIS AND ST. DOMINIC.

SIR,—The story of the meeting of Francis and Dominic in Rome is so beautiful that I think your readers, many of whom are perhaps unacquainted with it, may be interested in a translation.

I am rather puzzled by Mr. W. H. Drummond's assertion that Mr. Hargrove must be aware of the grave doubts (as I understand him) affecting the authenticity of this record. I make no pretensions to close acquaintance with the criticism of the biographies of Francis, which threatens to become as intricate as the criticism of the Gospels; but I should have thought that this passage was a quite sufficient foundation on which to build. It occurs in the "Speculum Perfectionis," which Sabatier, who edited it (for the first time) in 1898, held to be the work of Brother Leo, and the earliest of all the biographies; and which Tilemann, in the very searching criticism published in 1902 (the last work on the subject which I have seen), regards not indeed as the "oldest," but as the "most valuable" document for the history of Francis which we possess. It seems certain, at any rate, that this particular chapter was contained in the copy of the Legenda Trium Sociorum used by Wadding, which was fuller than any Latin MS. of the legend now known. It is also contained in the old Italian version published by Marcellius and Domenichelli in 1899. It seems, then, that we must in any case allow that Leo, Ruffino and Angelo are sponsors for the story. What better authority could we have? I do not gather that Mr. Drummond has any sympathy with the extreme scepticism which rejects the authenticity of the legend of the three companions altogether. Are there any special suspicions which attach to this particular chapter?

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

Chapter xliii. of the "Speculum Perfectionis":—

"In the city of Rome when those two bright luminaries of the world, to wit the blessed Francis and the blessed Dominic, were together in the presence of the Lord Cardinal of Ostia, who was afterwards pope, and when they had mutually poured forth sweet discourse of God, the Lord Cardinal finally said to them:—'In the primitive Church the pastors and prelates were poor men burning with love, not cupidity. Why, then, do we not make bishops and prelates of your brothers, to excel all others in doctrine and example?' Whereon there rose between the saints a humble and devout contention, each of them, not indeed commanding the other to answer first, but deferring to him and urging him thereto. But finally the humility of Francis prevailed and compelled Dominic humbly to obey him by answering first. The blessed Dominic then answered and said:—'Lord Cardinal, good is the station to which my brothers are even now exalted if they will understand it, and so far as my power stretches, never will I suffer them to gain any adornment of dignity.' Then the blessed Francis, inclining himself before the said Lord Cardinal, said:—'My lord, my brothers were called minors expressly to prevent them presuming to become great ones. Their calling bids them stay in the plain and follow the footprints of the humility of Christ, that thereby at the last they may be exalted beyond others in the eyes of the saints. For if you would have them bear fruit in the Church of God, hold them and keep them in the state of their calling; and should they ever scale the heights, hurl them down with violence upon the plains, and never suffer them to ascend to any prelatry.' Such were the answers of the saints; and when they had ended them the Lord Cardinal of Ostia was greatly edified by both their answers, and gave huge thanks to God. Now when both of them were taking their departure together, the blessed Dominic begged the blessed Francis to deign to give him the cord wherewith he was girt. The blessed Francis refused in humility, even as the other implored in love. But at last the devotion of the petitioner prospered and prevailed, and the blessed Dominic girt the cord of the blessed Francis, which he had gained through the forcefulness of his love, beneath his tunic, and thenceforth lovingly wore it. At last the one placed his hands in the hands of the other, and each with mutual commendation most sweetly commended himself to the other. And St. Dominic said to St. Francis: 'Would, Brother Francis, that thy religion [i.e. order] and my religion might be one, and that we might live in the Church under the same rule.' Lastly, when they were parting from each other, the blessed Dominic said to many who were standing by: 'Of a truth I say to you, that all religions [i.e. all who belong to an order] should imitate this holy man Francis, so great is the perfection of his holiness.'"

JEREMIAH AND THE LEVITICAL LEGISLATION.

SIR,—In his friendly notice of the second edition of my Introduction to the Hexateuch, in last week's INQUIRER, Mr. Wicksteed comments on the omission to notice the bearing of Jeremiah vii. 21-22 on the age of the Levitical Code. The argument is not ignored, as the index to Biblical passages has enabled me to find two references to it, which stood also in the original edition.

P. 31, note a.—It has been argued from Jeremiah vii. 21 that Jeremiah, though himself a priest, was unacquainted with any recognised body of ritual torah claiming Mosaic origin or authority.

P. 76, From Jeremiah vii. 21 . . . he [De Wette] inferred that there was then no body of ceremonial legislation claiming (like the Levitical) a Sinaitic origin and a Mosaic authority.

The argument received much emphasis from Graf, and passed from him into the recognised pleas of Kuenen, Colenso, and Wellhausen. In making a rapid survey of the general development of the modern view, it might have been better, perhaps, to have given it a more prominent place. But, I confess, it has never strongly appealed to me. Its force depends on the assumption that if the Levitical legislation had been in existence, Jeremiah would not have suggested a course which would violate it. Can this be maintained? As I understand the passage, Jeremiah sarcastically recommends the Israelites to ignore the traditional difference between the "burnt offering," consumed whole on the altar, and the "sacrifice" partially eaten by the worshipper at a festive meal, and enjoy both alike. Doubtless, had they been asked for the sanction of their practice, they would have replied that it was part of the ancient rites which had descended from the days of Moses, when they had been instituted by Yahweh. By no means, cries the prophet, Yahweh never gave any commands about such things at all. But in that case the whole cultus is condemned as undivine, cp. vi. 20; and the ritual prescriptions of the First Code, and the great Deuteronomic Law, are involved in a common rejection. The argument, that is, proves too much. Duhm actually supposes that the bitter words about the "lying pen of the scribes," viii. 8, refer to some form of the code on which the Josian revolution was based.* If, therefore, Jeremiah in an impassioned moment (one need not insist that a prophet shall be always consistent) threw over the authority of Deuteronomy, he would not have shrunk from including the Priestly Code, had it then existed, in the same repudiation.

AN INVOCATION.

SPIRIT of Love, that hovers o'er my being,
Teach me to know the heights that I may climb,
Take from my eyes the veil of mortal weakness,
That I may see into that world sublime.

Teach me that so my ears may be unstopped
And sounds that come from that celestial sphere
May raise my soul with their enhancing music,
Until I feel that heaven itself is near.

Teach me that so my life may be enfolded
By Love Divine, that as I wend my way
Thro' earthly cares, my every step is guided
By that pure Light which leads to perfect Day.

IN DEFENCE OF PRIGS.

THE prig we have always with us, and there is no easier or pleasanter way of gaining credit for all the manly virtues than to express contempt for him. To say, "I do hate a prig" is felt to be at once a modest and an effective way of proclaiming the robustness of our own moral nature. We are bound, indeed, to admit that there are many more evil and dangerous men than the prig, who often has real moral grit in him; and yet we find his company more distasteful than that of far worse men. We may say of his defect what Dante said of the punishment of the gluttons: "Others may be more serious, but none is more unpleasant."

But what is a prig? "A virtuous person without a sense of humour," said the late Charles Beard. If that were so we should be more at a loss than ever to explain the vehemence of our dislike. What we generally mean by a man having no sense of humour is that he takes something seriously which we do not; but that is hardly an adequate ground for hatred—even if virtue is added to it. But the definition, though suggestive, is hardly satisfactory. There are many virtuous persons without a sense of humour whom we could only tax with priggishness on a very superficial acquaintance, if at all. Is not the prig a moral pedant? And if we clear our ideas as to what constitutes the pedant may we not get some light on the nature of the prig? The pedant may have much or little learning, but, in any case, he is vastly impressed with the importance of what he knows. Not necessarily with self-importance; he may not be at all proud of himself for knowing his Latin quantities, say, or his Greek irregulars, but he is impressed with the immense importance of the knowledge itself. So far, so good. Within its own sphere it is important. And accuracy is always important in every sphere. But the pedant does not know either why these things are important (and consequently he does not know when and where and to whom they are important) or their relative importance in comparison with other things. The University Don who had to break to a bereaved father the news of his son's sudden death, and who added at the end of his letter, "There was, however, little prospect of Mr. X. Y. taking a distinguished degree," was an ideal pedant. He was quite right in attaching importance to a good degree; but not knowing why it was important he did not know when it was and when it was not relevant. Hence the pedant looks down upon those who have not his own particular kind of knowledge; or if he does not look down upon them at any rate he places them in an inferior class. He regards an accurate knowledge of Greek grammar as having an absolute, instead of only a relative, significance; because he does not understand that it is accuracy of mind that is the essential thing. And the pedant has a certain narrow accuracy of mind himself, and may be the means of enforcing accuracy of mind upon others. He is a much better and more useful man than he would be if he did not care or did not know the things to which he attaches such undue importance; but his whole conception of them is detached, mechanical, unrelated, without vitality.

The prig is a moral pedant. He knows that it is important to speak the truth, not to use bad words, and so forth; and he has the courage and the self-restraint to live up to his knowledge. Many of his companions share his knowledge, but lack his courage and self-restraint. He is better than they are. But he has no real sense of truth or serenity of temper; and so, not understanding why it is important to speak the truth or to abstain from bad language, he is without the sense of relativity, and has no means of judging the moral implications of a false statement, or a curse, on the lips of another. He has a less keen sense of virtues that cannot be submitted to definite rule and test than he has for those that can. If he encounters a man incapable of a mean or ungenerous action, but capable of a falsehood, he forms too low an estimate of his moral character. If he meets one who cannot tell a lie, but who can be cruel, designing, and self-seeking, he forms too high an estimate of his moral character. His virtues are definite and comparatively easily tested, and therefore he is apt to be censorious, and by implication self-righteous. He may really have a very modest conception of his own virtue, but he has an immense reverence for the virtues which, as a matter of patent fact, he practises, and he is hard and superior in his condemnation of those who do not possess them. The prig, then, is entirely right and estimable from the positive point of view; but his narrowness, his spirit of legalism and externality, the want of due sense of proportion and generous appreciation are his faults. Hence we need never be uneasy, but may often be devoutly thankful to detect priggishness in a child or young person. Only it must be genuine priggishness, of which a rigid, though narrow, virtue is an essential element. For the pedant who makes false quantities we have no use at all in this world; nor for the prig who tells lies under pressure, or cheats while persuading himself that he does not. But the genuine prig has the right stuff in him. All he wants is a closer and more intimate contact with life than is possible to most young people. He lives under the Law; but the Law is a good foundation for the Gospel. The ideal moral development would be always to feel the true significance of things and spontaneously choose the better course; but in our weakness and our ignorance, under the pressure and buffetings of the world, the flesh and the devil, how very few of us there are who can from first to last live by the perfect Law of Liberty! For the rest of us the discipline of the Law must precede the freedom of the Gospel. He will be blessed indeed who, on looking back on his own life or considering the life of his children, can detect nothing there from which he would have been thankful to have been protected by priggish virtue. The grown-up pedant and the grown-up prig show an arrested development; they prove that they have never really come into living contact with the only things for which they have ever cared. The young pedant and the young prig are immature but promising.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

A QUESTION of public morality has deeply stirred Manchester since I last wrote. One of our theatres had been deprived for some time of its drink license owing to charges of gross immorality made against its management. Mr. Pitt-Hardacre, the lessee, brought an action of libel against Mr. Edwin Holt, the present chairman of the Watch Committee, who, for the sake of public purity, waived aside his claim of privilege. The trial of the case occupied a considerable time, and many an easy-going, self-satisfied citizen was shocked to find what a hotbed of corruption the Comedy Theatre had been in our midst. Mr. Holt won the case, and his expenses, which were heavy and amounted to over £3,000, were immediately subscribed for by a grateful public. Mr. Holt has recently become chairman of the Watch Committee in place of Alderman Harry Rawson, who after a long and honourable term of office had resigned. The city owes more than it can express to Alderman Rawson for the drastic changes in police supervision and administration which have been effected under his chairmanship. At one time our police force had become a byword for ineffectiveness and bribery; but its reorganisation has been so thorough, and the spirit actuating the new Chief Constable and the new Watch Committee so earnest, that it is now above suspicion and leaves nothing to be desired. And now the Corporation is conferring its greatest possible honour—namely, the Honorary Freedom of the City, upon Alderman Rawson as a mark of the regard and esteem in which he is held. The occasions on which this has been previously conferred can be counted on one's fingers. Our revered friend having attained a ripe and honoured old age has wisely curtailed his purely public services; and we all trust that for years to come he may enjoy health and strength amidst the comforts and joys of his home, for we are perfectly sure that while he lives we may always count upon his ripe counsel and unwavering sympathy in any effort of ours for the advancement of our religious faith and the consolidation of our organised life. You have already announced that a "Harry Rawson" Prize has been founded at the Unitarian Home Missionary College with the surplus money remaining from the "Harry Rawson Portrait Fund."

We are looking ahead with great interest to the autumnal meetings of the B and F.U.A. in Manchester this year; and we hope to do full justice to the opportunity which will present itself of reinvigorating the religious life of our churches, and also interesting the general public in the fact of our existence and the principles for which we stand. Meanwhile we shall be able to get into form through the experiences of previous gatherings. Like all the rest of the United Kingdom we are looking forward expectantly to the Triennial Conference meetings at Liverpool; for the memory of the previous gathering in that city is with us still. But before this even are to be the annual meetings of our Manchester District Association, which promise to exceed in interest any we have yet had. All the arrangements are not quite complete; but the preacher is to be the Rev. John Page Hopps. That means, to start with, a large congregation, for there is no more popular preacher in this district than Mr. Hopps; and we rejoice that in a ripe and eloquent age he is able to so arrange his personal affairs as to become a sort of itinerary apostle, giving the North as well as the South the benefit of his exceptional powers. A new feature is likely to be introduced at these meetings, and it will be a further evidence of the very anxious desire on our part to tap the sources of virile strength in our churches. The idea is to appeal of the men amongst us to meet together one evening and discuss frankly as men the conditions that characterise us. That our services are not so well attended as they ought to be goes without saying, and men are the chief delinquents. What we want is to bring men from our various centres into personal contact with one another, and encourage them to speak without reserve what is in their thoughts, to pledge anew our desire to serve each other to the best of our ability, and then return to our respective churches bent upon adapting our machinery more perfectly to the needs of humankind. I suppose Manchester is no different from most other places; anyhow, here the need is being increasingly felt of bringing the men of our churches more frequently together, so that they may know each other as Unitarians. There is not enough joy and enthusiasm felt by us when members of our churches aspire to positions of civic usefulness or are signalled out for public honour. I know how certain friends of mine will vehemently denounce what seems to be a proposition to label any public man a Unitarian. History tells us how, in the old days, Cross-street Chapel, then known as Unitarian, was proud to supply not infrequently the mayor of the city. In many ways Manchester Unitarians, as such, strove to bring a salutary influence to bear upon various civic institutions. When one reads how in the old days the Unitarian Home Missionary Board was founded, and the Memorial Hall built, and of the grand men who stood in the presence of all Manchester as pre-eminent citizens and not less as pre-eminent Unitarians, one wonders whether the time will ever come again when, moved as Unitarians, we shall as co-religionists take once again the civic position held by our forefathers, and combinedly make the influence of our faith felt in all effort exerted for the well-being of the community. Few of us know what power we have in whole-hearted combination. It would increase the dignity and self-respect and arouse the enthusiasm of our Church members were they to feel that more men believing in the same gospel as themselves were sources of civic strength, unselfish workers for civic good-government, recipients of public honour. There is something to be said for the pioneer of old who said, "I am a Unitarian; and because I am a Unitarian I must engage in public service. All men are my brethren. My leisure and my surplus means shall be spent in making the conditions of their civic life conduce more and more to their health and happiness." The criticism I frequently hear passed by the public is "Your religion is too colourless. It disintegrates you. It precludes your acting together as if driven by divine impulse. To us you appear to be decent citizens; but not inspired as a religious community. It puzzles us to know why you assemble together for worship, unless it be that you can't each afford a church and a parson of your own." Of course, we know that this is undeserved and untrue, and yet we all know that there are members of our churches who refuse to co-operate with us as Unitarians or associate themselves in any way with a Unitarian effort. I have seen what almost impossible things can be done when co-religionists join hands, not in any narrow creedal sense, but for public weal, and work heartily together; and, personally, I have such belief in the efficacy of my faith that I invariably feel sure when a Unitarian is elected to some public position that the duties of the office will be conscientiously and honourably discharged. It is not for me here and now to suggest the ways in which co-operation for public welfare might be possible and profitable, but the first result would be a strong vitalising sense of comradeship, of interested connection between church and church, which would simply create a reformation in our corporate life, and galvanise into activity the many dead bones that could be gathered from church membership rolls.

From what I said in my last letter it may be well imagined how busy the opening of the New Year finds us in this district. The Manchester District Sunday School Association will not allow us to forget its bazaar next Easter. It is in collusion with our local Union, and from one or the other we are constantly receiving gentle reminders that each school is as responsible as the rest for the success of the effort. There is a shrewd business wit requisite in the organisation of a bazaar; and I have long ago come to the conclusion that Lancashire Unitarians have a large share of that useful commodity. Bazaars, however, are not the all-absorbing interest of our denominational life, though there is scarcely an institution which does not genuinely need a larger subscription-list than the one it has already got. You see, it does not matter how enthusiastic folk are about their moral and spiritual work, they are bound to be hampered when their resources are limited. We may be veritable Crusaders, but we must have the sinews of war if we are to achieve great victories. Yet there are often occasions when, discussing our work, we launch forth noble schemes as prodigally as if we thought we had the Transvaal mines to draw upon for the necessary means. This is a good sign, though very discomfiting when a careful treasurer tells you the exchequer is empty and the subscription-list is falling away. It seems to me that, signally successful as we Unitarians have been in discovering how to rake in big subscriptions for colossal undertakings, we have yet to learn how to secure the small subscriptions for the commonplace, familiar, local organisation which, although comparatively insignificant, is even more absolutely necessary. Why are we so slow in this matter? Well, we are at last going to thoroughly experiment with this principle in connection with the Domestic Mission. The present treasurer and some of the local treasurers have already tested it, and they find that it works. Besides, if a person subscribes only two shillings or half-a-crown he at once has an interest in the institution, and he gives it his moral support as well.

And these Manchester Domestic Missions are in a very healthy condition in every other respect. We are all under moral obligations to our poorer brethren, and if we cannot get into their midst and help them by personal contact we can render our service by proxy, and the Mission gladly enough undertakes the work for us if we provide it with the means. During Christmas the missionaries were very busy, acting as almoners of the well-to-do in distributing good cheer in many homes, and thus temporarily lifting the cloud of care and want. The mission-rooms have been full of harmless mirth and jollity, for old and young have had their parties and played their games; and danced and sang to their heart's content. Now the sounds of revelry are hushed, and the missionaries and their helpers are entering upon the duties of the New Year with renewed earnestness, and with schemes for greater usefulness.

Our monthly meetings at the various churches are still attended with marked success. The last was held at Heaton Moor, where most of the congregations in the district were represented, and the next is to be held on Saturday at Blackley. In order to facilitate introductions between members of different churches the President is to hold a reception before the evening meeting, at which it is earnestly hoped that stronger sympathies and interests may be evoked.

I feel almost inclined to apologise for the general tone of this letter—it is not my usual characteristic; but I may surely have the privilege of a little grumbling occasionally. So please do not scold.

Charles Roper.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdare: Highland-place.—The Rev. H. Fisher Short has just brought to a close a very successful series of Sunday evening lectures explanatory of the Unitarian faith. A beautiful service was also held on Christmas morning, when the sermon was on "The Re-birth of Christ."

Bolton: Bank-street Chapel.—The annual service of Self-Dedication and of Welcome was held on the first Sunday morning in the New Year, to mark the entrance into membership of the congregation of all those who have joined it during the past year, and particularly of those who have passed through the minister's preparation class. The losses by death, removal, or other causes numbered twenty-three, the gains thirty-five. The enrolled membership of seat-holders now stands at 426, a net increase of 130 during the last seven years. The Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., who conducted the service, and preached an appropriate sermon, stated that out of thirty-eight members of his preparation class for 1902 (the sixth in succession), fourteen had during the year joined the Bank-street congregation, and one the Halliwell-road congregation (ten were already members of Bank-street), and two members of previous classes had also joined during the year. In the six years 165 persons had passed through the preparation classes. Of these 121 had become members of Bank-street Chapel, and six of Halliwell-road Free Church.

Bolton: Halliwell-road Free Church.—After three years' vigorous life, the Halliwell-road Mission, in connection with Bank-street Chapel, has become the "Halliwell-road Free Church," while still retaining its connection with the mother church. In the words of the Calendar for January:—"While undoubtedly most of the worshippers at both Bank-street and Halliwell-road are Unitarian, it has been felt right to preserve the tradition of freedom which for over 200 years has kept Bank-street Chapel without a denominational name. This will in no way interfere with the outspoken utterance of theological conviction from the pulpit, while it maintains a free and open door for all who feel in general sympathy with our religious worship." At a New Year's party on Saturday, 3rd inst., the Rev. C. J. Street, who presided, announced that Mr. J. P. Thomasson had most generously purchased the adjoining property, and handed it over as a gift to the trustees, with a view to the provision of more accommodation for the Sunday-school. This announcement was received with great delight. With the original property, there is now a site large enough for erecting a chapel and school in due course, and it is all freehold, without encumbrance. The sum of £200 has also been raised by the congregation, with some help, for investment as the nucleus of an independence fund. From the first all local expenses have been met by the congregation; in the second year £20 was contributed towards the support of the ministry, and last year £30 was paid for this purpose. The church is a branch from Bank-street, the senior minister (the Rev. C. J. Street) having oversight of it, and being chairman of its committee, while the assistant minister (the Rev. E. S. Hicks) is virtually a curate-in-charge. The congregation and Sunday-school have both made steady progress, the subscribing membership numbering about 120, the present average attendance at the school being over 160, and at the Sunday evening services over eighty adults.

Bolton: Unity Church.—A successful two days' Christmas Fair and Sale of Work was opened at Unity Church on New Year's Day by Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington, the object being the liquidation of a debt of £350 on the new class-rooms and extensions carried out at the schools. The Rev. Wilfred Harris presided, and in opening the proceedings paid a tribute to the memory of the late Miss Curtis and Mr. Frank Taylor, to whom the church was very deeply indebted. Mr. Taylor's legacy of £1,000 had been a great encouragement to them. On the second day the fair was opened by Mr. Robert Lawson, an old member of the congregation, and the receipts, including donations, amounted to £318, a decrease of £12 on last year's sale. At a well-attended and representative meeting of the members of the congregation, it was unanimously resolved to place a memorial window in the church to the memory of Mr. Frank Taylor, J.P., for his beneficence and good services to the cause of Unity Church and schools.

Chowbent.—The children's party and the carol service in the school, in aid of the Children's Homes, resulted in £13 10s., and this sum has been shared out as follows:—£4 10s. to Winifred House, London; and £9 to the Twentieth Century Bazaar Fund, for the Blackpool and Great Hucklow Homes, Manchester District.

Edinburgh.—On the first Sunday of the year the pulpit of St. Mark's Chapel was occupied by Miss G. von Petzold, M.A., who preached an impressive sermon on the words of Paul, "To me to live is Christ" (Phil. i. 21). This accomplished young lady is a graduate of Edinburgh, and is at present a second year student in Manchester College, Oxford. A German by birth, she speaks with a slight foreign accent, which, however, only adds a charm to her otherwise perfect English. As a student in Edinburgh Miss von Petzold won golden opinions, and the service was attended by many of her personal friends as well as others interested in hearing a lady preacher.

Elland.—The church at Elland, composed almost entirely of working people, has for about twelve months been without a minister, and the services have been conducted regularly by members of the Yorkshire Lay-Preachers' Union and an occasional minister. The members of the church are an enthusiastic band of workers, and their efforts have been very successful both as regards Sunday-school and other organisations. In order to defray the cost of alterations to the organ and other improvements, a Sale of Work took place in the schoolroom on Christmas Day and Boxing Day. The openers were Mr. Basil Lupton, of Leeds, and Mr. W. K. Briggs, of Battyeford, near Halifax, both of whom gave encouraging addresses. The result of the sale was very satisfactory.

Evesham.—On the first Sunday in the year the Mayor (Councillor Hughes) attended morning service at the Oat-street Unitarian Chapel, accompanied by members of the Corporation, borough magistrates, borough officials, mace-bearers, the police, and the volunteer fire brigade.

Leeds: Mill-hill.—On the last Sunday of the Old Year, the 230th anniversary of Mill-hill Chapel was celebrated by special services, when the collection towards the chapel funds amounted to £37 4s. 7d. On this the chapel Record for January has the following note:—"A report of the morning sermon in the Yorkshire Post states that Mill-hill was a Presbyterian or Congregational church down to Dr. Priestley's time. It would require a long explanation to set this right, but for the present it must suffice that Mill-hill always was and is congregational in government, though it never had any connection with the Congregational body. The founders were Presbyterian in doctrine, and the change began long before Dr. Priestley's time. He was the first Unitarian minister, but the congregation must have been well disposed beforehand or would certainly not have accepted him. We greatly need a history of the chapel, which would be full of interest and instruction. I hope this will be undertaken before long, but it will require more time for research than I can at present afford."

Liverpool: Hope-street.—It was announced in last week's Christian World that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong had resigned the pulpit of Hope-street Church, which he has occupied since 1884, and the statement was repeated in the Daily News. We are happy to be able to make a different announcement. Mr. Armstrong has indeed been forbidden by his medical adviser to attempt any longer the full duties of his ministry, and therefore placed his resignation in the hands of the congregation; but with the warmest expressions of attachment they have agreed to an arrangement by which Mr. Armstrong will continue as senior minister of the church, sharing the work with a second minister.

London: Bermondsey.—The Rev. Eustace Thompson begs to acknowledge, with thanks, the following donations for the Sunday-school, &c.:—Miss T. (Croydon), 5s.; C. K., £1; H. A. J., 5s.; J. H., £1 1s.; C. L., £1; Miss P., 10s.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant gratefully acknowledges a contribution for his Poor's Purse from E. D. S., Scarborough. Other contributions have been acknowledged privately.

London: George's-row.—The Rev. F. Summers thanks friends who have sent for the poor of the Mission either gifts or money. About 120 poor families were helped with Christmas fare. Collections have also been made at the Mission for the funds of the Domestic Mission Society (£1 18s. 6d.), for Winifred House (3s. 6d.), and for the Bedfield Mission (6s. 6d.), the two latter from Sunday-school classes. A special dramatic entertainment, arranged by Mr. Arthur E. Summers, realised upwards of £5 towards the Christmas Dinner Fund. With monthly collections in the Sunday-school for the past year, an excellent lectern for the chapel has been purchased and presented. Christmas morning and watch-night services have been held. In connection with the Sunday-school Sharing-out Clubs—after all repayments for sickness—the sum of £14 3s. 4d. has been distributed. The Sunday-school and congregational parties have been held, at both of which the children's cantata, entitled "The Fairy Chain," excellently taught by Miss Amy Withall, B.A., was given and much admired. A tea and entertainment to 200 waifs and strays, selected by the Rev. F. Summers, has been given by the lady clerks in Sir Thomas Lipton's office. A special Sunday afternoon children's service was held on Sunday afternoon last, when the new lectern was first used, the lessons from which being read by Mr. E. Carlier. On Monday last the teachers' and elder scholars' soirée was held, and, as usual, was much enjoyed. Mrs. Summers was presented with elaborate fish servers in morocco case, which she suitably acknowledged.

London: Islington (Resignation).—Dr. G. Dawes Hicks has tendered his resignation of the ministry of Unity Church. Henceforward he will devote himself entirely to philosophical work.

London: Stepney.—Last Sunday afternoon the Monthly Postal Mission Conference was held at College Chapel, when the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed gave an address on "The Fatherhood of God as conceived by Jesus." An interesting discussion followed. In the evening Mr. Wicksteed preached the first of a series of Forward Movement sermons, his subject being, "Was Jesus God?"

Manchester: Bradford.—The usual parties in connection with Mill-street Church have taken place during the Christmas and New Year's Holidays, and have all been very successful, but during the festivities the congregation have had to mourn the loss through death of two members who had been connected with the church from its commencement, and had been loyally devoted to its work.

Pontypridd.—On the last Sunday in the Old Year and the first Sunday in the New, Mr. John Evans, B.A., of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, conducted the services at the Vestry Hall, and preached able and appropriate sermons, which were much appreciated. The services were well attended. On Thursday, New Year's Day, a social tea and entertainment was held at the Lesser Town Hall, when the children, congregation, and friends mustered in force, and a very enjoyable evening was spent.

Rawtenstall.—On Christmas Day the annual tea and entertainment proved a very great success; the schoolroom was crowded, and many were disappointed in failing to find admittance. On Sunday evening, Jan. 4, a most interesting service was held in the church, the occasion being the welcome and dedication of new members. Two months ago a Young People's Guild was formed in connection with the church and school, and meetings were held every week for the consideration of religious subjects. The outcome was that all the young people who were not already enrolled as church members, and several young people from the adult classes, expressed a desire to become members of the church, and last Sunday evening the minister, the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, had the happiness of welcoming into Christian fellowship forty-five persons. Mr. Holden, Chairman of the Church Committee, and one of the oldest members of the church, also spoke very appropriately. Each member received a card of membership bearing a suitable inscription.

Rotherham.—The choir of the Church of Our Father and friends were entertained at supper in the schoolroom on Jan. 1, through the kindness of Mr. W. Crooks and the Church Committee. During the evening the Rev. W. Stephens announced that the conditions of the offer to subscribe £25 by Mr. W. G. Gummer if another £25 were subscribed before the new year had been more than fulfilled. There only remains a debt now of about £30 to pay for the alterations to the schoolroom, the total cost being about £230. Mr. and Mrs. Norris, of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, kindly promised to give a musical and theatrical entertainment to further reduce the debt. The company were greatly cheered by a short address from Mr. Sydney Napper, of the Stoke Newington congregation. The rest of the evening was spent in music and games.

Saffron Walden.—Last Sunday evening, by arrangement, the Excelsior Band attended the services at the General Baptist Chapel, and led the whole of the psalmody, under the very able leadership of Mr. E. Pitston. The building was crowded, numbers being unable to enter. Time, tune, and compass were excellent. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth gave an address on "Music—Song—Praise," which he was requested to print, by the band and by the audience. The expressed desire of all was to have such a service as this rendered from time to time. It recalled the memory of those held a quarter of a century ago: and the efficiency of the old band was once more demonstrated in this service.

Stannington.—The teachers' festival was held as usual on New Year's Eve, when over 200 partook of tea. The evening was spent (after a suitable address by the minister) in social converse, interspersed with readings and singing.

Wolverhampton.—On New Year's Day the usual tea-party was held in the schoolroom of All Souls' Church. During December several successful entertainments were given, and further lectures and socials are being arranged for the second half of the winter season. The Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., is becoming well known in the town by lecturing and speaking on public platforms.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

UNTIL the beginning of this month there was just the possibility that the prosecution against Mr. Gottfried Schwarz, of Heidelberg, might fall through. In such a case it is the practice for the Public Prosecutor to hold a preliminary investigation to see if the indictment is technically sound; and the accused is permitted to put in justificatory pleas. In the present instance the Public Prosecutor in his report acknowledges the obvious good faith and seriousness of the incriminated writings; quotes precedents to show that nevertheless they may be in fault at law, and decides that certain passages may be regarded reasonably as falling within the meaning of "insult" in section 166 of the Baden Penal Code. He accordingly cites Mr. Schwarz to appear at the next sitting of the Schwurgericht, which, as we have already stated, will be held this month at Mannheim.

IN the meantime our readers will be interested to learn that the Defence Fund has now reached £20, and that its institution has been of material service to Mr. Schwarz in making the most satisfactory arrangements to meet the charge. A Heidelberg advocate, Dr. Müller, was employed to revise the memorial to the Public Prosecutor, and Julius Fischer, of Karlsruhe, son of Kuno Fischer, the celebrated Heidelberg philosopher, drew up a plea of justification. For the actual trial the services of Dr. Frantz, of Mannheim, have been secured, and it is possible that Julius Fischer may appear with him. The costs of the case will largely depend upon the verdict, but it will be seen that there are many other charges to be met in addition to the lawyers' fees in the main trial, and the promoters of the appeal will still welcome contributions.

WE noticed at the time the announced purchase of the Aquarium at Westminster by the Wesleyans. That rather notorious and never very profitable place of amusement has now finally closed its doors, and its transformation into a Wesleyan Church House will begin. The venture is a bold one, not only as regards the capital to be sunk in a site and buildings so valuable, but also in the light of publicity which will beat upon the new centre of religious activity. We shall unfeignedly rejoice if with this new departure a new access of religious vigour is manifested by the Wesleyans. Of course, we do not see eye to eye with them, but in all that makes for the uplifting of mankind we trust we all feel heart to heart.

THE new Archbishop of Canterbury has been described in certain quarters as a "predestinate archbishop," and The Guardian, while deprecating exaggerations of the kind, admits that the appointment of the Bishop of Winchester to the primacy was a foregone conclusion. It aptly describes the appointment as one which "has been received, if not with enthusiasm, at least with widespread satisfaction," and suggests that there was only one possible competitor. The same journal exonerates Dr. Davidson from the charge of being only a "pass" graduate —he really took "honours"—though it is admitted that he has no claims to be either a great scholar or a great theologian. He is, however, recognised as a man of much tact and sagacity, tolerant and fair-minded, and well thought of by his brethren on the episcopal bench. He is regarded as moderate in regard to ritualism, and though it is on record that his interference with a case of what he thought "illegal" practices led to Father Dolling's withdrawal from the diocese of Winchester, the High Church party appear rather hopeful as to his influence than otherwise. He has a great opportunity, and all good men will wish him well in it.

PROFESSOR HARNACK'S lectures on the real essence of the Christian religion would appear to have emboldened a good many earnest people to face the worst that modern rationalist science and criticism can advance against the traditional outworks of Christian theology. If it be true, as he maintains, that discipleship to Christ may be real and effective without, or in spite of, adherence to these traditions, it is no longer advisable to shrink from hearing all that can be said by competent teachers about them. Such, at least, seems to be the conclusion arrived at by the German Emperor, who has just attended, in a numerous and distinguished company, a lecture delivered by Professor Friedrich Delitzsch, the Assyriologist, on "Babylon and the Bible." Time was when, with characteristic thoroughness, the Emperor set his face against the disturbers of the status quo in Protestant theology; but now even the Empress, who has been credited with much zeal for orthodoxy, has, side by side with her husband, listened to statements and arguments based upon them, which would have made the goodly array of old German divines cry out with alarm for the faith.

PROFESSOR DELITZSCH (who, of course, is not Franz Delitzsch, the commentator) summed up the results of modern study on the Old Testament, which, in fact, simply represents—not a personal revelation from God—but the remnants of Jewish literature. He entered into a comparison between the Mosaic Thorah and the religious and ethical codes of Babylon, in many cases to the advantage of the latter, although these were in point of date considerably older than the Jewish legislation. He traced conceptions of the deity, which had been regarded as specially Jewish, to Babylonian origins, and, of course, pointed to the non-Jewish origin of the Sabbath. In respect to certain ethical problems, notably those affecting women, he declared the Babylonian ideals to be superior. Finally, as bearing on New Testament questions, he emphasised the importance attached by the Babylonians, in common with the Jews, to trinal combinations, and to the belief in a resurrection. He declared for that religion which is ultimately based on inward experience, and which does not rest on doubtful history or external authority. The lecture is described as having profoundly disturbed Germans in the capital—there are, however, a good many both there and in remote Universities and more ordinary circles of culture to whom there is not much here that is new. The really new thing is that an Emperor and his Court dare listen to it.

WE noted last week a New Year's sermon by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, published in the Mill Hill Pulpit, on "Will Power, the greatest of all our needs," and immediately received the New Year's number of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day, which makes a similar timely appeal. "O well for him whose will is strong" is the line which Mr. Armstrong has taken for the title of his sermon, which contrasts the rival philosophies, which are divided on the question of the reality and potency of freedom in the human will, and the consequent urgency of moral obligation. Having described that view of life which regards the idea of free will in man as a delusion, Mr. Armstrong offers the following statement of the opposite view:—

Over against this philosophy which looks on human conduct as determined by all kinds of forces beyond the man's own control, holds the power of a man over his will to be a fiction and delusion, and would have us cease to sound any call to battle and merely bid men hearken for the most winning music as they drift down the orbit of the years, there has ever stood, and stands to-day, another philosophy, often decried, often put aside as foolishness, yet ever and again rising up with new strength in prophetic souls who feel the awe of the Eternal, which makes the Individual Will the very centre and core of human life, and the court of conscience the holy of holies of the everlasting God. To this philosophy, indeed, the mystery of the power of the will is not done away. It can give no account how, in a world bound and chained under the sway of natural laws, a human being can say "I will," or I will not," and straightway carry through his will with effective power. But it knows that, mystery though it be, that is the very central fact of human life and of the constitution of man. It knows that in human affairs the action of human wills is the very crux and pivot on which the future hangs. It knows that, mystery though it be, our life consists in self-determination; it knows that, haunting him from the presence chamber of the Eternal, an awful obligation rests, binding and unescapable, on each man born into the world.

Turning from speculation to actual life, Mr. Armstrong notes how the reality of will-power and self-direction, above all in men of commanding personality who have been the makers of history, is evident and universally taken for granted, and he concludes with this forcible appeal:—

And so, for my part, this New Year's Sunday, I exhort you to make strong the Will, which is the effective, creative element in our being. Guide it by earnest Thought; inspire by fervent Feeling; but have no part or lot with that seductive philosophy which would have you hold that Thought and Feeling are all in all, and that that secred and mysterious potency which we call Will-power is nought—a figment, a delusion.

There may, indeed, be in store for us, far on in the development of the soul, some spiritual state in which the soul will without effort turn to good as the needle to the pole; but be very sure that that will never come about till, by long discipline of self-control, the will has become the obedient servant to the conscience, which is the Word of God. Do not dream that you have already attained the state in which you can trust to instinct, and preference, and inclination to keep you right with the stern and solemn law of righteousness. There is temptation to be faced and fought; there are evil solicitations to be trampled under foot; there are sloths and lethargies to be shaken off; there are prayers to be sobbed out to God. Suspect yourself when you cease to be haunted by a voice of imperious command, giving you no long ease, to rise to a higher calling. In small things and in great be a faithful taskmaster to your soul. In home, in business, in your circle of acquaintances, in your city, in your country, recognise yourself as lying under solemn obligations which only a will strong and strenuous can faithfully discharge. Let the young men, this New Year, take to themselves as motto for the year those same noble Emersonian lines:—

So near is grandeur to our dust,
So nigh is God to man;
When duty whispers low, "Thou must,"
The youth replies, "I CAN."

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

May I be allowed a little space in your columns to put before your readers some of the plans and needs of the Central Postal Mission?

The New Year naturally brings fresh claims and fresh hopes. First, may I remind all London friends of the second public religious conference and soirée to be held under the auspices of the Central Postal Mission at Essex Hall next Wednesday evening, when, after an hour's social chat and tea, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will take the chair, and a short paper will be read by the Rev. G. Critchley on the "Miraculous Element in the Four Gospels"? All who know Mr. Bowie and Mr. Critchley may be assured of a good meeting. We were pleased to see so many Postal Mission correspondents at the December soirée and conference, and hope they will come again, when more time will be allowed for the discussion of the paper. We hope also that ministers and other friends will come and help to make the evening bright and interesting.

The next point I want to touch on is the Suffolk Village Mission carried on by the Central Postal Mission. With the resignation of the Rev. A. Amey a new chapter begins; Mr. R. Newell, of Preston, is about to take charge of it, and we ask for staunch support from old friends, and for fresh support from new. Mr. R. Newell is prepared to put his whole strength into the work, and has much experience of village life and needs, and is coming forward in a spirit of faith and devotion.

No one can look on the evils of town life and the conditions of country life, the wonderful possibilities contained in it—and yet how dull and vacant, how narrow and hampered village life often actually is—without seeing the vast possibilities of usefulness that open out to educated men and women who will help to spread education, healthy amusements, useful and artistic occupations in these lonely places—make the desert blossom as the rose, and, above all, kindle the Christ-like spirit, the spirit of self-sacrifice, of love of duty and goodness, which would transfigure the life of the very humblest toiler. Surely this is a work for Unitarians to take up; and it is by the multiplication of small efforts, by getting a cottage room here, a village hall there, an iron chapel in another place, that a network will be formed which in good time will expand into something large and effective. Meantime we ask for immediate help for the known needs of our Suffolk Village Mission. At this moment our new missionary needs a small portable lantern for illustrating lectures and services, a bicycle to visit distant members of his flock, books and periodicals for men's reading-room and lending library. And there is urgent need of increased funds to maintain the work now going on. Our treasurer, Lady Wilson, 86, Church-road, Richmond, Surrey, will be glad to receive new and increased subscriptions as early in the year as possible.

I desire also to take this opportunity of thanking, on behalf of my committee, the many friends who kindly send copies of The Inquirer to Postal Mission correspondents. We repeatedly receive warm letters of thanks from those who are thus granted the privilege of reading the paper. There is just now a great demand from educated Indians who especially appreciate the newspaper; and we should be glad if more copies could be sent to them.

The call for Postal Mission work is greater than ever, not only from all parts of Great Britain, but from Africa, India, Canada is there a steady flow of letters asking for enlightenment about Unitarian principles; the responsibility which lies on Postal Mission workers is great, and we would ask near and distant friends to help us in this New Year—to help with sympathy and with money and by joining us in spreading our pure, free faith.

Florence Hill,
Hon. Sec., Central Postal Mission.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND.

The church here celebrated the first anniversary of the dedication of the first Unitarian place of worship in the colony with a bazaar on Dec. 4, 5 and 6—the first Unitarian bazaar in New Zealand. We feel that we are making history.

After every effort possible among ourselves, with the generous assistance received from home, there still remained an outstanding debt of £250. The bazaar will clear off one-half of this, and by the end of the present financial year, with the help of incoming donations, it is hoped that little more than £50 will be required to make us free of mortgage charges.

Nor is the money success all. The friendliness shown by outsiders has been extremely gratifying, and the assistance rendered by scattered members of our own household of faith up and down the North Island shows the keen interest with which our attempt in Auckland is being watched. Above and beyond every other advantage are the closer bonds of union into which the congregation itself has been drawn by this united pull, and the fresh spirit of cheerful hope which success has given to our outlook on the opening of our fourth year. It has been a revelation of what the Unitarians of Auckland can do when they try.

Our subscribers continue to increase. Our attendances vary between 150 and 200. Subsidiary organisations are taking root round the mother organisation, and the whole spirit of Church life is remarkably vigorous and healthy for a community so young and so isolated.

We feel that this is a record of three years' work of which we may justifiably be proud. Moreover, it ought to open the eyes of Unitarians in England to the opportunities afforded by the colonies, and the duties that colonisation entail. It ought to rivet their attention. Their mission is world-wide. If they would forget for a while some of their home problems in a great pitiful care for far-away seekers after truth, losing themselves in their greater mission they might find themselves stronger in their home work. They have only to follow up with energy the emigrants that are carrying the seeds of the Unitarian faith into distant lands, and greater conquests await them than they can realise. Oh for a Unitarian St. Paul! Oh for a new apostolic succession! Oh that the Unitarians of England might hear the cry of the Macedonians, "Come over and help us!"

"PLATO AND THE PORCH."

PROFESSOR HARNACK, in his lectures on "The Essence of Christianity," says that it is absolutely impossible to maintain that Jesus was ever in touch with the thoughts of "Plato and the Porch." However that may be, we ourselves are undeniably indebted "to Plato and the Porch" to an extent which, perhaps, we seldom realise. Plato is commonly regarded as the subject of the study of a special few, and the Stoics are looked upon as a sect which has long since had its day; but, as a matter of fact, their influence is still living and powerful. To say that "Plato and the Porch" still afford us a considerable part of our intellectual, moral and religious inspiration may to many seem surprising, but it appears to me to be quite reasonable, and in the following lines I have gathered together some witnesses to the truth of the assertion.

We have not summed up the influence of Plato on English minds when we have named Philo and the Fourth Gospel, the Neo-Platonists of the third century, the Cambridge Platonists, and the late Mr. Walter Pater; we have scarcely touched the fringe of the subject. All who make any pretension to a classical education must have read something of Plato, while multitudes who know no Greek have read translations of his more popular dialogues, some of which can be had for a few pence, though the majority of Englishmen have only been brought into contact with the thoughts of Plato indirectly, and without any conception from whence they came.

Emerson, who himself was steeped in Plato, gives but an imperfect idea of his all-pervading influence,—

> How many great men Nature is incessantly sending up out of night to be his men. Platonists! the Alexandrians, a constellation of genius; the Elizabethans not less; Sir Thomas More, Henry More, John Hales, John Smith, Lord Bacon, Jeremy Taylor, Ralph Cudworth, Sydenham, Thomas Taylor.

Milton says of himself,—

> Thus from the laureat fraternity of poets, riper years and the ceaseless round of study led me to the shady spaces of philosophy, but chiefly to the divine volumes of Plato and his equal Xenophon.

And these philosophers, he declared, led him to the love of knowledge and virtue.

Henry Rogers, in his life of John Howe, the prince of dissenters, quotes J. M. Mackenzie as saying of him,—

> He (Howe) was one of the many writers of his day who had studied Plato and the Alexandrian School with, perhaps, too fond a partiality; but very many of his most beautiful illustrations are either drawn direct from these writers or strongly tinctured by their phraseology.

It is a far cry from Howe to Martineau, but the latter says in one of his letters written while staying at Berlin:—

> I finished the "Republic" some time ago, and closed it with the melancholy feeling of a long leave-taking from the greatest and most delightful of all one's masters in philosophy.

Theodore Parker speaks of his acquaintance with Plato in terms which show how fully he succumbed to the magic influence of the Greek:—

> I am reading the "Phædrus." It was the first of Plato's own I ever read. Several years since, strolling about the library, I took down the volume which contained the "Phædrus." I read it in a night. I was appalled by the grandeur of the thought, by the beauty of the style. The noon of night passed before I could lay it down, and then sleep came not, for the procession of the gods, and the ideal flight of the soul, upborne on celestial wings not yet defiled by earthly stain, gazing upon the lofty countenance of truth—all this floated in my mind and kept off the drowsy god. I shall never forget that event in my life.

One comes across the thoughts of Plato in the writings of such different men as John Wesley and John Ruskin. Harnack begins his lectures on the "Essence of Christianity" with the remark, "The great English philosopher John Stuart Mill has somewhere observed that mankind cannot too often be reminded that there was once a man of the name of Socrates." And nearly thirty years ago I heard Dean Stanley lecture on Socrates to the working men of Southwark. Thus thousands and thousands of English people who perhaps have not read so much as the "Apology" or the "Phædo," even in a translation, have unknowingly been brought under the influence of Plato through the greatest English writers and preachers.

But combined with the influence of Plato is the influence, less direct, perhaps, but scarcely, if at all, less powerful, of the Stoics, through Plutarch, Cicero, Seneca, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, and Boethius. King Alfred translated the "Consolations of Philosophy" of Boethius with no little profit to himself and his people.

Dean Church says that Epictetus influenced deeply, both in form and substance, the speculations of Butler.

> "We do not know much of Butler's reading, he quotes as far as we remember Arrian's 'Epictetus' only once; but he must have been familiar with the 'Discourses,' and must have made them, to a great degree, his own thoughts."

Only about a year ago Robert Collyer preached one of his inimitable sermons on his own birthday, which was confessedly inspired by Cicero, "On Old Age."

Our literature is so saturated with the ideas of Plato and the Stoics, that it is now almost impossible to open any serious modern book, or even review, without finding some reference to them, some recognition of their living power. This is no exaggeration. Here is an illustration. Recently I received in the same parcel three current reviews, The Quarterly Review, The Journal of Theological Studies, and the Hibbert Journal (all issued in October). In each of these I met with one or other of the subjects of this article. In the Westminster Review for the same month there was also a whole paper upon a theme from Plato. There was not much in the Quarterly, but in an article on "Giordano Bruno in England" there was the inevitable reference to the influence of Plato on Bruno and the Elizabethan writers.

In the Journal of Theological Studies, Mr. C. C. J. Webb reviews at length Professor James's "Varieties of Religious Experience." In the course of his article he quotes James as saying of Marcus Aurelius:—

> There is a frosty chill about his words which you rarely find in a Jewish and never in a Christian piece of religious writing.

But Mr. Webb adds this criticism:—

> This is, indeed, to be taken with the qualification that during the history of Christendom there have been times at which the influence of Stoicism on Christian minds has been so great that religious writing has passed as Christian which was far more Stoical than Christian in its tone. Hence, the long ascendancy of the Stoic Seneca and the "Consolatio Philosophiæ" of Boethius (which is Stoical in moral tone, though not in its philosophical tenets) over Christian minds, which even believed it to be Christian. Shakespeare, who understood everything else, did not understand the Christian as distinguished from the Stoical spirit; the consolations which the disguised Duke administers to Claudio in prison in Measure for Measure, though neither consoler nor consoled question their Christian character, are, indeed, nothing less than Christian; they are purely Senecan. Even a professedly devotional writer like Jeremy Taylor often reminds us in his topics rather of the Stoic than of the Christian contemptus mundi.

Passing to the Hibbert Journal we find in Dr. Stopford Brooke's article on Matthew Arnold no less than five pages almost entirely devoted to a consideration of Stoicism. To one side of Stoicism Dr. Brooke does ample justice, though he recognises and perhaps exaggerates what he holds to be its deficiencies. But the spirit of Stoicism lived in Arnold as it has done and does still in some of the noblest men.

> The Stoic demand for obedience to the eternal laws of right was always with him. It often fills his poems with austere beauty. It keeps much of its dignity, even in poems where he winds round and round himself like a serpent round the witch it loves. So far he was pure Stoic.

And even that is not all—for in the same Hibbert Journal we find Dr. Percy Gardner saying,—

> Our theology must be prepared to advance and to aspire until it conforms to what is loftiest and most severe in the suggestions of modern science as well as the highest results of the ideal philosophy which Plato founded and the passionate aspirations of the Hebrew Psalmists and other great religious poets of the past.

It was the fashion, not so long ago, to say that we were indebted to the Greeks for almost everything, except religion; but much of our religion also, I venture to say, comes from them, and we have more in common with them than with any other people. The late Mr. J. R. Green (the historian) confessed that he felt nearer to the age of Pericles than to that of Dunstan. The reason is that we have inherited a large part of our religion from the Greeks; this is admitted by Catholics (who do not call it religion), if it is ignored or denied by Evangelicals and insufficiently appreciated by liberal Christians. Mr. W. S. Lilly states the Catholic view thus,—

> The ethical precepts of Christianity are independent of its mysteries. As a matter of fact they have been largely derived from non-Christian sources. Jesus Christ left no code of ethics. . . . And when, in the expanding Christian Society, the need arose for a scientific synthesis, recourse was had to the great philosophers of Greece; to Aristotle and Plato; to the Stoics and the Epicureans. It is to the inexhaustible fountain of wisdom opened by Hellenic thought, that we owe the clearness, the precision, the wealth of psychological analysis which characterise the ethical teaching of the great medieval schoolmen and their modern continuators.

It would be comparatively easy to add other testimonies to the abiding influence of Plato and the Stoics which go to prove that even those who have not themselves been to the fountain have at least drunk of the stream; but it is necessary to bring these random notes to an end, for the subject broadens as I proceed, and I cannot do better than give as a final example a passage from Martineau's essay, "A Plea for Biblical Studies and Something More," quoted by Dr. Drummond in the "Life and Letters":—

"I well remember (perhaps it is only a personal confession which I make) the half guilty feeling, with which in young and fervent days, I found myself surprised into passionate admiration of the story of Socrates, and taken captive by words that seemed to me of unspeakable religious depth in Plato, or even in Cicero or Seneca. I accused myself of an unchristian perversity — a want of Evangelical simplicity and humbleness—because often Greek and Roman history stirred the tides within me more than the image of Galilean Apostles; because the struggle for Hellenic freedom appeared more sacred than the conquest of idolatrous Canaan, and Leonidas nobler than Gideon; because, read what I might in favour of a general resurrection in the body, the "Phædon" tempted me to hope rather for the immortality of the soul."

During the early Christian centuries in many cases something like an adequate recognition existed of the splendid contributions made to both religion and ethics by the teachers of the ancient world before Christ; but, generally speaking, since the Reformation and amongst the Evangelicals more particularly they have not received anything like their due. Now that we are freeing ourselves from the contracted ideas of an uncultured Protestantism, and are evolving a Christianity, which, to use Theodore Parker's description, is neither Catholic nor Protestant, we find to our delight how much we have in common with Plato and the Stoics, perhaps, indeed, because they have been our unacknowledged teachers all the time.

WALTER LLOYD.

AT HAND.

THE reign of God! His light and love and joy,
In glad consent I take His guiding hand,
In the bright sunshine where I live and move,
This quickening impulse is His kind command.

In Him I am. In Him I move and live;
He lives and moves and loves and is in me:
Direct my thoughts, dear Father, let me give
My heart, my voice, my strength, my all, to Thee.

Yes, when I choose, I hear my Father's voice,
His word my conscience, and His joys my joys!
Among the children of the King I stand;
My God is here. His kingdom is at hand!

LITERATURE.

HUMAN SIN AND DIVINE EVOLUTION.*

THE worst part of this book is its title, and we venture, at the head of this review, to suggest a happier one. The author's own title, as given below, labours to describe the book's contents, and does, in part, succeed therein. But it is not attractive; and this excellent little treatise, like some delightful children we have all known, suffers from being unhappily christened. A kindlier name would win for it more readers, and it deserves many.

When one who has read little or nothing for many years on the subject herein discussed lights on a volume so clearly and thoughtfully written as this, he is surprised to find how much that is of vital interest remains to be said on a theme so old and worn. The writer's purpose is to show that the doctrine of the creeds concerning "Original Sin" must be reconsidered, and, indeed, surrendered, and that this may be done without offence to "Holy Scripture" and without injury to the "Christian doctrines of Grace and Redemption." The first part of this purpose is successfully achieved; the second part, though bravely attempted, leaves us unconvinced. The book, indeed, is one that should raise in the minds of those hitherto content with the generally accepted doctrine of human sin and divine deliverance many noble doubts, and it opens the way—though apparently its author does not see this—into that large freedom of faith where theories that so often "bind the wise" no more obtain.

Mr. Tennant admits that, almost without exception, "the starting-point of Christian theology" has hitherto been "the doctrine of hereditary guilt and sin, through the fall of Adam." He proceeds to show that this doctrine can no longer be defended. His criticism of the arguments of its numerous expounders and apologists, from Augustine to Schleiermacher and Ritschl, is singularly effective and just. The explanations, both of ecclesiastical dogmatists and of speculative philosophers are shown to be alike untenable; they are all hopelessly irrational or painfully immoral. He then proceeds to give us, in the third and fourth chapters, his own theory of the "Origin and Propagation of Sin." He does not claim for this theory that it is entirely new; and, indeed, his quotations from Professor Pfleiderer and Archdeacon Wilson contain the essential truth of all that is here set forth. But the writer's statement and solution of the problem, from his own point of view, may claim, if not originality, yet great clearness and conciseness of thought, as well as aptness and felicity of illustration.

The problem, hitherto so unyielding to all attempts at solution, arises, we are told, from "the difficulty of reconciling the two propositions that, on the one hand, evil is so universal as to suggest a common origin for the sinfulness of the whole race, independently of the self-determination of its individual members; whilst, on the other hand, our sense of guilt demands that each one is 'the Adam of his own soul.'" (P. 79.) Since every human being goes wrong, more or less, and "none is good, no, not one," why should any human being feel himself guilty because he, like all the rest, goes wrong? Instead of resorting to any of the old theories which vainly attempted to meet the difficulty, Mr. Tennant proposes, and answers in the affirmative, the following questions: "Can we find the ground of the possibility and occasion for sin in our natural constitution regarded as the perfectly normal result of a process of development through which the race has passed previously to the acquisition of full moral responsibility; and can we assign the rise of evil itself simply to the difficulty of the task which has to be encountered by every individual person alike, the task of enforcing his inherited organic nature to obey a moral law which he has only gradually been enabled to discern?" (P. 81.) That is to say, let us turn to evolution for help out of our difficulty. The theologian will call in modern science to aid him in the solution of this ancient problem of moral evil. It is then found that the sense of sin in man is but the consciousness of imperfection—an imperfection such as every stage in a process of development necessarily involves. Moral insight or feeling once aroused, moral evil becomes the inevitable accompaniment of that growth in goodness by which he rises from a lower to a higher plane of spiritual life.

In this book, then, the central doctrine of evolution is freely accepted; the idea of a once-perfect moral being is given up, and with it, of course, the notion that one man's sin involved the whole race in guilt; the story of the "Fall" is interpreted as a "fall from innocence," which, "in another sense, is a rise to a higher grade of being"; morality is a "social creation"; man's physical nature, "necessarily endowed with instincts, appetites and impulses, contains abundance of raw material for the production of sin, as soon as these native propensities are brought into relation with any restraining or condemning influence." These propensities "belong to man as God made him, and are to be controlled in proportion as the moral law becomes the more exacting, because the more elaborately developed." Hence there is "no need to marvel at the universality of sin"; its various forms are the result of the "self-assertion of powerful tendencies, with all their priority in time and fixity in instinct or habit, after the acquisition of a 'higher nature' which demands their subordination to less immediate and tangible ends." "To the evolutionist sin is not an innovation, but is the survival or misuse of habits and tendencies that were incidental to an earlier stage of development, and whose sinfulness lies in their anachronism." (Pp. 92, 3.) So far all is clear. But only one part of the difficulty is thus surmounted; another and greater remains. Evil, or moral imperfection, as a universal experience, is accounted for; but the sense of guilt—the remorse or shame in the individual, because of his own moral imperfection—what is the meaning of this? If "sin" pertains to the race, and therefore to every member of it, and is an inevitable condition of the struggle between a higher and lower nature, why should anyone feel himself guilty? Why should there be any need of "atonement," or even of "forgiveness," in the theological significance of the term? The chapter in which Mr. Tennant wrestles with this difficulty must be read in order to be fully appreciated. It is deeply interesting, but, to the present writer, entirely unconvincing. The interest lies in the fact that we perceive here a mind of great intelligence and strong integrity wrestling with a problem of profound human experience which, apart from complete freedom from all ecclesiastical restraints, must remain hopelessly entangled and endlessly perplexing. His argument is that of one who, having freed himself from a great fundamental error of theological doctrine, is still hampered by his attachment to the authority of "Holy Scripture" and his desire not to break with the formulated creeds of the Church.

From the point of view of evolution "sin" is found to be imperfect development—the necessarily incomplete triumph of the higher over the lower nature of man.

> Man, as a sentient being, endowed with instincts and impulses, inevitably possesses propensities which belong to him not at all as a fallen and corrupted being, but as a man, and which must of necessity involve him, from the time that his moral life begins, in a lasting series of struggles and efforts, if he is to order himself as a rational being in accordance with the requirements of an ideal, or a moral law." (P. 98.)

Sin thus appears as something at once universal and inevitable to the finite human creature. But Mr. Tennant checks himself here, and falls back on the phrase "universal possibility of sin"; the inevitableness of it must not be allowed to pass. For such doctrines as the "exceeding sinfulness of sin," the "Perfect Holiness of God," the "sinlessness of Christ" (though he himself said, "Why callest thou me good; none is good save one, that is God"), the need of "Atonement," and the "Redemption by Divine Grace," will, by such admission, be seriously threatened. If sin, that is imperfect development, is inevitable in the world, as man finds it, and as God made it, these doctrines, or some of them at least, may begin to seem precarious and no longer essential to man's fuller and higher development. It is found necessary, therefore, at some stage of the evolutionary movement, to separate God from a part of the human world, to give man absolute freedom of choice, and to contend that some of the evil things which happen are only "incidental" to the divine plan; and in relation to these man, though still but an imperfectly developed creature, is wholly responsible and absolutely guilty, and in need of that "spiritual Grace" which a properly constituted "plan of salvation" provides. "Responsibility for the possibility of moral evil, and for the opportunities for its realisation, lies with God; responsibility for the actuality of moral evil lies with man." "In the interests of Christian theodicy it is necessary to insist upon two essential points. One of these is the independence of the finite human will, or, in other words, the adoption of a Monism which includes a Pluralism; and the other is the postulate that much which belongs to the divine world-plan belongs to it only incidentally, as a necessary accompaniment or by-product, without being in itself a divine end at all." (Pp. 119, 124). This view does, undoubtedly explain much, if only we can accept it; and it is a view which is strongly held by such thinkers as Professor Wm. James of Harvard and Professor Howison of California. But to some minds the postulate that requires us to believe that "necessary accompaniments of a divine world-plan" belong to it only "incidentally," or, as it were, by the chance-volition of certain finite individuals, is one that can never afford either intellectual repose or moral satisfaction.

Yet, however we may judge of the argument and conclusion of this book, it is impossible not to find in it a "sign of the times." It is a manly effort to deal with a great problem from a philosophical and ethical point of view; and it shows how men within the Church, and still holding by the creeds of a bygone age, are striving to see and to interpret the doctrines of religion in the light of that fuller knowledge and wider intelligence to which the modern world has attained. And we cannot doubt that such thinkers are helping both to destroy and to construct more wisely than they know.

QUESTIONS FOR REFORMERS*

THIS book is dedicated to the People of New Zealand, but it may be cordially recommended to the study of the People of England. At the present moment the questions with which it deals hardly seem within the range of practical politics, but many earnest hearts will feel that these are political questions which ought to be practical, which are ripe for discussion as matter of vital interest to the community at large, questions on which information ought to be diligently collected, and on which the thoughts of our wisest statesmen ought to be exercised.

Mr. Flürscheim is a disciple of Henry George, but a disciple who wishes to avoid the two great mistakes made by his master. Politics and Economics are alike deeply indebted to "Progress and Poverty." The book showed that Progress on present lines will never abolish Poverty, and that it throws enormous obstacles in the way of other agencies, such as Christianity, permanently relieving want. It also proved, beyond every possible doubt, that the difficulty is due to human arrangements which can be modified, not to natural laws which cannot be altered. This it did by calling adequate attention to the overwhelming importance of the monopoly possessed by the owners of a nation's land. But when Henry George maintained that a nation might justly resume possession of its land without paying full compensation to the present land-owners, he switched off the whole motive force for obtaining land nationalisation into the side issue of a policy condemned by the average conscience as unrighteous, and by the plain man as absurd. I have often wondered whether others have had an experience corresponding to my own. Some sixteen years ago I gave an address in favour of land nationalisation to the Southampton Radical Association. In the discussion which followed every speaker made it abundantly evident that the only thing he cared about was to get the land without giving compensation, and that any scheme for effecting the object in the course of years by utilising the superior credit of the State would fail to meet with popular support. I left the meeting with the conviction that nothing would be done in the way of land nationalisation for the next thirty years, a conviction which subsequent events have failed to modify. In the next place, Henry George committed an equally grievous mistake when he substituted his "Single Tax" (levied on land values) for a comprehensive scheme which would make the nation real owner of its land. Mr. Flürscheim sees and avoids both these errors. He makes a most powerful appeal to a young community, such as exists in New Zealand, to take a step which would obviate more misery and secure more happiness for the future inhabitants of the country than any other political measure conceivable. Some of us think it would be most efficacious here. But how many of our M.P.'s or candidates for Parliamentary honours ever study the subject or explain it to the electors?

Nevertheless, our author's most telling illustrations are taken from what we are now doing, and leaving undone, in Ireland. Under the Ashbourne Act, the State is taking possession of large slices of territory. Full compensation is paid to the owners, while the tenants, in return for an annual payment amounting to three-quarters of their old rents, will obtain the freehold of their farms in forty-six years. This operation costs the State nothing. So easy is it to nationalise the land without injuring anyone. But in Ireland we are not nationalising the land—only making a present to the first set of tenants. Thus, one man bought the farm he cultivated for £550 and immediately sold it for £970, a second bought for £538 and was able to sell for £1,280, a third bought for £755 and sold for £1,725. That is to say, three tenants receive a free gift from the credit of the State amounting to £3,975. Meanwhile nothing is being done for the tenants on the other side of the hedge. On the Dillon estate they get every advantage, for the owner is willing to sell. On the neighbouring De Freyne estate the old rents have to be paid and are nothing but annual rents, for the owner is unwilling to sell. This is the way we try to convince Ireland of the advantage she derives from having her legislation done at Westminster. Let it not be supposed for one moment that the advantages of land nationalisation are practically secured by a peasant proprietorship, or will be promoted by free trade in land. The evidence from France adduced in this book is very striking. There are now no more cultivators of the soil who are also the owners of what they till than there were before the French Revolution. Of all landlords the mere capitalist landowner is the worst. He buys for an investment, and recognises none of the ancient duties of his position.

Another subject of great interest treated in this book is the question of money. Here, again, is something which ought to be practical politics. The well-being of millions is concerned, and the matter is one which is distinctly within the sphere of human legislation. The question ought to be discussed at every election and to decide the fate of Ministries. Under present conditions prices are estimated in gold; they represent the value of other commodities in relation to gold. But those prices are not determined by a simple ratio between the amount of gold coinage and the amount of other commodities in existence. Two further factors are concerned: (1) The rapidity with which the coins circulate, hoarded coin has no influence on price; and (2) The extent to which goods are purchased on credit. In civilised countries a comparatively small amount of gold serves as the basis of a very much larger amount of credit. Goods are paid for with promises to pay for them in gold, and so long as people are content not to require the fulfilment of these promises all goes well. But when credit is shaken, with or without cause, that is, when a larger demand than usual is made for these promises to be fulfilled, then comes disaster and widespread misery, because the fall in prices, or the rise in the value of gold, may be enormous when gold alone is called upon to take the place which has previously been taken by gold plus credit. Credit, therefore, in its usual form, is by no means an ideal supplement to gold in the determination of prices. Gold plus promises to pay in gold gives us a money which cannot be trusted to possess a stable value. Moreover, it is not satisfactory for industry to be at the mercy of fresh discovery of gold-mines, or of those individuals who happen to secure possession of them, or of "Rings" who manage to make a "corner in gold." At best, gold is a very expensive form of money. Money is required to discharge two functions: to be a medium of exchange, and to be a common measure of value.

A tailor wants a table. Without money, he would not only have to find someone who wants the coat he has made, but he who wants a coat must have a table to sell, and the coat and table must be of the same value, before a fair exchange can be made. With the aid of money the tailor sells his coat to one man, buys his table of another, and adjusts any difference in value between the two articles. But money need not be gold. It may be paper stamped by the State, and made legal tender by Act of Parliament. The one danger which has then to be avoided is the over-issue or under-issue of these notes. The amount of paper money put in circulation must be so regulated that contracts, salaries, &c., shall have a steady value. Those who have to pay ought not to be favoured one year, and those who receive another year.

This function is most imperfectly discharged by gold, and still more imperfectly by gold plus credit; but is it really beyond the power of economic science to suggest a better form of money, less expensive and more stable? By no means. An admirable system has been set forth and supported by Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace, among others, according to which the amount of paper money in circulation would be automatically regulated by the average price of commodities. The amount of money would increase as prices fell and diminish as they rose, and thus prices would be kept at a steady level exactly in the same way as a governor keeps a steady speed on a steam-engine. There may be objections to such a scheme, but it is difficult to believe that they would be insuperable after the scheme itself was thoroughly well understood; and the advantage to the community of its adoption would hardly be less than the advantages of Land Nationalisation, while the good results would be far more quickly felt.

These are the sort of questions which really do concern the welfare of a nation, and which come within the sphere of politics. But it will be a long while before we deal with them practically in this country, however it may be in New Zealand. Our consolation must be that while we make so bad a use as we do of many of the material advantages which, as a nation, we enjoy, it is, perhaps, well that we should leave to a future generation any further advantages of the same kind which might be secured by wise statesmanship.

PASCAL.*

WE fear we have been mistaken. It was only on reading the book that we were undeceived. We might fear that we had also been "quite imposed upon," if we were to allow ourselves the use of Dr. Clark's version of the celebrated opening words of Pascal's "Provincials." We do not question Dr. Clark's learning, it is amply guaranteed on the title-page. We lay the blame for both Home and Colonial productions of this kind on the "ordinary reader," "for whom this book is intended." Yet when we think of Principal Tulloch's "Pascal" in the "Foreign Classics" Series, and remember that he was not above using Dr. M'Crie's "spirited" translation of the "Provincials," we almost repent us of this judgment. But it may be doubted whether "ordinary readers" were contemplated in the expression "for English readers." The "ordinary reader" (like "the average man"), who is either an "ideal entity" or a "real non-entity," is responsible for much of the heavy, flabby, slipshod, irresponsible promiscuousness that finds ready shelter under some wide-spreading, high-sounding title of a series. The "ordinary reader" cares little for grammatical correctness, for accuracy of statement, or for precision of language. And he is not generally worried with these things when your "learned doctors" take a siesta under cover of a "World—Something" Series, and are caught more than napping. The best is not good enough for an ordinary reader, and it is rarely supplied. He is not likely to appreciate irony of any kind, least of all Pascal's, which Dr. Clark tells him is sometimes "almost sweet and again bitter." We have heard of delicious irony, but never aught like this. Even the ordinary reader would be tempted to ask, with unconscious irony, what had happened to this much belauded fine thing on its way into English. For the most part it puts in no appearance at all, and when it does it comes in limping and mutilated. The book, of course, is avowedly a compilation. Many people speak for themselves here in all manner of English. Also "in this present volume Pascal chiefly speaks for himself." As some philosopher once remarked about some other alleged "facts," if it were so it would be so. But we are convinced that not even in English would Pascal have so spoken. The whole of the first "Provincial" is given bodily, so that, "in this one case at least, the reader may judge of the great qualities by which the writer is distinguished." The ordinary reader, being so competent a judge of great qualities, may be safely left to his fate. And we need not fear over much for the fate of Pascal. "Generally speaking," said a German sage of the eighteenth century, giving vent to a happy thought, or what he solemnly calls a "vernünftiger Gedank," "we should have no sundials if we had no sun." Following gratefully in the footsteps of so weighty an authority we cannot avoid giving vent to a similar reflection and saying, that generally speaking we should have no bad translations if we had no translations at all. The only comfort, however, which one can derive from such a reflection is in applying it to the forlorn futility of "what might have been." We try to extract a more solid comfort from the conviction that some translations "hadn't ought to be," and we are persuaded that this is one of them. Remarkable liberties have been taken even with the paragraphing. Reckless of grammar, of shades of meaning, of ordinary literary grace (no less than five "so's" being sown in six lines), the first paragraph opens thus:—

Sir, he begins [there are no inverted commas], we were quite imposed upon. It was only yesterday that I was undeceived. Until then I thought that the subject of the disputes in the Sorbonne were very important and highly momentous for religion. So many meetings of a company so celebrated as the Faculty of Theology of Paris, in which so many things have occurred so extraordinary and unprecedented, make us conceive so high an idea of the proceedings that it is impossible to believe that they did not relate to something quite extraordinary.

A little further on, "se défier du contraire" is translated "to get rid of the contrary opinion," and so turning the sentence into the very opposite of what it says, and reducing the whole to nonsense. The vagaries of a bull in a china shop are innocent compared with the effects of a heavy hand in the following exquisite lace-work of a sentence, in which Pascal puts the finishing touch to his first letter, and in which the opalescent quality of his irony is seen at its richest; the scholastic, philosophic, literal, and common-sense meanings are intermingled, first one and then the other sparkling out and wakening humour till we can almost hear at this distance of time the rippling laughter that shook Paris and the world.

The sentence is, and it is the Jesuits who are speaking:—

Il faut, me dirent tous ensemble, dire que tous les justes ont le pouvoir prochain, en faisant abstraction de tout sens: abstrahendo à sensu thomistarum et à sensu aliorum theologorum.

This is translated:—

"It is necessary," they answered all together, "to say that all the just have proximate power without attaching a meaning to the words: Abstrahendo a sensu Thomistarum et a sensu aliorum Theologorum."

No wonder, therefore, the translator stumbles so desperately in the next sentence, "'That is to say,' I remarked 'in leaving them (the Jesuits) 'that one must pronounce this word with the lips for fear of bearing the name of heretic.'" This is supposed to translate the sentence "C'est-à-dire, leur dis-je en les quittant, qu'il faut prononcer ce mot des lèvres de peur d'être hérétique de nom." The whole point turns on the "new and unknown" ("unfamiliar" writes Dr. Clark) word prochain: "the heretic of a name," therefore, is what is meant and what is said, whilst the play upon the ordinary meaning of the phrase "de nom" is obvious. The minor slips of translation in this first short letter are endless. Why, after uniformly translating "le juste" by "the just," elsewhere, is it suddenly and most inappropriately rendered "His elect" on page 92? Why is a whole sentence left out on page 90? What does it mean to "pass a river"? To reply with perfect "coolness" is a very different thing from replying "coldly." To reduce your enemies to silence is a very different thing from "bringing them all over," as Dr. Clark translates "réduire." The French, no doubt, called certain people Indifférents, but we know them as Neutrals.

A sentence from the Preface purports to be translated from M. Suarès, and says: "The writings of Pascal are the finest that France possesses; yet they contain nothing of equal value with the Life of Pascal written by his sister in a few pages." This is more likely to be a perversion than a version of what M. Saurès wrote. Anyhow, it clearly says what it does not mean. Further on in the body of the book we stumbled over another statement of someone who is made to "speak for himself," and this time we rubbed our eyes and asked, "is visions about?" A writer is made to say, referring to Pascal's Letters, "those letters which by their agreement and the pure truth which they contain" . . . . Now it does not require even Lord Macaulay's schoolboy to tell us that this is "a howler"; anybody's schoolboy would wager seas and hills of gold that the word in the French text is "agrément," and none but the brave amongst schoolboys, regardless of their doom, would have offered the schoolmaster such a charming opportunity of bringing impending punishment into fitting agreement with the offence. There would be a total absence of "agrément" in the experience. We conclude, however, as we began, by tracing the cause of many surprises in this book to the "ordinary reader" and the "average man." They are the vice of the age. Their wants are the plausible excuse for the creation of an infinite series of Series. They are the corrupters of literature. And Merlin is enticed from his stronghold in Toronto and weakly flirts with this Vivien of modern literature. He wears his weight of learning all too lightly.

SHORT NOTICES.

Who's Who, 1903. Two years ago this indispensable annual biographical dictionary ran to 1,234 pages, and still contained a number of useful tables, academical, ecclesiastical, political and legal, which are now crowded out, all save that of the Royal Family and the inevitable obituary record, to make room for the growing number of biographical entries, which aim at telling in the concisest manner what one wants to know about everybody who is anybody. Now the pages of the dictionary number 1,532, and it is astonishing how many distinguished and interesting people there are in the world. Those included belong chiefly to this country, but we find also particulars of such men as Dr. Edward Everett Hale, and the President of the United States. Among the particulars given are Recreations, of which the President puts first "Ranching and big-game hunting on the great plains and in the Rocky Mountains." Dr. Hale has Publications, but no Recreations. (A. and C. Black. 5s. net.)

The English Woman's Year Book and Directory, 1903. This admirable compendium of information as to those things which chiefly concern the interests and occupations of women is edited by Miss Emily Janes, organising secretary to the National Union of Women Workers. Here may be found particulars as to the employments open to women, both professional and industrial, and their opportunities of work for the public service, philanthropy and religion. There is some record of women's contributions to science, literature and art, and much else of interest not to women alone. Under "Religion" and the place of women in church government, we find an admirably concise and accurate note on Unitarians. (A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.)

Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities, edited by John Lane, is an annual giving particulars of the multitudinous charities in alphabetical order, very useful for reference. (Chatto and Windus. 1s. 6d.)

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"The True Hero is the Helper."

PERHAPS the story I am going to tell you will explain the meaning of this saying. It is about one who began to try to help when he was young, and, because he got into the way of helping he was able to serve his country when the chance came, and in gratitude men called him "the Christian Patriot," that is, not only one who loved and served his country, but one who served it after the fashion of Christ. It is a great matter to get into the way of helping; it is the secret of all noble lives.

About sixty-eight years ago Thomas Starr King was a boy of fifteen, the son of a Unitarian minister in Charlestown, Massachusetts. He was clever, and had always worked hard at school—"a boy of great promise," said all his friends, and he had a prospect before him which filled him with joy. He was just about to go to college, and to do so had been his wish for years, when, suddenly, his father died and his mother and little brothers and sisters needed all the help he could give them. What was to be done? Not to waste time in grieving over lost hopes. Straightway, he took a place as a clerk, and how hard he did work all day to earn money as his mother's helper! and she found she could depend on this boy of hers, who was her great comfort.

In the evenings he used to study, and so hard did he work that scholarly men who had known and loved his father saw he was a young student worth helping, and lent him books, and taught his mind to grow so fast, that by the time he was a man, though he had had no regular college training, he passed his examination and was ordained a minister. You must know that this youth had a great longing to tell people who seemed willing to lead poor, mean lives about the grand ideals they might keep in view and live up to; to tell them that before every human being God set the aim of trying to grow more and more like Christ. To preach these grand thoughts made him eloquent; and because there were many great wrongs in the world he spoke out bravely against them, and men saw that he was always true to conscience and right principle himself and learned from him to be true and bold in helping on the right. You know it is by what they are more than by what they say that people shed a good influence about them, and so it came about that wherever Starr King went people were the better for being in his company.

After he had preached for some time in Boston he was invited as minister to a new church in San Francisco, in California. California, as we all remember, is a vast tract of country lying on the South Pacific coast, and now one of the largest States in the American Union. Miners from the gold-fields and rough emigrants camping out round San Francisco flocked to his church to hear the young minister whose earnestness made him eloquent, and very soon a great field of work lay before him. You have heard of the great struggle in America when the slave-holding States in the South broke away from their union with the free North and fierce war swept over the land. The question arose, would the huge State of California, far away in the West, keep true to freedom and the North, or join the slave-holders of the South.

Starr King knew that he was called by God to be a helper on the right side; that he must waken in the hearts of the people in that huge country a love of freedom and justice, and urge them to stand firm to the law of right within them. By day and night he went far and wide addressing great crowds of people and preaching a mighty crusade againt slavery. California was a "border State," and was not required to send troops to the war; but by his appeals he awakened mercy in the hearts of the people and raised half a million dollars to be sent from California for the hospitals and for nurses for the wounded soldiers; and by his efforts California was saved to the Union. It is said he taught not only loyalty and patriotism, but preached Christianity to the people of that land. Sometimes his life was in danger among the riotous crowds athirst for war, but he had a wonderful power over the swaying, excited listeners, and the gospel of peace and goodwill which he taught spread on every side. He had worn himself out by the time this labour was at an end, and at only forty years of age was called away to be a helper in another world. As he lay dying he looked at his friends, and pointing upwards said, "I see a great future before me. It already looks grand and beautiful." This was how Starr King gained the name of "the Christian Patriot of California." The people called one of their great mountains after him, hoping that this would help, in future years, to keep alive the memory of the hero who had lived and died among them.

THE UNITARIAN DENOMINATION.

THE tributes of admiration and gratitude and high praise rendered to the memory of Dr. MARTINEAU since the appearance of the two volumes of his "Life and Letters" have brought some measure of generous recognition also to the religious community, known as the Unitarian body, to which by birth he belonged, and of which, to the end of his long life, he was the most distinguished representative. Dr. FAIRBAIRN, in his article in the current number of the Contemporary Review, having spoken of the pre-eminent service rendered to England by another small community, that of the Society of Friends, goes on to recognise similar service, though in a less degree, rendered by "The Unitarian societies" to the higher life of the country. "They have not preserved their early faith," Dr. FAIRBAIRN says, "but they have maintained and indeed augmented their early enthusiasm for humanity, so that we may say that just as they have ceased to emphasise traditional dogmas they have emphasised moral qualities, patriotic, and public service."

And Dr. JOHN WATSON, in his article in the Hibbert Journal, from which we also quoted last week, having referred to Dr. MARTINEAU'S description of his teachers in Manchester College, at York, proceeds as follows :—

> We therefore obtain a most favourable idea both of the intellectual and spiritual qualities of Unitarian Christianity during the first half of last century, and I do not know there is any reason to believe that it has declined since that day. The impression left upon the mind by Martineau's life is, that if he stood higher than his brethren in holding a sounder philosophy and in having a broader outlook, as well as presenting a character of quite peculiar elevation, the ministers and people of his denomination are partakers in measure of the same intellectual culture, and followers of the same lofty ideals. It is said that the Unitarian denomination is decreasing, and the idea is conveyed that they do not desire to increase as an organised body; there are those who prophesy that within a measurable time they will cease to exist. If so, it is earnestly to be hoped that they will not disappear from history before they have made the other Churches heirs of their moral integrity and their love of truth.

Of these words of praise and friendly valediction the Unitarian Denomination need not be ashamed. We do not quote them from any desire to publish our own praises abroad, but partly to make acknowledgment of their friendliness, and partly to set before ourselves the ideal, in the pursuit of which we are called to be worthy of a great tradition. We can the more readily contemplate the qualities of public service and the love of truth, as attributed to our people, because the very essence of their virtue is in self-forgetfulness, and it is in such single-hearted loyalty and devoted service that we desire more and more to be strengthened.

But when we come to the concluding sentences above quoted from Dr. WATSON there is something more to say. "It is said that the Unitarian denomination is decreasing," and that before long Unitarians as a separate people will cease to exist. That is an ancient myth of quite astonishing persistence. It was current, we believe, a hundred years ago, and strange to say, as a people, we are not dead yet! Thankfully, indeed, will we share with other Churches whatever moral integrity or love of truth we may possess, but they must not wait for our demise.

And yet there is a sense in which "as a denomination" we are ready at once to cease to exist—that is to say, if our Free Churches, the homes of a living spiritual faith, may lose their isolated life and enter into a larger fellowship in which the sectarian divisions of the past shall be forever left behind.

What is at the root of such impression as Dr. WATSON has gained may perhaps be indicated by another quotation from his article in the Hibbert Journal. He has spoken of a possible narrowness in Unitarian theology, and of MARTINEAU'S protest against the binding of any Unitarian dogma upon the Churches, and proceeds :—

> He had a horror of sectarianism, and considered that it would be an irony of history if Unitarians, who had protested for liberty of thought in the past, and had suffered at the hand of orthodoxy, should set up an orthodoxy of their own, and bind it more or less firmly upon their members. "I know nothing here in England of any Unitarian Church," he once said, "and if there were such a thing I would not belong to it." He was a Unitarian in a theological sense, but in an ecclesiastical, never. No religious teacher of the nineteenth century was so absolutely delivered from dogmatic bias and denominational prejudices, or followed with a more unwavering and fearless step
> "The high white star of truth."

Thus Dr. WATSON clearly recognises MARTINEAU'S position, and we may emphasise it by adding here some sentences from a letter written in 1891, in which MARTINEAU refers to his proposals for the better organisation of our Churches, on a uniform and undogmatic basis, and what he feared was a dominant tendency making in an opposite direction. Thus he wrote :—

> It is too plain that the historical descendants of those old Nonconformists have simply slipped down from a Trinitarian orthodoxy into a Unitarian orthodoxy, and have lost all appreciation of the catholicity indispensable to a Christian Church, as well as of the rules of moral order and spiritual qualifications essential to the efficient working of every religious organisation. To the formation of a Unitarian Church by combining our societies of similar theology, I greatly prefer their scattered and unorganised condition; and from such a Church I should have openly to secede.

From that humiliation we have happily been spared, and we do not believe that any successful attempt will ever be made in this country to organise a "Unitarian Church" on any sectarian and dogmatic basis. We must maintain our Free Churches and the principle of a catholic fellowship. The truth by which as Unitarians we are possessed is making its way, we are well assured, among thinking people in all Churches but the hopelessly retrograde; not perhaps exactly in the form in which we hold it, for there is a larger Truth towards which they and we alike must advance, and that must be our great desire. What we ask is to be led in the path which looks ever towards the light. And whether the churches in which we as Unitarians worship "increase as an organised body" or not, is not our chief concern. That they are to live and bear a fearless testimony in the coming time, as in the past, we are convinced, whether as a "Unitarian denomination" or in a larger fellowship. They and the truth with which they are entrusted are marked not for death but for life; but the true life of Churches as of individuals is not in self-seeking, but in self-forgetfulness, and we would set our work for the Kingdom of GOD and our testimony to divine Truth above any denominational interest. Thus we may face the future undismayed by any who are eager to sing our requiem, knowing in Whom we trust, and that as He determines it, we shall be used in His service.

THE Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham, Professor W. J. Ashley (formerly Professor in Harvard and Fellow at Lincoln College, Oxford), will begin a course of lectures at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday next, at five o'clock, and continue them weekly at the same hour and day. The subject of Professor Ashley's course (which is given as the Dunkin Lecture in Sociology) will be "The Organisation of Labour as exemplified in certain leading industries of Great Britain and the United States," the special trades dealt with being those of coal, iron, and steel. Incidentally the effect of the "Trust Movement" on the organisation of labour will be discussed, as well as the bearing of recent legal decisions affecting trades unionism.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL AT LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.

THE memorial to Dr. Martineau, which has been placed in Little Portland-street Chapel, the scene of his London ministry from 1858 to 1872, was unveiled at a special service held last Saturday afternoon. A large congregation assembled, which included Dr. Martineau's three surviving children and other members of the family, a number of his old students (four of whom took part in the service), as well as members of the congregation at the time of his ministry. The Memorial was unveiled by Miss Henrietta Busk, who had acted as treasurer of the memorial fund, on behalf of the donors (and it is interesting to note that her father, as a lay-student of Manchester College, was one of Martineau's fellow-students at York).

The Memorial, which is placed on the wall to the left of the Communion table facing the congregation, between the central memorial to the late Rev. Edward Tagart and the vestry, is a bas-relief in white marble, by Mr. Hope Pinker, and represents a side view of the upper part of the statue of Dr. Martineau in the Manchester College Library, at Oxford. The face is seen in profile, and gives the impression of being just life-size, while so much of the statue is represented as to show the hands holding a book. The likeness is unmistakable, and the work is of great beauty. The bas-relief is enclosed in a square frame of coloured marble, harmonising with the general decoration of the chapel, the lower slab being so far widened as to give room for the following inscription :—

To the Revered Memory of James Martineau, Minister in this Chapel, 1858-1872 :

A Student and Teacher of Philosophy, he made it the helper of Religion ;
He read God's thought in nature, and His law of right within man's heart ;
Caring for the young and ignorant, he devoted great gifts to their instruction,
And he strove to unite the Churches in the freedom of the Spirit of Christ.

Born at Norwich, April 21st, 1805 ; Died in London, January 11th, 1900.

The service opened with the reading by the Rev. H. S. Perris (the present minister of the chapel) of the first Canticle in Dr. Martineau's (Tenth) service,

I was glad when my companions said unto me : Come, it is our holy day ;
Let us go into the house of the Lord ; let us take sweet counsel together.

This was followed by the singing of Dr. Martineau's hymn—

"Where is your God ?" they say :

and the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed gave an address, in which he spoke especially of Dr. Martineau as minister of that congregation. Of this address, of which we regret that a verbatim report was not obtained, the substance is given below.

After the singing of Samuel Longfellow's hymn,

One Holy Church of God appears
Through every age and race, the Rev. Henry Gow read some passages from Dr. Martineau's sermons, and the Memorial was then unveiled by Miss Busk. A solo appropriate to the moments and an organ voluntary followed, and prayer was then offered by the Rev. V. D. Davis.

The next hymn was Dr. Martineau's—followed by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's address, which is given in full below.

Thy way is in the deep, O Lord !

A concluding hymn, Eliza Scudder's—

Thou long disowned, reviled, oppressed, and the Benediction, pronounced by Mr. Carpenter, brought the service to a close.

MR. WICKSTEED'S ADDRESS.

Speaking of Dr. Martineau more especially as the minister of Little Portland-street Chapel, Mr. Wicksteed dwelt on some of the special qualifications of a pastor which he possessed in a pre-eminent degree. He had a very exceptional knowledge of affairs, and a practical sagacity and efficiency which made it impossible for anyone who came into close relations with him to regard him as a mere dreamer. He always knew what he was talking about. And he knew men. His insight into character and his sympathetic understanding of difficulties and perplexities was almost like divination. It was true that he did not readily speak of spiritual matters in company. A certain reticence, with which he sometimes was inclined to reproach himself, prevented his easily entering upon the deepest themes. But if anyone had the courage to break through this reserve by a direct question or appeal all reserve was at an end. His interlocutor was put completely at his ease by a graciousness that courted no intimacy or familiarity, and made no confidences, but entered with tender sympathy into the very heart of his trouble, and while remaining above him in its wisdom and calmness was at his side in its simplicity, its directness, and its unassuming spirit of human fellowship. These direct appeals perhaps came to him oftener by letter than by word of mouth, and for many years he exercised by means of his immense and punctually-conducted correspondence a kind of pastorate at large which made him the spiritual director of many who had never seen him.

As a preacher he did not directly aim at producing an effect upon his hearers. Still less did he, as a kind of spiritual apothecary, make up prescriptions to meet their spiritual wants. He did not consciously think of them at all. His sermons were soliloquies. He himself declared that if he thought of his congregation he would not be able to compose or preach at all; and this statement, which greatly startled some of his fellow-ministers who heard it, seemed to himself so obvious as hardly to need enunciating. A well-known fact as to his habits of composition, which at first sight seemed to contradict this declaration, in reality explained and supplemented it. Dr. Martineau usually composed under extreme pressure, and finished his sermons on Sunday morning, while a friend's carriage was waiting to take him to his chapel, in the vestry, or even sometimes in the pulpit. This means that his sermons, though soliloquies, were soliloquies of a soul that was inspired and, as it were, goaded by the social sense of spiritual community with its fellows. Dr. Martineau could not compose if his congregation was before his mind's eye, but neither could he have composed as he did if his fellow-worshippers had not been latently present within him, making their need a part of his own, giving volume and weight to his experience, and demanding through him an utterance of their own aspiration. It was because he felt the pressure of this spiritual solidarity so intimately that when most under the stimulus and impulse from others, he was least conscious of them, as persons apart from and in front of him, to whom he was to minister.

In all his ministerial and pastoral work, as in all his doings, the two characteristics of dignity and humility were all-pervading. His dignity was natural and inherent. No outward forms of stateliness were needed to protect it. It made all his actions gracious and simple. If in the country he painted his own railings, or gathered his own firewood, there was no parade of condescension, no affectation of the "dignity of labour." Such things were not symbolic or exemplary performances, but the simple and natural acts of a man who happened to find it in his way to do them. If he joined in Christmas sports, he did not strike you as a great man unbending himself, but you saw the immortal child in him taking its own where it found it.

On his profound spiritual humility, a large part of his sermons and a large part of his recently published biography are a comment. It made it a perpetual wonder to him that the expression in his discourses of his own spiritual life could enrich or support the lives of others.

What are generally spoken of as congregational institutions did not enlist Dr. Martineau's sympathy in any marked degree, for they seemed to him to extend beyond its legitimate sphere the divisions which diversity of conviction make necessary in worship. It was ever his wish to find the broadest possible basis for any kind of fellowship, and he did not see why our philanthropic or social work should be organised on a sectional basis. Nevertheless he felt most deeply that any body of Christians meeting for worship in such a locality as Little Portland-street and giving no collective evidence of their interest in the welfare of the neighbourhood would be stultifying their Christian profession. Hence his warm and sustained interest in the Portland Day and Sunday Schools. The buildings were raised by his exertions and those of his revered friend John James Tayler, and he devoted many an hour of his carefully-husbanded time to work on their committees. It was wonderful to see the patience with which he devoted himself to the details of business, and the knowledge and sagacity which he brought to bear on all practical questions. But what will be longest remembered in this connection is the afternoon superintendence of the Sunday-school, which he held for so many years.

Wordsworth, apostrophising Milton, says :—

Thy soul was like a Star, and dwelt apart :
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea,
Pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free,
So did'st thou travel on life's common way,
In cheerful godliness ; and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.

Those who, Sunday after Sunday, had heard James Martineau's rapt utterances from that pulpit in the mornings, and had seen him calling the roll and attending to the details of the registers at Sunday.

school in the afternoon, would understand to the full the harmony that underlies that contrast between the aloofness of the star-like soul and the demand for the simplest and lowliest service which rises from the heart.

MR. CARPENTER'S ADDRESS.

Three years have passed since we gathered in this place to say words of reverence and farewell to the teacher who had then just passed from our midst. To-day we meet with loyal and affectionate remembrance to accept, as members of the congregation of this chapel, the beautiful gift which the devotion of friends and the noble art of the sculptor have placed upon its wall. The keenness of our sense of loss has been assuaged in quiet recognition of that great Order which appoints, even for the wisest and holiest, a time to be born into the diviner life. We have realised more, in still hours of memory, not so much what we lost when he vanished from our sight, as what we retained when the spirit of life which he had quickened in us formed his own image anew in our hearts. And we can contemplate the "marble index" of his mind beholding the things of the spirit on some high summit of thought, with a lowly gladness that to us was vouchsafed such guidance in our youth, such friendship in our maturity.

In the splendid cluster of lofty and brilliant thinkers which will illuminate the Victorian age through the coming century, he has, we are confident, a place well assured. But he was not moved by that last infirmity—ambition; on the other hand, one of the notes that sighs through much of his devotional writing, as in his private letters, was the sense of shortcoming or failure—Mrs. Tennyson described him in 1869 as "mournful and tender-looking"; and if his critical judgments, and even his estimates of character, were sometimes unfalteringly severe, the personal attitude of his spirit was a singular and gracious humility. None of his students can fail to recall the generosity of his encouragement of their early efforts, or the exquisite sympathy and delicacy of appreciation with which he afterwards sustained them on their way.

What, then, did we chiefly learn from him? How can it be told in ten minutes? It is impossible. Yet as we think of him to-day as the preacher in this house of prayer, and our own helper towards a larger clearer faith, we may at least see the unity of thought and aim which guided all his efforts and knit together his work in diverse fields. Two great themes continually engaged him from the time when, sixty-three years ago, he became Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy and Political Economy in Manchester New College on its return from York to the city of its origin, on the one hand the philosophical interpretation of nature and human life, and on the other the historical study of the origins of Christianity. His mode of approach to these vast subjects, and the connection in which they stood in his imagination, were due to the conditions of intellectual speculation and popular religion during those early years when the mind receives its first powerful impressions and shapes the lines of its future activity. The main stress of a great teacher's thought, the mode in which he frames his presentation of his truth, will always be instinctively determined by the forms of error which he thinks most dangerous within or most potent without. These are always in the background of his view, the silent antagonists of reason, the unconvinced and unconvicted misinterpreters of experience; and, till they are vanquished, truth cannot build her new temple unopposed.

Now the two great forces with which James Martineau found himself compelled to deal were, in Philosophy, the explanation of the universe by a mechanical Deism and of human nature by materialistic necessity, and, in religion, the Evangelical scheme of a ruined world and a supernatural redemption. From different points of view these involved certain results in common which seemed to him to traverse the plainest verdicts of our moral experience. Each exhibited a scene of things from which God was banished into a distant heaven, and each pointed to a nature in man which could do nothing for itself. It mattered not whether the impediment lay philosophically in the iron grasp of necessity, or theologically in the bondage of inherited guilt and the primeval curse. Against this double incapacity the conscience of our Teacher arose in protest. In the discernment of different values among the springs of action, in the emphatic assertion of our liberty of choice among them, he found the bedrock of a new philosophy, a new religion, which brought the human spirit into immediate communion with the living God, placed his direct authority within the soul, transformed the infinite spaces of the universe from lonely immensities into the presence chamber of the everlasting mind, and made every change that swept across the world from dawn till eve the spontaneous if regulated action of his constant will. Of these two deep truths he became the herald. At first he seemed to himself almost like a "voice crying in the wilderness." He was confronted, even amongst those who should most have understood him, with a cold insensibility, or a deep-rooted mistrust. I know not which was the more wounding, but he bore the traces of them through long and difficult years. When most of us first knew him, more than forty years ago, the time of stress had passed away, and he was already emerging into the affection and reverence which slowly grew from year to year. But time brought no further changes to his scheme. He had completely reconstructed his ideas of man, the world, and God. It was only possible to do that once. So great a crisis cannot be repeated, and as new forms of thought appeared upon the scene, they did not essentially modify his position; hardly, indeed, could he come into close quarters with them. His philosophy might be expanded, enriched, safe-guarded in his later years, but it could not be again transmuted. One date suffices to mark the difference. His essential work as a thinker was done before the production of "The Origin of Species."

What then, once more, did we learn from him? In the first place we learned to love truth. Not, however, I think, as inquirers, so much (I speak at least for myself) as disciples. In this respect there was a marked difference between his teaching and that of his beloved colleague John James Tayler. It was a difference which arose partly from the difference of subject matter, but partly also out of his own genius and temperament. The critic of philosophy must have established, at least in his own mind, his principles of judgment. The student of history, as he threads his difficult way among theories—for example of the documentary sources of the Gospels—does not feel that issues of life depend on his results. A calmer view, a more balanced recognition of the strength of rival arguments, is possible, and we gained from Mr. Tayler a wide outlook, a delicate appreciation of the significance of small circumstances, a sense of only relative certainty among conflicting testimonies, a readiness to revise formal verdicts and hold large generalisations in suspense. The method of Dr. Martineau was otherwise. He planted himself in the midst of a rival system, and its shattered fragments were dispersed in space. He was unrivalled as a critic, but his criticism was often couched rather in the positive assertions of a seer, than in the cautious temper of a student. He taught philosophy as a prophet. His judgments were always appeals. He never could treat man apart from God. "Thus saith the Lord" rang through his reasonings. Scientific analysis always ended by relating us to the Infinite, because it was there that he first found us, and his aim was to make us feel it. So intimately inwrought are the affections, the reverences, the high spiritual powers of the soul with our commonest acts and processes of mind, that he could not handle the one without bringing the other to the light, as though he cried "Behold, and you shall know." Truth was presented to us, therefore, with impassioned conviction. It was revealed not in abstract isolation, but as a part of living palpitating experience. We were taken into the sanctuary and shown the mystic handwriting on the wall; and it turned out that the temple of the universe had its counterpart in the temple of the soul. One answered to the other, and the outward glory was mirrored in the radiance within. Or, perhaps more truly, the primal light first kindled in the heart sufficed to illuminate the infinite vistas of the world.

This deep assurance, this unswerving trust in the deliverances of our consciousness, filled him with valour fearlessly to attack the most difficult problems of philosophy. It is perhaps a more precious and rarer quality to be able to inspire courage even than to instil the love of truth. There are men who love truth, but have little hope of reaching her. He was always sure she could be found. And there are men who love her for themselves but not for others. Not for him, however, were the compromises and reserves by which some keep themselves within safe bounds. Still less would he claim or practise a freedom in the inner range of his own thought which he would not declare aloud for all to hear. And this courage was rooted in his lofty estimate of human nature. He seemed at home in every century of history, but its crimes and its tragedies did not appal him. He read with unerring instinct the secrets of our hearts, and no failure or meanness was hidden from his eye. Out of his quiet study he surveyed the heaving movements of the world, not simply as a spectator, but as one who in his time had fought wild beasts at his own Ephesus; and I sometimes falteringly wondered at the unabated confidence with which he could still lay the whole weight of his thought on elements that had often proved so feeble or perverse. It is true that in his later years the immediate courses of politics and religion in this country excited his anxiety and foreboding; but these were only the surface rufflings of the mighty deeps which were filled with central peace. For it was in the faculties and contents of our minds, and the interior structure and activity of our conscience, that he found the key to the great mystery. "The necessity may be disguised," he said, "but it can never be escaped, of interpreting the universe by man." And to this interpretation the testimony of humanity bore witness. The highest things in literature, art, law, were the creation of the faculties, the instincts, the affections of the soul. There was man's own evidence of his nature and powers, and these were rooted in the infinite Life. And so he turned to Plato, to the Theologia Germanica, to Wordsworth (he once told me that it was his habit to read the Excursion through each year), and found a communion of aspiration and endeavour linking the ages together, and making history a continuous ministry of the spirit of the living God.

And hence it was that historical Christianity had for him so profound a meaning. Little by little he pierced deeper and deeper into its secrets, as he sought to strip it of false investitures of interpretation, and reach the primary reality in the mind of Christ. Side by side with his reconstruction of philosophy he pursued his systematic inquiries into the origins of the Gospels and the Church, bearing in his heart that image of Jesus which had been implanted in him by his first teachers, and which never ceased to draw his affections and fill him with love and awe. There he beheld impersonated in the highest form of living experience the communion with the Father which was the final word of his philosophy. There was the visible meaning of it all. There he recognised a moral life framed on the same scale as our own, with its possibilities all realised, and its manhood transfigured in the glow of a diviner light. This was why he swept away with unsparing hand whatever seemed to him incongruous with the nature thus discerned. In Jesus, conceived as the moral and spiritual ideal of man, he found the verification in history of what he had learned in the soul. No labour was too great to rescue that sacred figure from the misunderstanding of contemporaries which robed it with a Messianic dignity it had never claimed, or the false theories of later generations which made its manhood unreal by incarnating in it a superhuman person of the Triune God. Deeply as he sympathised with much of the spirit of traditional religion, he found himself in more and more complete intellectual opposition to the traditional creed, whether in the Evangelical or the Sacerdotal form. To this aim he dedicated the latest of his literary labours. With the magnificent industry which the manifold productiveness of his strenuous life had not exhausted, he set himself at eighty-three to restudy the Gospels, and master afresh the complicated problems they present. No pages in all his works have a greater vigour, a more superb conviction, than the last sections of "The Seat of Authority in Religion," in which he concentrated all his resources of insight knowledge and sympathy on the delineation of Jesus as he was. I well remember calling on him early in January, 1890. Influenza was raging around him. Whole families had been seized by it. The epidemic had invaded his own household, and the sufferers lay sick upstairs. But he toiled on. Each hour was precious; he might himself be taken; death seemed already standing at the door. "I notice," he said, "that it makes short work with the old. It is not that I am afraid to go, but I do want to finish my book."

And so he bore his testimony to the last. He gave us, and gave us freely, all he had. He never grudged the sacrifice which his ceaseless labours must have laid upon him. With powers of enjoyment that could be strung to the intensest pitch (who that has seen him on the hills but knows!), with sympathies that made him the beloved interpreter alike of the joys and of the griefs of others, he yet lived aloof the thinker's life that those whom he knew not might be enlightened. For such a life we thank God as a great gift; we do well to hold it in precious remembrance. Then death came to him and said—"Friend, go up higher." Be it ours one day to follow his spirit into the eternal realm of truth and love.

THE SUNDAY SERVICES: MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S SERMON.

At both the services in Little Portland-street Chapel on Sunday, reference was made to the Memorial, the day being the third anniversary of Dr. Martineau's death. In the morning the Tenth Service (which is Dr. Martineau's) was used, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke.

The text was from Luke vi. 38: "Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, shaken together, running over, shall they give into your bosom."

That, Mr. Brooke said, was not true of the outward material world; it was a law of the spiritual world, and the sermon was an eloquent exposition of that great truth. It showed how the law was true in a very special sense of the giving of love in true unselfishness, though often (as in the supreme instance of Jesus himself) the love was given back after the close of the earthly life. Yet none the less, in that higher life, the love of grateful hearts could be received, and the spiritual law held universal sway.

At the conclusion of his sermon Mr. Brooke spoke as follows of Dr. Martineau:—

"These are the truths hidden in this spiritual law, and there is no better modern expression of them, or example of their working, than in the life of James Martineau, to whose memory, in this chapel, which was blessed with his voice and presence, was yesterday dedicated the marble monument now set up for those who loved and honoured him.

"It was a fitting thing to place it here. Here, he gave away, Sunday after Sunday, the treasures of his intellect, imagination, of the truth God had enabled him to grasp, of the profound convictions of his conscience, of his passionate aspiration to God his Father, of his love for Christ as the revealer of the true life, of his own deep affection for men, women and children. And he gave lavishly. His work of love never ceased, even after he retired from public life. There was an undying fountain in his soul, and its waters were poured forth upon the world. A fruitful example, a tender inspiration, he was to humanity—a multitudinous giver.

"And in him was fulfilled the sanction of the law of which I have spoken—'give and it shall be given to you.' Even in this life (unlike others less fortunate), he received what he gave. He lived to be surrounded by the love he had given, by the work of others whom he had taught, inspired, helped and consoled. Good measure, thank God, was given back to this servant of the Lord, of all that he had given, speaking, teaching, writing, to his fellows, spirit to spirit, heart to heart, intellect to intellect, conscience to conscience. Pressed down, shaken together, and running over, men poured back into his bosom a thousand-fold more in quantity, though not in quality, what they had received from him.

"And what he gave was multiplied, and continues to multiply. His intellect lives in hundreds of men, and passed through fresh minds enlivens, stimulates, empowers the sincere search for truth so dear to him. His profound sense of the imperative of duty before all things, of conscience as the ruler of life, lives and multiplies its warnings, impulses and powers in thousands who never saw him face to face. His steadiness in the faith of God, the Father, and His dwelling in man, in the deep truths of the Spirit; his steadfastness in the battle that all his life-time raged, and with double toil and trouble, till he left the arena, between the forces which make for materialism, and those which belong to the Divine Spirit who fills and makes the Universe of thinking and loving beings—have grown and multiplied, year after year in generations of men, and will continue to send their impulse on, wave after wave, till the day of the great Decision. In the high Kingdom of Heaven, he knows that now. It is his fruit, his harvest. Good measure, pressed down, and shaken together and running over, men have given into his bosom."

MR. PERRIS'S SERMON.

At the evening service, the Rev. H. S. Perris devoted the whole of his sermon to Dr. Martineau's life and teaching, speaking especially of his "Message to the Churches." Having quoted from the tributes in the Contemporary and the Hibbert Journal, he dwelt upon Dr. Martineau's ideal of church fellowship, his rooted objection to a dogmatic name applied to churches, his broad and deep spiritual sympathies. Towards the conclusion of his sermon Mr. Perris said:—

"In commemorating Martineau we commemorate one who was at once a religious Radical and a religious Conservative. He believed in the present intimate touch of the individual soul with God, in the freedom of the spirit, and the progressive revelations of God's truth. He believed also in the Communion of Saints, in the Holy Catholic Church, in the holiness of beauty, and in the continuity of Christian piety and aspiration, represented by such observances (freed from superstition) as the Supper of the Lord. In temper he was no schismatic or separatist, but was ever seeking unity and comprehension in those deep spiritual affinities which, he well knew, are living bonds between all the sinful but aspiring children of men."

JEREMIAH AND THE LEVITICAL LEGISLATION.

SIR,—Professor Carpenter is, of course, absolutely and obviously correct in saying that the argument from Jeremiah vii. 21-22 "is not ignored" in his Hexateuch. But my surprise was that neither is it used (or refuted). In my former notice (Jan. 2, 1901) I was explicit, and wrote that the passage (I now introduce italics) "is mentioned incidentally in connection with a summary history of the growth of criticism, but does not take its place at all . . . in the positive exposition of the evidence." This having failed to "draw" Professor Carpenter I returned to the charge, and in reviewing his second edition I expressed myself with undue brevity and said that I could not find "this piece of evidence . . . cited by Professor Carpenter." I meant, of course, "cited in evidence" to establish his case, and I deliberately (but unwisely) abstained from noting again that the passage was quoted in connection with the history, as it seemed irrelevant. This was doubly unfortunate. It was an injustice to Professor Carpenter (for the appearance of the passage elsewhere is not really irrelevant), and it exposed me to the suspicion of having committed the flippancy of complaining of the absence of any treatment of Jeremiah vii. 21-22 without having so much as looked for it in the index. I really have no right to claim even these few lines for a personal explanation; but if you will, of your clemency, allow them to me, I shall be grateful.

As to the question itself of the significance of the argument based on the passage from Jeremiah, I can only thank Professor Carpenter for his ample explanation. I cannot honestly say that I am satisfied, but I will not take this opportunity of debating the matter further. May a third edition soon give me my chance!

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF ST. FRANCIS AND ST. DOMINIC.

SIR,—I fear that a critical discussion of the questions raised by Mr. Wicksteed's letter is hardly suitable for your columns, and would be of small interest to most of your readers. I hesitate to disagree with an expert of Mr. Wicksteed's proved ability; but in my judgment the passage which he quotes from the Speculum is probably more uncertain in date and origin than his statements would lead us to suppose. That it cannot have been written at the same time as the earliest part of Leo's work (assuming for the moment Sabatier's date to be correct) is, I think, proved by the use of the phrase, "qui postea fuit summa pontifex." This would not be a natural way of referring to Gregory IX. in 1227. It is also of interest to note that it does not occur in the shorter redaction of the Speculum published recently by Father Lemmens. It occurs, however, slightly modified, in the third part of the Second Life, by Thomas of Celano, written between 1247-1257; but the sources which he used for this part of his work are doubtful. One point is clear—that he is not dependent upon the Three Companions as he is in the first part of the Second Life. It is rather risky to base any argument upon Wadding, because at his time there was confusion between the Speculum and the Three Companions; and the same may be said of the interesting Italian version published by Marcellino and Domenichelli. I am accordingly inclined to think that there is no substantial ground for attributing this story of St. Francis and St. Dominic to the Three Companions, and that its place in the Speculum is due not to the hand of Leo, but to the later compiler. I do not wish to speak with any positiveness upon a subject where the documentary evidence is still so fragmentary, but at present I believe that the highly-coloured picture of friendship in the passage which Mr. Wicksteed quotes is due to a subsequent desire to emphasise unity of spirit and aim rather than to personal memory.

Jan. 13. W. H. DRUMMOND.

"AN OBSTINATE FALLACY."

SIR,—(1) Mr. Rudolf Davis wrote, in his paper on "The Organising Idea of of our Churches," "Freedom of thought exists to preserve the health of belief; it exists—so far as religion is concerned—solely for the sake of that theological belief which is the expression of a man's religion." The form of this latter clause, and the use to which Mr. Davis put it in his further argument, led me to suppose that by "that theological belief" Mr. Davis meant a specific (not necessarily a specified) theology. I am glad to find that I was mistaken. Mr. Davis means in the latter clause exactly what he meant in the former, so far as it regards religion—namely, that theological belief can only preserve its health in an atmosphere of free thought.

This being so, the whole argument which Mr. Davis founded upon the clause seems to me to collapse. That argument is that the principle of freedom of thought, well understood and sanely applied, leads straight to sectarianism. "Every Church is necessarily denominational, necessarily sectarian, necessarily has a creed. . . . . Our churches stand for certain theological doctrines. . . . The churches stand for Unitarianism." Now if Mr. Davis had meant what I supposed him to mean, that the end to which freedom of thought is a means is a specific theology, all this might follow; but Mr. Davis's real meaning, as he now interprets it, will not bear this conclusion; indeed, precludes it. If a Church, quâ Church, regarded as a continuous entity, has a creed, then it cannot enjoy freedom of thought concerning the articles of that creed. In other words, the necessary condition to health of belief is denied it. If this be true "necessarily" of "every Church," then no Church can possibly attain health of belief; a conclusion which may, I hope, be taken as a reductio ad absurdum.

(2) "Why should it be assumed," my friend writes, "that since Unitarianism (but not Unitarianism alone) flourishes in the atmosphere of freedom of thought, Unitarianism is either the last, full, perfect revelation of truth, or else it is so vague and elastic as to be meaningless?" I do not know. I see no reason for making any such assumption. By embodying in this interrogative sentence certain words of mine, in inverted commas, Mr. Davis implies (in perfect good faith, I am sure) that the assumption is mine also. Far from that, I am a Unitarian, and I know what I mean by Unitarianism, and yet I know that God has not ceased to reveal himself. What I wrote was: "To claim that freedom of thought exists for the sake of Unitarianism is to claim that Unitarianism is either"—and so forth.

(3) Mr. Davis repudiates the desire to exclude any person from membership in any of our churches on grounds of religious belief. I gladly welcome this pronouncement, but I cannot reconcile it with the theory that our churches stand on a basis of Unitarian theology. A society which exists to cultivate Unitarianism is acting, it would appear, in a way little likely to advance its purpose if it admits anti-Unitarians into its number. It is, again, quite true that "a man can worship anywhere, but best where the form of worship has least that is to him untrue"; but by what mood, in what figure, does Mr. Davis proceed to deduce that "a particular form of worship is the reason for any church's existence"?

(4) Mr. Davis regards our particular form of worship (which is to him an aspect of our specific theology) as the differentia of our churches. My contention that "our churches are based on worship" seems to him to be true only in a sense in which it is true of every church, and to afford no differentia. I have already dealt with this point, but will now do so in greater detail. A dog show which admits all breeds,

> "As hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs, > Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves," every creature, in fact, "that takes upon him to be a dog," is by its inclusiveness sufficiently distinguished from a pug show, or a show confined to collies or bulldogs. If it happened one year that there were more terriers in the dog show than dogs of any other kind that would not alter the constitution of the show—it would still be a dog show, not merely a show of terriers. In applying this parable (procul o procul este profani) for "show" read "church," for "dog" read "worshipper," for "pug," say, "Anglican"; for "collie," "Presbyterian"; for "bulldog," "Methodist"; and for "terrier," "Unitarian." That relates to one side of our church life. On the other side, there is surely a clear distinction to be made between a society which exists to discover and publish scientific truth, and, on the other hand, a Jenner Society or a Pasteur league, or a Lamarckian or Darwinian association. If it should happen that all the members of the non-subscribing society were, at a given time, evolutionists, that would indeed be a testimony to the cogency of the evolution hypothesis, but would in no wise affect the basis of the society. May I now repeat the words of my paper? "A group of churches which is based on worship, not on a particular theology, is by that basis alone sufficiently distinguished from all other churches, in so far as all others are based on a particular theology."

(5) When Mr. Davis tells me that "no society can be based upon religion unless it is also based upon theology," I take him to mean that all worship implies some intellectual speculation on the Object of worship. But we must not confuse "theology," in this general sense, with "a theology," which means a specific system of theological opinion. The dictum cannot validly be used to show that our churches are, or ought to be, based on Unitarian opinion.

But "our message," Mr. Davis adds, "can only be fitly delivered if our churches are organised, individually and collectively, upon the basis of this Unitarian message, and for its proclamation." This is a paradoxical assertion indeed. Who speaks with greater weight, the committed partisan or the unbiassed inquirer? If we have come to the discovery of certain truths by the way of free thought, why should we throw away this sanction and ratification of our teaching? One man says, "I have searched for truth, and believe I have found it in Unitarianism: listen to my reasons"; another says, "I am by profession a Unitarian, so listen while I expound what my profession binds me to teach." Or one Church says the one thing, and another Church the other. Which is the more persuasive proem?

There is nothing to prevent the ministers of free churches from preaching Unitarianism; nothing to prevent Unitarians from combining to propagate the truth which, in these forms of thought, we have grasped. We believe in Unitarianism because to our free thinking it commends itself as true. What advantage then can there be in rejecting, as our church-basis, thought which is free that it may be true, and substituting one of the results of such thought? To be blunt, the logical meaning of such a step is this: instead of standing here and now for Unitarianism, because we stand always for the truth of God, we prefer to stand henceforth for our present opinion, true or untrue. This is to deny aforetime the Christ that is to be—that higher revelation which shall link our truth to other, and fulfil it in greater truth.

Mr. Davis, no doubt, holds this as I do; but he would confine its working to the individual conscience. A man must love truth more than his own dogma, but a Church as such should be based on the dogma, not on the love of truth. Here, I think, we touch the fundamental difference between our views. As a teacher, I believe in teaching method rather than results; in evoking faculty rather than giving information. I would guide others along the same road of free, reasonable inquiry, awake in them the same keen desire to reach the truth, which have led me to Unitarianism; and not otherwise do I desire to make converts at all. And as a man living in this age, I believe that the principle of veracity is more important, more needed by the world, than is any opinion about the controverted points of Christian theology. Let us base our churches—I therefore say, and I hold that they are so based—on the more important and fundamental things; let us base them on the spirit of worship and on the freedom which preserves the health of belief.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH MIDLAND.

OUR North Midland churches, though widely scattered in space, form a close and compact little group in sympathy. We may say of them what has been said of Unitarians generally, that they "hold together well." It is a far cry from Chesterfield to Hinckley, and a farther still from Belper to Boston; but our congregations thus separated by distance are yet knit together in bonds of real affection and well-doing. We feel that we are members of one body, that we belong to one common movement; there is a genuine concern about each other's welfare, and we are gladdened when we hear of a kindred congregation's success.

The spirit that animates the congregations communicates itself to the ministers. It is the convention to speak of "brother"-ministers. It is to be feared that in some instances this is little more than a convention, "brother"-ministers being then merely fellow-members of the same learned profession without any other tie of attachment. Here, in the North Midland, we are in love of the brethren tenderly affectioned one toward another. Our Ministers' Meetings are reunions of comrades in a great campaign. We visit each other's home, and eagerly look forward to the next fraternal gathering. In the winter we form a snug little company round a cheery fire. In the summer we call the spirit of Robin Hood from the heart of Sherwood Forest, or, in democratic state, voyage in a steam-launch up the Trent or Soar, munching a frugal biscuit under the willows, and invading some quiet hamlet for our tea. With these relations subsisting it is possible to accept as a credible statement that we are able to discuss without distemper every immortal subject, from the latest ecclesiastical "usurpation" on the part of the B. and F.U.A. to the newest ultramontane claim of the Conference, and even to discover that "higher synthesis" in which all contradictions are reconciled, and all "obstinate fallacies" dispelled. But to proceed.

Our religious fellowship will suffer great change through the departure of Mr. Gow to Hampstead. Among us he was naturally primus inter pares, and proved himself a strong leader and a safe guide. We looked to him in every difficulty, and found quickening encouragement in every fresh enterprise. For nearly ten years he was the secretary of our Association, which had acquired a habit of leaning with confidence upon his sober and mature judgment in all denominational affairs. Though we are left consciously poorer, and though the position he occupied among us cannot readily, if at all, be filled, we recognise that London is the place for his great powers and energies, and we therefore heartily congratulate the Rosslyn Hill congregation on their happy choice. We await the appointment of his successor to the important pulpit of the Great Meeting with keen interest.

Our District Missionary Scheme, though in some respects successful, has in many directions yet to justify itself. With the generous assistance of the B. and F.U.A., reinforced by handsome subscriptions from Leicester and Nottingham and other places, we were fortunate enough to secure the services of the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, whose missionary work in Wales is well known. More than a year ago he settled in Ilkeston, and had in addition to his ministry there the oversight of the Burton movement. The work in Ilkeston has been of a solid character. The congregation has been thoroughly organised and has obtained an assured place among the religious and moral agencies of the town. Dr. Griffiths has been well received by the orthodox ministers, who have admitted him into their confraternity and made him a prominent member of the Free Church Council.

This is in happy contrast with the treatment accorded him when, a few years ago on a propagandist tour in North Wales, his meetings were broken up, chairs smashed, and he himself had to be escorted home by a posse of police. Here in Ilkeston he takes his turn in the ordinary way in exchanging pulpits with one or other of the orthodox ministers. Recently he preached a sermon on the moral condition of the town. This sermon was published in the local Press, and was subsequently accepted as a programme for a moral crusade led by the vicar and supported by leading public men.

But although we have the best of missionaries we find it by no means easy to break new ground. Burton is too far from Ilkeston to be easily and constantly worked in connection with it. The movement there has not hitherto fulfilled its early promise, though it is still being strenuously maintained by a number of enthusiastic stalwarts. Some of us continue to believe in it, and confidently trust that "in the teeth of clenched antagonisms" it will go on and prosper. Dr. Griffiths has been busy in organising the lay-preachers of the district. These are able and self-denying men whose labour for our common cause deserves a high tribute of praise. Our missionary is now arranging a scheme for delivering lectures in small centres, like Long Eaton, near enough to Ilkeston to be practically manageable. Such activity may not result in planting new churches, but it will help to spread the light of a liberal religion among the people.

There remains little that calls for special mention in the congregational life of our churches. Lincoln is causing us great anxiety. This chapel is richly endowed, and the only surviving trustee has now closed it without the consent of the congregation. We shall doubtless hear more of this matter. The Free Christian Church, Leicester, under the exceptionally able ministry of the Rev. W. Whitaker, continues a remarkably prosperous career. The Sunday-school is almost too large for the premises, though these are extensive. Here at least we have an example of what may be accomplished by a congregation with wisdom to build in a growing locality with confidence in their cause and self-sacrifice to work persistently on its behalf. We also hear good reports of the efforts of the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans at Chesterfield. Boston seems to be going ahead since, thanks to the zeal of the Postal Mission, Mr. Stoddart settled there. A successful bazaar was recently held, and the proceeds enabled the congregation to do some necessary repairs and comfortably reseat the chapel.

Other churches have their records of steady well-doing. In some cases, owing to special local conditions, we have to be content to remain stationary, one or two chapels barely hold their own which present perplexing difficulties. But taking the district as a whole we have cause to rejoice and look forward to the future with a glad and confident hope.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Accrington.—On Wednesday, Jan. 7, a very enjoyable social reunion was provided in the school through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. George Elce. The Haslingden Orpheus Male Glee Party, Miss Nellie Pickup, and Miss Isherwood contributed to the programme. The Evans Orchestra played for dancing. On the 14th inst. the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, came over to deliver the first of a series of lantern lectures on "Evolution and Religion." The chair was taken by Councillor A. Langham, and the audience listened with evident appreciation to Mr. Mills's clear account of "The Autobiography of the Earth."

Bedfield and Framlingham.—The Central Postal Mission Committee, at the unanimous request of the congregation at Bedfield and Monk Soham and Framlingham, have appointed Mr. R. Newell, of Preston, to take charge of the two chapels. He will enter on his duties on Jan. 25. Mr. R. Newell has already done excellent service for the Unitarian cause in the North as lay-preacher and Sunday-school superintendent, and he also organised the North Lancashire and Westmorland Association, of which he is the active secretary. His former experience as a Methodist lay-preacher, and his success in building up a large village congregation, encourage the committee to hope that the Suffolk Village Mission, so long and persistently carried on by the Rev. A. Amey, may be continued and pushed forward with success and vigour.

Bristol.—On Sunday evening the Rev. A. N. Blatchford delivered his annual retrospect. He referred to the return of "the kind Angel of Peace," the Coronation after previous disappointment, and to some of the celebrities who died last year. Among them were Lord Pauncefote, Lord Acton, Lord Kimberley, Lord Dufferin, Sir Neville Chamberlain, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, Archbishop Temple, Dr. Parker, and Mr. Hugh Price Hughes. Of each of these, as of others, he gave some brief description. The last names mentioned were those of Mary Estlin and Panton Ham, a former minister at Bristol. The address concluded as follows:—Characters like these are veritable factors in the life, the truly progressive life, of our old city. They help to raise our aim, and to gird up our hearts in our brethren's service. Being dead, they yet speak that we may serve God as worthily in our day and generation as they have done before us. An honoured company, they stand enshrined in our affectionate remembrance; and we shall think of them as worthily maintaining the traditions and exemplifying the spirit of Bristol citizenship. They bid us find our true happiness in self-devoted labour for the common good.

Deal.—The New Year's treat last Friday was attended by upwards of two dozen children, and towards a dozen parents and friends. The minister distributed prizes for attendance. A magazine class has been started for young men, total abstainers, who feel a call to something better than walking up and down the streets each night.

Gateshead.—Last Sunday being the third anniversary of the death of the Rev. Dr. James Martineau, special memorial services were held at Unity Church morning and evening. The stained-glass portrait of Martineau which adorns the entrance of the church was appropriately decorated, and the building was adorned with white flowers. The order of service was one specially compiled by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, and consisted of hymns, prayers, &c., entirely selected from the writings of the great teacher. Throughout the day the "Lessons" were taken from Martineau's works, and one of the sermons from "Hours of Thought" was given in the morning. In the evening Mr. Harvie preached on "Martineau on Immortality." Despite bad weather the services were fairly well attended. The calendar of Unity Church announces that Sunday, Jan. 25, sees the conclusion of Mr. Harvie's work in Gateshead.

Liverpool: Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.—There was a crowded congregation in this quaint old chapel last Sunday evening, when the service was conducted by a lady-student of Manchester College, Oxford, Miss von Petzold. As on the previous Sunday in Edinburgh, the service was felt to be very helpful and impressive. There can be no doubt that Miss von Petzold has a sure call to the work of preaching. The clearness of utterance and charm of style, her freshness and energy of thought, above all her intense religious earnestness, hold in them the assured promise of power, and one effect of the service was to kindle and strengthen the hope that, in the future, the influence of woman in the work of public religious teaching will be deep and strong and lasting.

London: Bermondsey.—On Tuesday, the 13th inst., the scholars' annual tea-party and prize-giving were held. Mr. Harold Titford, of Highbury, who for many months, until the autumn of last year, had acted as a devoted superintendent and true friend to all the scholars, distributed the prizes; he was accompanied by his sister, Miss E. J. Titford. Another friend of Bermondsey, the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, was also present. The small staff of teachers (many years faithful) kept everything in order and harmony, though they were no more conspicuous than the elder children of a large family, such was the spontaneous goodwill and ready responsiveness of all the scholars. Everyone was happy and good.

London: Peckham.—On Tuesday a New Year's congregational tea-party was given in the schoolroom of the Avondale-road Church by Mr. E. Gauntlett, the hon. treasurer. About seventy guests sat down to an admirably-provided tea, after which the time was pleasantly spent in conversation, song, recitation, &c, with a few very short addresses, among the latter being a humorous reminder, by Mr. Gauntlett, of the way in which a treasurer's anxieties might be lightened by increasing his burden.

Manchester District Association.—The Governing Body paid a visit to Blackley on Saturday last. Service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. W. Holmshaw; the sermon was by the Rev. C. Peach, who took for his text the question, "If a man die shall he live again?" and the answer from the Apocrypha, "God created man to be immortal." A congregation of 110 persons followed the sermon very intently. Tea was served in the schoolroom adjoining the chapel, and as it was the first time many of the visitors had seen the new building, they were much interested in deciding whether or not Blackley school was nicer than theirs! When tea was over, the President of the Association (the Rev. C. Roper) "received" all the visitors, and the reception did a good deal towards helping the friends present to extend their acquaintance. It was noted that eighteen out of the twenty-two churches were represented, and that the meeting was the largest of the series—140 persons attending. There was a better spirit observable, too, and the points of the speakers were keenly appreciated. Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, J.P., presided, and speeches were delivered by the Revs. W. Holmshaw and J. Arthur Pearson, and Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson.

Mottram.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith began his ministry at the Christian Church on Christmas Day, by presiding at the Christmas party. On Sunday, Dec. 28, he preached his opening sermons to excellent congregations. The first watch-night service ever held in this chapel took place on New Year's Eve, at which about seventy attended. On Saturday evening last, Jan. 10, a public welcome was given to Mr. Smith and family at a meeting of members of the congregation and Sunday-school and visitors from neighbouring chapels. After tea Mr. Fred Wild presided over the meeting in the chapel. The Chairman's address was an interesting sketch of the previous history of the congregation; the welcome to the new minister was expressed by Mr. Daniel Gee on behalf of the congregation, and by Mr. J. W. Wild for the Sunday-school; the Revs. B. C. Constable, W. Harrison, and W. C. Hall joined in the welcome on behalf of the East Cheshire Christian Union; and the Revs. George Evans and A. C. Fox, and Mr. A. Slater on behalf of the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union. Mr. Smith made suitable response, and other speeeches, together with vocal music at intervals, contributed to the interest and pleasure of a successful evening.

Nottingham.—A meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society was held on Tuesday evening, 13th inst., when a lecture was delivered by the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, on "John Biddle." The chair was occupied by the President, Mr. J. C. Warren. Mr. Lloyd, in the course of a very interesting address, said that John Biddle was born in 1616 at Wootton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire. He was educated at the Free Grammar School there, passing thence to Oxford, where he had a successful career. In 1641 he was appointed Master of the Grammar School of St. Mary de Crypt, Gloucester, being referred to in the appointment as a man "well approved for his piety, learning, integrity, and discretion." He seemed to have devoted his leisure to the diligent study of the Scriptures, with the result that he was led to doubt the received doctrine of the Trinity. Twice he was arraigned for this and for the publication of a tract called "Twelve Arguments" (against the Deity of the Holy Spirit), and was committed to gaol, where, with one or two short exceptions, he lay for nearly six years. In 1651 he was released under the general Act of Indemnity of that year, and then settled in London, drawing together every Sunday a number of friends to whom he expounded the Scriptures. That might be said to have been the first Unitarian Congregation in England, and Biddle had hence been called "The Father of English Unitarianism." In 1654 Biddle published "A Two-fold Catechism" which created a great effect. By order of Parliament it was burned by the Common Hangman, and Biddle was again committed to prison, while Dr. Owen, Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, replied to this little work, which a man might put in his waistcoat pocket, by a volume of seven hundred pages. The Presbyterians again demanded the death penalty for Biddle, as they had done before, but Cromwell again interfered, and banished him instead to the Scilly Isles. In 1657 he was released, but in 1662 he was committed to Newgate for the same offence as before, and died there from the effects of this imprisonment in September of that year. Such was the lamentable fate of the Christian scholar, whose only fault was that he admitted "no authority but Scripture, and no authentic interpreter but reason." With his abilities, culture and piety, he might easily have attained a position of eminence and comfort, but truth was dearer to him than everything else, and he preferred the life and death of a martyr to disloyalty to conscience. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded the lecturer on the motion of Mr. F. Winser, J.P., seconded by Miss Guilford.

Swansea.—The annual Sunday-school party was held Jan. 8, the Rev. W. Tudor Jones presiding. Addresses were given by the Chairman and by Mr. W. H. Davies, superintendent. The arrangements were excellent, and a very pleasant evening was spent. The minister's Sunday afternoon class is making specially good progress.

Tavistock.—General Jacob entertained the congregation to supper at the Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 6. A tea and New Year's tree—from which presents were distributed—were provided for the Sunday-school children. Mr. Jewers, dentist, Plymouth, exhibited a gramophone, which took the first prize at the Paris Exhibition, and displayed magic-lantern views. The number present indicated growth in the congregation during the last few years.

Walthamstow.—A dramatic performance was held on Thursday, Jan. 8, when the members of the Stratford Young People's Guild very ably performed Dickens's Christmas Carol. Though the night was very wet and foggy there was a good attendance of scholars and members of the congregation, and a very enjoyable evening was spent. With the formation of a London Guild's Union it is hoped that the young people will have fuller opportunities for mutual help and intercourse.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE would remind subscribers that the form sent in with payment should be filled in with the name and address of sender. Two blank forms have been received at the office. Will subscribers who have had no receipt kindly communicate with the publisher, who will be glad to receive as early as possible subscriptions which have not yet been sent in? Any donations towards the fund for sending copies to the free libraries will be very acceptable.

DURING the coming weeks there will be an embarrassing riches of evening lectures of the highest quality for Londoners whose mind is bent that way. On Tuesday the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter begins his course on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" at the Kensington Town Hall, while already this week, on Thursday evening, a course of Eight Jowett Lectures began at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, in Tavistock-place, the Rev. A. Galton dealing with "The Influence of Modern Thought and Knowledge upon Theology." These lectures, which are freely open to the public, unfortunately for the next five weeks will clash with Mr. Stopford Brooke's lectures at University College, the second course on "Naturalism and the Romantic Movement in Poetry at the end of the Eighteenth Century" beginning on Thursday. Tickets for this course are 5s. each, or 2s. 6d. for teachers, to be had from the hon. sec. of the Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C. The lectures are to deal with the poetry of Cowper, Crabbe and Burns, and, it is hoped, the early poetry of Wordsworth.

A PRELIMINARY circular as to the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, to be held at Amsterdam, Sept. 1-4, has been issued by the general secretary, the Rev. C. W. Wendte, of Boston, and the local secretary, Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden, and has, we understand, been sent out to the secretaries of our churches throughout the country. The circular gives a forecast of the programme of proceedings, particulars of which we noted in our New Year's number. The President is Dr. Oort, of Leiden, one of the authors of the "Bible for Young People." The preacher at the religious service is to be the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet, of Bussum, editor of the Dutch Liberal weekly De Hervorming. Among the readers of papers, we understand, are to be Dr. Kalthoff, of Bremen, on "The Influence of Material Circumstances on Religion," and the Rev. A. Altherr, of Basel, on "Free Religious Thought in German Switzerland." Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin, also hopes to be present. The American Unitarian Association is to be represented by the President, the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., the Rev. J. H. Crooker, D.D., of Ann Arbour, and the Rev. C. W. Wendte. The appointed representatives of the B. and F.U.A. are the President, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, P. H. Wicksteed, J. Harwood, Mr. Ion Pritchard and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

THE preliminary circular inviting attendance at the Amsterdam meetings of the International Council states that Mr. Ion. Pritchard (who is to be addressed at Essex Hall) has kindly undertaken to make all necessary excursion arrangements so as to secure the most economical terms for delegates and visitors, and it will greatly facilitate his work if he receives early intimation of their intention to be present. The invitation, expressing the hope that at the forthcoming meetings the intercourse and friendship so happily begun in London in 1901 may be enlarged and strengthened, adds :—

We trust that a large number of people from England will attend. Many congregations and societies, with a little enthusiasm and effort, could arrange to pay the expenses of a minister and one lay delegate; such a demonstration would have an inspiring influence all over the world. The time is opportune for a "Forward" movement in Liberal Religion.

Some particulars as to hotel charges in Amsterdam are given in the circular, and it is stated that a membership ticket for the meetings will be fl. 2.50, that is 4s. 2d. As soon as Mr. Pritchard has completed his inquiries as to expenses, &c., he will doubtless be good enough to publish a letter in these columns, giving the necessary information.

THE death of Mr. Quintin Hogg removes a remarkable man from a great centre of beneficent activity in London. Born in 1845, the son of Sir J. W. Hogg, M.P., he was educated at Eton, and was a notable athlete. He entered into business in the City, and was a man of great wealth. Of this he is said to have spent not less than £150,000 on the Polytechnic Institute in Regent-street, the original building of which he secured in 1881 for £50,000. That, however, was not the beginning of his philanthropic work. When he first came to London he at once began to look after the lads in the streets, and held his first class under an archway by the river. In 1873 he founded the Youths' Christian Institute in Endell-street. Latterly his whole life was in the Polytechnic, which, under the influence of his earnest evangelical piety and broad human sympathies, became the great educational and social centre that it is. Recreation, no less than technical training, was always well cared for, the gymnasium and swimming-bath being features in the institution, which has been an immense boon to many thousands of members.

WE find the following statistics of church accommodation in the Free Methodist :—"The Evangelical Free Churches, excluding undenominational missions, report 8,076,519 sittings. There is an apparent diminution of over 60,000. The Wesleyan Church has only just completed its decennial census of sittings, and the report shows that greater precautions were taken to secure accuracy. The total increase in the decade was over 150,000. One or two other bodies have had a new census of sittings, or have made one for the first time. The greater accuracy of the returns is a matter of satisfaction. The three Churches represented by this journal make the following returns of sittings: United Methodist Free Churches, 385,722; Methodist New Connexion, 160,936; Bible Christians, 153,600. In the Church of England Year Book for 1902, the latest returns, the total number of sittings is given as 7,051,559, as compared with 8,076,519 in the Free Churches, notwithstanding the apparent decrease of 60,000. Voluntary effort has thus provided more than a million more sittings than in the State Church."

UNDER the auspices of the Bank-street Temperance Society a lecture was given at Bolton last Saturday evening by Dr. W. E. A. Axon, of Manchester. His subject was "England Free and Sober." The Rev. C. J. Street, who presided, said that was the first time they had met since the new Licensing Act came into force. The Act was a pretty strong one, but he had hoped they would make it stronger.

Dr. Axon also, in the course of his lecture, referred to the Act, and said he thought it had done something to frighten drunkards and topers. He believed they could have an England both free and sober, and if in bringing this about they lost a certain amount of liberty, the fact of their being sober would give them greater liberty in another direction. It was generally thought that Dr. Magee had said he would rather have England free than sober, but what he really said was that he would rather have England free than compulsorily sober. The greatest foe that freedom had was intemperance. Were England free and sober there would be fewer deaths, as the closer a class came into contact with liquor the higher was its death-rate. The trade of a publican was twice as dangerous as the trade of a miner, and if alcohol killed a publican, what would it do to his customers? If a trade was a danger to the State, then the State had the right to protect its citizens from it. He believed it was as Lord Rosebery had said, that if the State did not control the liquor trade the liquor trade would control the State. The victory of temperance would not solve all the problems of their social life, but it would go a long way towards their solution.

DR. TORREY and Mr. Alexander, the new Moody and Sankey, are greeted with welcome in the Evangelical papers. Dr. Torrey is a graduate of Yale University. He was superintendent of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute in Chicago. The two evangelists have lately worked together in Australia and New Zealand.

PROFESSOR MONTET, Dean of the Faculty of Theology in the University of Geneva, is to be congratulated on the completion of his great labour of love, in the publication of Auguste Bouvier's "Dogmatique Crétienne," which he has edited from the deceased professor's manuscripts. From 1865 until his death in 1893, Bouvier was Professor of Dogmatic Theology at Geneva, and exercised a profound influence, as a man of liberal thought and deeply religious nature, over successive generations of students. Professor Montet was one of his pupils, and tells how Bouvier was constantly working at his great course of lectures, hoping to perfect it for publication, but after all left the manuscript of 2,000 pages, of which the different parts, covering all the great doctrines of religion, were in various stages of completion. Happily the section on the Life Divine, and the doctrine of God, which embodied Bouvier's most original and impressive work, was among those left in a practically finished state. The whole work, carefully revised and edited by Professor Montet, is now published in two large volumes, by Fischbacher, 33, Rue de Seine, and may be had for 15 francs. We hope soon to publish a full notice of the book, for which, doubtless, other serious thinkers, and not Bouvier's old students only, will be grateful.

WITH much regret we have had to bid farewell to Le Progrés Religieux, of Geneva, a liberal Protestant weekly, established five years ago, and discontinued with the last issue of last year. In bidding farewell to their readers the editors, of whom our friend Professor Montet was one, recall how earnestly they had pleaded for liberal principles in the national Church, and had aimed at establishing the fundamental truths of Christianity, in the light of modern knowledge. Every reason which led to the establishment of the Progrés Religieux is as urgent now as ever, but the little group of contributors, with the increase of other duties, had found the tax upon their strength too great, and, unwilling to fill their columns with inferior matter, judged it wiser, at any rate for the present, to cease publication. The last number contains a reference to the death of Dr. Joseph Parker, and an appreciative notice of a French translation of R. W. Trine's "In Tune with the Infinite."

THE Rev. Thomas Keble, who passed away on New Year's Day, had been for thirty years vicar of Bisley, where he succeeded his father, the elder Thomas Keble, their joint tenure of the living having covered seventy-five years. The late vicar, who was also hon. canon of Gloucester Cathedral, was with his uncle, John Keble, author of the Christian Year, at Bournemouth at the time of his death, and was his literary executor. The elder Thomas Keble, like his more famous brother, was closely identified with the Tractarian movement, and Bisley is said to have been the first parish church at which the practice of daily morning and evening services was resumed. The late vicar in his college days was a contemporary of Conington and Goldwin Smith at Magdalen. He leaves four sons, all in orders.

THE name of the Rev. Alfred Gatty, D.D., vicar of Ecclesfield, near Sheffield, whose death is announced this week at the age of ninety, recalls the memory of his wife, Mrs. Alfred Gatty, the author of the beautiful series of "Parables from Nature," and of his even more widely known daughter, Mrs. Ewing, author of "Jackanapes," "The Story of a Short Life," and other delightful stories. Another death recorded this week is of the Rev. T. W. Fowle, for many years rector of Islip, near Oxford. The Guardian, in an obituary notice, mentions Mr. Fowle's theological works, and some philosophical and political articles in the reviews, but not his masterly little book on "The Poor Law" in Macmillan's English Citizens' Series.

SOCIAL movements for the benefit of the workers which have been paralysed by the absorbing interest of affairs in South Africa are coming to the front once more. The facility with which enormous sums of money have been raised for military purposes gave the speakers, at an important assembly of workers' representatives in Manchester last Saturday, a strong argument in favour of the feasibility of universal old-age pensions. Mr. Booth's scheme appears to be winning its way to wide acceptance. Mr. Frederick Rogers, of the National Old-age Pension Committee, urged that pensions should be granted to the aged deserving poor as a civil right, and should be forfeited only by such things as deprive a citizen of civil rights, and that the fund should be national, contributed to by all and claimed from by all. It was urged by Mr. Edward Byrne, of Ashton, that the enormous wealth which it was found was available for killing people could also be forthcoming to keep people alive. This view was generally accepted, and a resolution was adopted that a national system of old-age pensions should precede any substantial reduction of taxation, and that no pension scheme could be regarded as satisfactory which did not provide a pension at a given age as a civil right, forfeited only by crime or recent alien origin. The conference was widely representative of the workers of Lancashire and Cheshire. It was stated that the friendly societies were drawing nearer to the principle of universal old-age pensions.

IT has been long a custom with those who dislike the ordinary amusements and recreations of this world, to levy a certain tax of fun on the Holy Scriptures, and to make Bible acrostics, hidden Biblical precepts, and such things, but the following from the Methodist Times is an improvement on the usual game:—

"Dear Reader,—I once resided with 2 Tim. iii. 4, and walked in Eph. ii. 2; my conversation at that time is recorded in Eph. ii. 3. I heard one day that an inheritance had been purchased for me, and a description of it reached me, you will find it at 1 Pet. i. 4; one who resides in Heb. iv. 14, had purchased it and paid an extraordinary price, but, to say the truth, I did not believe this report, as I was entirely unaquainted with this Man, and long experience had convinced me that strangers never gave favours through love alone, and friends seldom gave favours that cost much. However, I called on 2 Tim. iii. 16, as my own prospects at Eph. ii. 12 were as bad as they could be. I found the house I sought at 2 Cor. v. 1, and the invitation to it, which you see put up at Isa. ii. 2, 3, and by John at vii. 37. They are wonderfully inviting to the poor and needy. The house has only one door at John x. 9, and it was some time before I found it. My permanent address will now be 2 Cor. v. 1, but if you can call any day at Heb. iv. 16, you will meet me and many others; we are in the habit of meeting there daily. If you call attend to what the servant says at Luke xiv. 22. You can depend upon what he says. When 1 Thess. iv. 17 is fulfilled, I expect my home will be Rev. xxii. 4, 6. Rev. v. 9 is the song I shall sing in that day.—SEL.

That conscientious Plymouth Brother we once heard who whenever he quoted a Bible verse in his prayer—namely, about every second sentence, immediately gave the reference, book, chapter and verse, would be able to understand this story at once. The puzzle will perhaps send some of our readers to look up the texts.

APPEAL.—Friends of the late Rev. C. L. Corkran are subscribing for a small pension for Charles Bentley, who is now 73 years of age and past work. He was a valued servant of Mr. Corkran's, and in earlier years did much useful work under his direction at the Spicer-street Mission. There is need of 2s. a week more, to make up the pension deemed necessary to keep Bentley and his wife in comfort in their old age. Communications may be addressed to the Secretary of the Dalston Committee of the C.O.S., 21, High-street, Kingsland, N.E., from whom all particulars may be obtained.

Correspondents are requested to note that news for insertion the same week should reach the Office by Wednesday if possible, and the earlier the better. Thursday morning is the latest time for receiving news, and it should then be very brief, or it will probably have to wait a week.

LITERATURE.

HENRY SIDGWICK'S ESTIMATE OF MARTINEAU'S PHILOSOPHY OF ETHICS.

THE publication of the late Professor Sidgwick's Lectures * on three eminent British writers on Ethics is a distinct gain to philosophical literature, and the admirably clear Analytical Summary by the Editress, Miss E. E. Constance Jones, of Girton College, which is prefixed to the Lectures, is a most valuable aid to the full understanding of Sidgwick's very able expositions and criticisms. Less space is given to the treatment of Dr. Martineau's views than to the systems of T. H. Green and Mr. Spencer, and most of the criticisms of the "Types of Ethical Theory" presented in this volume are little more than amplifications of those already set forth in the "Methods of Ethics." Still the four Lectures devoted to Martineau's system are rich in interest, both for their great lucidity, and also as exhibiting, we think, evidence that Sidgwick, on one or two important questions of ethical philosophy, was nearer to Martineau's position than the chapter in the "Methods of Ethics" would lead one to suppose.

In his very acute criticism of T. H. Green's views, Professor Sidgwick's conclusions in reference to two subjects of primary significance both for ethics and religion are in full accord with Dr. Martineau's. After describing the account of man's moral freedom given by Green and his disciples, Sidgwick says:—

> I regard Green's view—in spite of the eager advocacy of "Freedom" in a sense—as being for all practical purposes pure Determinism. . . . I submit that this kind of "freedom" is not sufficient really to justify moral imputation: because if we ask why the particular self-distinguishing consciousness called John makes a virtuous choice, and the particular self-distinguishing consciousness called Thomas makes a vicious choice, the explanation, according to Green, must be entirely sought in the particularity of the chain of natural causation in each case. I wish to make this quite clear: because my complaint against the school to which Green belongs is that, on this fundamentally important question of Freedom they tend to confuse the reader's mind by trying to "run with the hare and hunt with the hounds," and to get the moral satisfaction of a Libertarian view, together with the scientific satisfaction of a Determinist view.

While thus agreeing with Dr. Martineau in regarding the Hegelian doctrine of Moral Freedom as utterly unsatisfactory, Professor Sidgwick is also completely at one with him in reference to the bearing of Green's philosophy on the question of Personal Immortality. In a letter written to the Rev. A. H. Craufurd in 1892, Dr. Martineau says:—

> I know Hegel's "Philosophy of Religion," but neither in it or his English interpreters have I found any "future life" that does not disappoint its name. That genuine hope dawned upon Thomas Hill Green on his death-bed I am assured: not, however, as a corollary from his Hegelianism, but rather as an emergence from it.

In like manner, Professor Sidgwick writes:—

> If Green believed in the immortality of the individual, it remains difficult to see why he believed in it. Granting that the self-conscious individual man, being a reproduction of the eternal mind, "partakes of the nature of the eternal," it is not clear that he partakes of it quâ individual. Observe, Green says, "absolute value in a spirit which we ourselves are," not "in our spirits." The thing of absolute value might therefore remain if our spirits are extinguished. . . . In fact it is not the individual quâ individual that is thus eternal, but the universal mind whose knowledge it shares and reproduces.

Turning now to the Lectures in which Professor Sidgwick treats directly of Dr. Martineau's theory of ethics, we note first that in regard to the basal question of the source of the consciousness of moral obligation, Sidgwick agrees with Martineau in holding that the sentiment expressed by the word "ought" is entirely unique, and cannot possibly be explained, as both the Benthamites and the Spencerians seek to explain it, as the outcome of sentient experience combined with sympathy and the pressure of society on the individual. Though Sidgwick differs from Martineau in the conception of the supreme ethical end—the former holding that that end is the production of general happiness, while the latter maintains that it is conformity with an ideal of human perfection—both alike maintain that the obligation to pursue this end is imposed by an inwardly recognised Moral Authority. But while Martineau, in one passage at least in his "Types of Ethical Theory," asserts that the authoritativeness of ethical principles arises from the recognition of them as imposed by "another and a higher Person," Mr. Sidgwick calls in question the soundness of this doctrine in the following forcible words:—

> Martineau himself admits—or I should rather say emphatically declares—that it is not a Person regarded apart from moral attributes that can be conceived as the source of the authority of which we are speaking; it is, he says, "an inward Rule of Right which directs the action of God's power, and which elevates into Authority what else would only operate as a necessity or a bribe." If, then, moral rules, when conceived as Divine commands, are thought to have authority not because they emanate from an Omnipotent Person, but only because they emanate from a person who wills in accordance with a rule of right, I cannot conceive how they should lose this authority even if the "other person" is eliminated altogether, provided that the "Rule of right" is left. I am not now arguing whether a true philosophical conception of the rule of right would not recognise that the cognition of such a rule as a thought valid for all minds, involves the recognition of a Thinker—an eternal and universal subject of this and all other thought. What I am now arguing is that the "authoritativeness" or "obligatoriness" of the rule is not necessarily connected with this implication in Truth of a Thinker who thinks what is true.

It appears to us that Sidgwick's criticism is here substantially valid, and indeed the position which is contended for in this extract is, as Sidgwick himself elsewhere admits, virtually implied in many passages of Martineau's writings. There is no more characteristic feature of Martineau's ethical theory than his doctrine that moral principles are founded not on the Will of God but on the essential Nature of God; hence it is that they are immediately and intuitively discerned to carry with them a divine authority and to be a self-revelation of the immanent Eternal; and the question whether this Eternal One can be adequately conceived as a "Person" is a further question, the answer to which cannot legitimately be made a prior condition to the recognition of the divine authority of the moral law. Dr. Martineau himself emphatically declares that Ethics naturally precedes Theology; but he also contends, and we think rightly, that a correct and adequate reading of the facts of the moral consciousness affords the securest basis on which to erect a true theology. We regard, then, Sidgwick's strictures on that account of the nature of Moral Authority which is given in the chapter under that title in the "Types of Ethical Theory" as both sound and seasonable; but we believe, at the same time, that it is not this view of moral authority but rather the view for which Sidgwick contends which practically animates and dominates Dr. Martineau's greatest writings; and it is to this that he gives expression when he describes God not as "another Person," but as "the Soul of Souls."

The second lecture discusses a subject on which Sidgwick and Martineau appear to be quite at variance—namely, the question whether our moral judgments are primarily directed on the worth of the motives and affections which prompt to action or simply on the value for society of the action itself. Martineau maintains that "what we judge is always the inner spring of an action as distinguished from the outward operation." Sidgwick goes so far in Martineau's direction as to admit that

> The notions of Right and Wrong and the corresponding sentiments seem in the strictly ethical sense to be peculiar to actions viewed on their psychical side—to volitions, but I contend that there is nothing inconsistent with Utilitarianism in holding that the specific moral judgment of approbation is properly directed to human volitions only, while still holding that the ultimate criterion of right volitions is that they should be such as tend to produce in the greatest degree consequences of a certain kind—namely, general happiness. But it may be said: Suppose a worse intention would produce a better result, would you then approve it more? If I were convinced that this was the case, I certainly should.

We cannot but think that in the latter part of this quotation Sidgwick inaccurately described his own moral consciousness; he could not morally approve a worse intention, for it is not possible to abstract an intention from the character of the agent who intends. The fact that many people from purely selfish motives make ostentatious gifts to charities does not lead us to judge that there was something morally admirable either in the intention or in its consequent action.

The third lecture criticises Dr. Martineau's account of Prudence and of Merit and Demerit, but it contains nothing, we think, which Martineau has not considered and adequately answered.

The final lecture on "Springs of Action" is a repetition, with some interesting additions, of the criticism of Dr. Martineau's ethical theory which is given in the "Methods of Ethics." It is generally admitted by competent thinkers that Sidgwick has been successful in showing that Martineau's conception of springs of action, and of the process whereby we discover their relative ethical rank, requires considerable modification. But, as Dr.

Mellone has conclusively shown in a luminous chapter in his able work on "Philosophical Criticism and Construction," when all the claims of criticism have been fairly met, there still remain intact the fundamental principles of Dr. Martineau's ethical system—namely, that we have a faculty for discovering the relative worth of our springs of action, and that the essence of morality consists in the use which we make of our moral freedom in siding with or against the higher of the principles of conduct which in moments of temptation simultaneously present themselves as competitors in our inner life. THE DOCTRINE OF THE CROSS.*

LIFE is not long enough to allow of final judgments. It is consumed in hearing the evidence. Nevertheless, in the experience of the race and the individual we become able, for the guidance of practical life, to determine of many things what they are not, and are thus set free to experiment with new hypotheses as to what they are. But it is not given to all at the same moment to exchange an old hypothesis for a new one. Hence the co-existence of schools of thought so little in sympathy as the evangelical and theistic. For, speaking from the standpoint of the latter, we might have supposed that whatever place might be found permanently to belong in theology to a doctrine of atonement, the transactional theory of atonement was, in whatsoever of its modifications, sub-divisions or refinements, relegated to the limbo of a defunct Psychology. Not that it could be supposed to have lost its hold upon a large number of religious minds; but that it was rather nowadays the property of the Convention Platform than of the student's study; of the market-place, not the factory, of a theological equipment.

But here we have another attempt to rehabilitate it in the plausible guise of a working hypothesis; nay, of something very like a dogma. And there is something more in this book to commend it to our attention than the interest which must belong to such an effort. For in the personality of its author we have to recognise an ex-Unitarian minister who will seem to many to speak with the authority of a personal experience in summing up the claims of contending theologies. So far as this may be we shall not enter into controversy.

A certain temperament, or a certain type of religious experience, or a certain degree of mental penetration, must determine for each (where it is not all settled by habit or surroundings) the type of his theology.

If Mr. Walker once professed Unitarianism, and (as we are told by a writer in the Expository Times†) was repelled by "its cold intellectualism, its practical impotence, or its indifference to the person or work of Christ," may we not justifiably conclude that he had attempted an experience for which he was not ripe? Defects of this kind—and we do not deny their existence—belong to Unitarians, not to Unitarianism. We can scarcely imagine a man revising his theology on the basis of such an objection. Or does it become possible to swallow the creeds the moment you become convinced that the majority of those who cannot do so are lacking in emotional excitability? At all events, Mr. Walker's soul began to feel chilly and uncomfortable without its ecclesiastical mufflers, and he was not long in weaving robes for himself of such excellent homespun as a former volume (reviewed at the time in these columns) admirably described.

And now he comes before us again with this book, a veritable store-house of warm clothing, whereto shivering Evangelicals may resort to readjust the temperature of emotions grown chill in the bleak borderlands which at once unite and divide the Congregational from the Unitarian Confessions.

Those of us who have either grown used to the climate, or are not afflicted with a slow spiritual circulation, or prefer rather to be chilly and active than warm and encumbered by our wrappings, are not likely to spend much time at this new Emporium. But it is interesting to look in at the windows as we pass by.

The title of the volume is not without a special significance for its author's life-history. The Cross and the Kingdom, as viewed by Christ Himself and in the light of Evolution. Let us note his treatment of the theme under each of these sub-headings.

I.—As viewed by Christ Himself.

This consumes the first four of the five parts into which the book is divided. The first finds that Christianity without the Cross in its evangelical interpretation is stultified, and therefore postulates it à priori. The second considers the genuineness of the references of Jesus to the fact and significance of his death, with special reference to the criticism of Pfleiderer; and thus clears the way for part three, which elaborates the opinions of Jesus on those subjects. The fourth part treats of the necessity, nature, and efficacy of the Cross, in relation to human nature and history.

To criticise in detail would be to restate the whole Atonement controversy; and we must perforce assume a general familiarity with the issues as between the Evangelical and Theistic view.

As a professed truth-seeker (see preface), and not a man committed to the reiteration of cut and dried epigrams, we can hardly commend to Mr. Walker a more salutary exercise than that of putting a note of interrogation against most of the general propositions which make his pages bulk so much larger in argument than they do in convincingness, and reconsidering them in the light of that little quære.

To quote a few instances.

(P. 8).—There is, doubtless, an undogmatic Christianity which is not without influence in the world to-day. . . . But it must not be forgotten that these aspirations have really been kindled (however remotely it may seem) by influences that have radiated forth from a circle, the centre of which has been the cross of Christ in its evangelical interpretation. (?)

(P. 18).—The illumination we rejoice in could never have come save through that Evangelical interpretation of the cross which we know, as a matter of historical fact, did bring it. (?)

(P. 22).—There is nothing more wonderful on earth than this unanimous and identical Christian experience; and it is entered on always in the same way, through faith in the revelation of God's forgiving love in the cross of Christ. (?)

(P. 27).—Throughout all Christian time, wherever this gospel has been preached, in every clime and in every nation, men and women have found salvation through believing. There is no more patent or more remarkable fact in the history of the world and in the experience of men than this. (?)

Besides requiring the usual (?) this statement may be resolved into a little constellation of queries. Have they "found salvation" by virtue of belief in "the Cross" in any other reality than may be predicated of many who had no faith in "the Cross"? That men have "found salvation" (in the sense of attaining to the higher possibilities of human life) with even the crudest and most repulsive theories of Atonement we do not question. But it was rather in spite of, than because of such theories; and quite independently, may we not think, of any theory? The theory comes later as an explanation of the spiritual experience. Moreover, there is a very real sense in which any man anywhere at any time can "find salvation through believing." It is simply through believing. It is a subjective experience and not to be held to establish an objective validity.

"Thou wilt keep him in perfect Peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

He is kept in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on anything. It is when the doubt begins that the peace departs. A claim such as that Mr. Walker makes for his doctrine of the Cross could equally be established by a Hindoo, or Mahometan. Comte mentions a man who used to derive spiritual solace and a sense of stability from meditating upon the hypothetical immovable spot in the centre of the hypothetical whirlpool of the universe. This is sentiment; scarcely argument. Of all that might be said upon the discussion of the Cross in its relation to the Kingdom, we can here only instance one more point; that to quote the precedent of the Passover as the type and parallel of the death of Jesus is to explain nothing.

A crude superstitious rite of a barbarous nomadic tribe of Semites is not to be held to establish any doctrine of God's method of educating and "saving" the human race unless it can first be shown (which Mr. Walker does not attempt to do) that the Passover was itself established by unique and indisputable "revelation" of the kind he intends by such a term as "Evangelical doctrine."

II.—We have left no space to discuss the last part of the book, and fear to seem unjust to Mr. Walker by compressing our judgment into a single phrase.

Suffice it therefore to say that in our opinion, if Mr. Walker will reconsider the rest of his volume, the last part will not escape much modification from the necessary correlation of their fundamental ideas.

In conclusion we are glad to find much in this book with which we can express sincere assent. Our differences are not so much in respect of the facts of religious experience as of the attempted explanation of those facts. We recognise in common the conflict that exists between good and evil, and the redemptive efficacy of lives sacrificed in such conflict. Yet in the Cross we see no dramatic presentation of an object-lesson by God to man; but rather a witness to the love of God in that it is the supreme instance of the love of man, leading us to look for a source of such devoted self-surrender not in man and his known littleness, but in the ultimate character of God Himself.

"THE HIBBERT JOURNAL."*

WE have already stated our conviction that this second number of the Hibbert Journal more than maintains the high promise of the first. To the first number Sir Oliver Lodge contributed an article on "The Outstanding Controversy between Science and Faith," which stated a problem but ended without any conclusive grappling with it, yet gave no hint that more was to follow. Now, however, we have a further article on "The Reconciliation between Science and Faith," which is a continuation and completion of the first, and is full of vivid interest and fascinating speculation. Sir Oliver shows how short-sighted "orthodox or present-day science" is, if it denies the presence of the living God throughout the Universe, and how unwise is that kind of religious thought which looks for the manifestations of Deity only in exceptional occurrences. "If His action is not visible now, it never will be, and never has been visible."

We can see Him now if we look; if we cannot see, it is only that our eyes are shut.

"Closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands and feel":—Poetry, yes—but also science; the real trend and meaning of science, whether of orthodox "science" or not.

Then follows a section on the truth to be found in Pantheism, when rightly apprehended, in justification of that faith which recognises that the high spiritual attributes of man must have their counterpart in God. As to Divine activity in the world, science ought not to be blind to such considerations as these:—

> Take the origin of species by the persistence of favourable variations, how is the appearance of those same favourable variations accounted for? Except by artificial selection, not at all. Given their appearance, their development by struggle and inheritance and survival can be explained; but that they arose spontaneously, by random chance without purpose, is an assertion which cannot be made. Does anyone think that the skill of the beaver, the instinct of the bee, the genius of a man, arose by chance, and that its presence is accounted for by handing down and by survival? What struggle for existence will explain the advent of Beethoven? What pitiful necessity for earning a living as a dramatist will educe for us Shakespeare? These things are beyond science of the orthodox type; then let it be silent and deny nothing in the Universe till it has at least made an honest effort to grasp the whole.

And there are further considerations, which must challenge the attention of orthodox science, in the facts which are being gathered as to other human faculties—Premonition, Inspiration, Prevision, Telepathy—which suggest relations with higher spiritual beings, and a life for man not bounded by his material environment as at present understood. It is a progressive life to which we are called, in which the spiritual must transcend the merely animal. Thus Sir Oliver declares his faith:—

> Let us be thankful we have got thus far, and struggle on a little further. It is our destiny, and whether here or elsewhere it will be accomplished.
> We are God's agents, visible and tangible agents, and we can help; we ourselves can answer some kinds of prayer, so it be articulate; we ourselves can interfere with the course of inanimate nature, can make waste places habitable, and habitable places waste. Not by breaking laws do we ever influence nature—we cannot break a law of nature, it is not brittle, we only break ourselves if we try—but by obeying them. In accordance with law we have to act, but act we can and do, and through us acts the Deity.

We shall be tempted to return to the consideration of the fascinating speculation which follows this passage, as to the relations of our higher life with other spiritual beings in this great Universe of God, and here only note the conclusion of Sir Oliver Lodge's article: "The region of Religion and the region of a completer science are one."

Following this article, which holds the first place in the Journal, is an eloquent vindication by Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, of the capacity of human thought to deal with the ultimate questions of religion. "The Present Attitude of Reflective Thought towards Religion" is the title of Professor Jones's article, which appears to us calculated to awaken a noble enthusiasm in the pursuit of the highest ends of life.

While Science "moves onwards with a stately power that seems irresistible, revealing the order of nature, ameliorating the practical conditions of human life, and changing the very foundations of civilisation in so far as they depend upon a physical basis," and thus demonstrates the practical effectiveness of human reason, there has been a widespread scepticism as to its capacity for grappling effectively with ultimate problems. It is against this scepticism that Professor Jones protests, and with convincing power. There are already signs in the present time of a wiser attitude of mind:—

> This age of faith in natural science is also an age which believes in God and in the immortal realities of the world of spirit. It is not sceptical of morals and religion, even if it does despair of a theory of them: If there are any speculations to which it would listen with even less patience than it can bring to pretentious theological or metaphysical systems, they are those which would nullify religion or stultify ethical distinctions, and represent the difference between honour and interest, virtue and vice, morality and expediency as social artifices or conventional contrivances which have no root in the nature of things.
> If, on the one hand, it must be acknowledged that the official exponents of religion exercise less authority over men's minds than in the past, it may be maintained, on the other, that this age is pre-eminently willing to listen to its poets, and that it is pre-eminently characteristic of these poets to dwell upon the profoundest convictions regarding the spiritual life of man. It is no formal difference that divides the inspired spiritualism of Wordsworth, the melodious piety of Tennyson, and the strenuous ardour of Browning's religious faith, from the pert secularism of the age of Pope. And there is no surer index of the spirit of a people than its imaginative literature. The poets are the best exponents of their time; they give utterance, as no others can, to the dim thoughts that blindly move around the public heart. And men to whom the official theology has come to seem the empty sound of hollow ignorance, listen to these poets not without reverence, and find in their melodious thoughts what moves them to believe that the voice which spoke of old by Job and Isaiah still speaks in the spirit of man, and still reveals itself in the loveliness of nature and the confused grandeur of human history.

We could not forbear making this long quotation, which, we trust, will send many readers to an earnest study of Professor Jones's article. If we did not fear to trespass too freely we should add to this another passage (on p. 243) further marking the contrast between eighteenth-century and present modes of thought. But one other brief statement of the author's position we must be allowed in his own words:—

> Science has lifted the conception of the universality of law into a conscious postulate of thought, and a return to the old cataclysmic alternative is recognised as the betrayal of the interests of the intelligence. At the same time the constant pressure of the living presence of the moral world is in nowise less felt, and the validity of the conceptions of freedom, personality, duty, responsibility, right and wrong is not more easily denied. We are able to forego neither knowledge nor morality and religion; we are willing to suppress neither rational inquiry nor our aspirations after moral goodness and communion with God. Nor are we able to settle the dispute.

And yet Professor Jones is confident that it can be settled. It is not really religion and reason which are in conflict, but the present theories of speculative and theological thinkers. It is these which must be revised, by a truer interpretation of human experience. It is a problem, Professor Jones says in conclusion, which must occupy many minds for a long time, to the solution of which "no individual can make more than a tentative and exiguous contribution." Yet as we read these pages we are stimulated to a better hope, and are thankful for their prophetic power.

Of Dr. John Watson's article on "James Martineau: A Saint of Theism," we have already spoken, and the further contents of this rich number we must reserve for a second notice. We have dwelt here on the two first articles, in order to show with some fulness what positive value the Hibbert Journal offers to thoughtful minds. To poor scholars and ministers it will be worth some sacrifice to secure possession of these successive numbers, and there ought not to be a Free Library in the country, nor any other library that aims at being abreast of the vital thought of the day, in which they are not to be found.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE place of honour in the Contemporary this month, as we have already noted, is given to Dr. Fairbairn's article on "James Martineau." Another article of special interest to our readers is that by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed on "Robert Browning," which contains some criticism, as well as appreciation, of Mr. Stopford Brooke's volume, and points out the liberties which Browning took with nature, topography and history in the work of his vivid imagination. Sir Frederick Maurice contributes a very suggestive study of "National Health," from a soldier's point of view, and Professor Jannaris writes on "The 'Encyclopædia Biblica' and the Gospels." His knowledge of Greek, ancient and modern, makes the professor bold, and he is the author of more than one interesting, if not convincing, excursion into Biblical apologetics. Thus in the Monthly Review also, he has an article on "The Fourth Gospel and John the Apostle," in which he makes some original suggestions as to the Proem of the Fourth Gospel and the story of the Transfiguration, on which it will be interesting to have the judgment of other scholars. The interest of the Painters of Japan appears to be inexhaustible, for to this number of the Monthly Mr. Arthur Morrison contributes a sixth illustrated article on the subject.

The Nineteenth Century and After opens with two articles on the Education Act, Mr. Lathbury, editor of the Pilot, declaring that to the clergy who understand their duty and the position of dependence on the managers, to which the new measure has reduced them, it must be intolerable, and they must work for a uniform system of State schools, with the right of entry for the clergy and other religious teachers, for the instruction of their own children; while on the other hand Dr. Guinness Rogers defines the Nonconformist position. Dr. Rogers justifies the passionate indignation felt by Nonconformists throughout the country at the position in which they are placed by the Act, but is unconvinced by the arguments of those who advocate the non-payment of rates. This policy he regards as both indefensible and inexpedient.

To say the least, such a refusal is so closely akin to lawlessness that Nonconformists who have been nursed on entirely different traditions may well hesitate before adopting it. It is at once the privilege and the duty of citizens in a Free State to secure the triumph of their principles by an appeal to the intelligence of the whole community. We are at present in a minority in Parliament. Our business is to convert that minority into a majority, and in order to do this to demand that, as soon as possible, the country be consulted on the subject. It has been seriously argued that there is nothing left for us to do except to submit to distraint of our goods, and even to imprisonment, rather than pay a tax of which our consciences disapprove. But surely the work of converting a number of our fellow-countrymen sufficient to reverse the present decision in favour of the Bill is work enough.

An article on "The Ripon Episode," setting the Dean's pronouncements side by side with statements in the Bishop's "Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures," recently noticed in these columns, and other liberal utterances in the Oxford essays, "Contentio Veritatis," is interesting chiefly because the author, Mr. Walter R. Cassels, avows himself the author of "Supernatural Religion." Miss Annie Gladstone makes a very spirited reply to recent somewhat depreciatory criticisms by Mr. W. F. Lord, in her article "Another View of Jane Austen's Novels," and Lady Gwendolen Ramsden offers some pointed and salutary criticisms of present-day morals and manners, in reply to the question "Is Society worse than it was?" One passage may be quoted:—

Honesty has always been reckoned one of the essential qualities of every member of society, and when it concerns gambling and racing is strictly adhered to. But in other matters not connected directly with friends and acquaintances some people have very lax ideas on the subject. To be so extravagant as to buy more than can possibly be paid for is certainly cheating, though not, perhaps, of the same kind as Society blames most. And this is done by many without shame or remorse for the ruin it often causes to the tradespeople. There are women, for instance, who indulge in every kind of extravagance they cannot afford, and at the same time are willing enough to give away money which is not theirs, thereby gaining the credit of being charitable. In a few instances they have even been heard preaching to working girls on the desirability of dressing quietly and being respectable. It is doubtful if such incongruity and hypocrisy were practised a hundred years ago.

The World's Work, the new "illustrated magazine of national efficiency and social progress," edited by Mr. Henry Norman, M.P., has received, as it deserves, a most cordial welcome from public men, including the Leader of the Opposition, and from the Press, and the second number, published this month, shows no falling-off from the excellence and varied interest of the first. There are this month remarkable full-page portraits of the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. John Redmond, M.P., and Canon Hensley Henson, and the illustrated articles on such subjects as "Garden Cities in Theory and Practice," "Toy Making in France," "A Day's Work in a Newspaper Office," and "Winter Sports," are both fascinating and instructive in a high degree. A short article on the proposed Suspended Electric Railway for Berlin shows two pictures of the suspension railway already at work in Elberfeld. The cars suspended on a single rail are said to turn corners at a speed and with safety unattainable on any other method.

From the editor's opening notes on "The March of Events" we may make two quotations. On "Mr. Chamberlain in South Africa," after recounting the various problems he has to face, it is said:—

His success in dealing with them will depend upon the recognition of the truth that the well-being of the Empire in South Africa is bound up with conduct and honesty, qualities which have not been too conspicuous there in the past. His journey sets a new and a remarkable precedent; he has the combination—always so attractive to a strong man—of a very difficult task and a magnificent opportunity; every consideration of personal reputation and ambition will spur him on; every one of his countrymen will wish him all success, so long as his efforts tend to secure fair dealing toward all the different elements of South African society, and all its varied interests.

A note on Education concludes with the following judgment:—

Educationally the Bill removes the more potent forces which have made for educational progress, and with a little levelling up here and there the general effect of an amiable dead level and indifference may be expected. The reforms which have come by leaps and bounds from the persistent efforts of a few enthusiasts on School Boards, constantly reinvigorated by recurring appeals to the mass of the electorate, will cease. A gentle ambling progress, inspired more by philanthropy than by determined zeal, is the best that can be hoped for. Even this will be checked by various technical difficulties created by the Bill. The separation of the higher instruction of the industrial classes from the schools in which they receive their elementary instruction is likely to act like a killing frost upon the tender shoots of a growth still in its early stages.

The Review of Reviews begins this month a new series, and for the cover which in the course of thirteen years has grown very familiar, substitutes another of more artistic design, with three emblematic figures: "Man, the worker, grasping hand on terms of frank equality with the woman, the mother, at whose feet lies the babe in the cradle, which holds the Future in its hands." A new and curious feature is also introduced into the Review itself, in the form of a thread of fiction, which is to have no end, and on which is to be strung a record of current history. The month's character sketch is of "The Party of the Future," aiming at the ideal of a Co-operative Commonwealth.

SHORT NOTICES.

Phases of the Land and Labour Question, by A. J. Ogilvie. We learn from an advertisement on the cover of this pamphlet that Mr. Ogilvie is a Tasmanian landowner, and he certainly shows himself disinterested and independent in pleading as he does for land nationalisation. His arguments are strong, and his acute reasoning has earned high praise from Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace. Some of his papers here are extremely good, and well calculated to stir up thought as well as to convey useful information; for instance, the one on Old Age Pensions. All the more, therefore, must we regret that the pamphlet bears no date, and that its essays have not been revised to bring them up to recent legislation. Here is a paper headed, "Compensation to Injured Workmen," which begins, "The law is that workmen——" and states what the law used to be in England, and may still be in our Colonies, but not what the law is in England now. Yet there is nothing to warn the reader that the book is not describing present English conditions, and our Land Nationalisation Society, with its influential supporters, and its grand propaganda before it, is ill-advised in publishing cheap reprints in a form so likely to mislead. (London: Land Nationalisation Society. 6d.)

Supernatural Religion. An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Popular edition, carefully revised. This well-known book, which appeared originally in 1874-7, is an examination of the claims of dogmatic Christianity to be a divine revelation. It opens with a discussion of miracles in general, and then carries out a minute investigation into the value of the Christian documents as historical witnesses. Its conclusions are strongly negative to the idea of the miraculous, and it affirms that the Christian Scriptures are not of a quality to authenticate the miracles they report. Aided by some curiosity as to its authorship, the book attracted considerable attention on account of the scale on which it was drawn up, the extent of its acquaintance with the literature of its subject, its independence, its vigour of assertion, and its polemical anti-supernatural bias. Lightfoot ("Essays") and Sanday ("Gospels in the Second Century") were able to correct some exaggerations and misstatements in the critical portion of the book, and to show that more was to be said for the documents than had been allowed; but as to the main argument the flowing tide was with the destructive critic. The secret as to the authorship was remarkably well preserved, but though the present edition remains anonymous, Mr. Walter R. Cassels has now publicly acknowledged his work—e.g., in the current Nineteenth Century and After. The wisdom of reissuing the work at this date is open to question. It may be true, as Professor Adeney declares in the new number of the Hibbert Journal, that the writer's conception of miracle is stale and antiquated; it certainly is true of some parts of his treatment of the New Testament. He has added a new chapter on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," some fresh matter dealing with Tatian's "Diatessaron," and with the relation of Luke to Josephus, and has incorporated from his later editions a discussion of the martyrdom of Ignatius. But it was not possible by any mere process of revision and addition to overtake nearly thirty years of fertile labour in New Testament criticism. (Issued for The Rationalist Press Association, Ltd. This month's Cornhill opens with a remarkable article by Madame Sarah Bernhardt on "The Moral Influence of the Theatre," which contains some vivid narrative of her own experiences, and an earnest plea for the theatre, as concentrating in itself the highest forms of art, and in its powerful representations of life making distinctly for righteousness. On this crucial question, Madame Bernhardt writes:—

Victor Hugo said, "Never should the people leave the theatre without taking away with them some profound moral lesson." This thought is the inspiration of all idealists, for the stage should be the great school of morality in which the lessons of life appeal to all. If writers were more in accord with Victor Hugo's ideal, we should not see so many pieces which do so much harm, as they familiariso the mind with vice without showing its immorality. The immorality does not, in my mind, consist in what it represents but in the confusion of ideas which it causes. When any young man says at the close of a piece: "I end by not being able to distinguish vice from virtue," you can be sure that it is a bad piece, for is it not the duty of art to show the moral teaching?

This article was obtained and translated by Miss Rachel Challice, the only one which Mme. Bernhardt has ever written. In the same number of Cornhill Mr. Seton Merriman begins a new story, "Barlasch of the Guard." In Good Words will be found an illustrated article by Mr. W. G. Collingwood on "Ruskin's Bibles." A "New Life of the late C. H. Spurgeon" is begun in the Sunday Magazine. To the Sunday Strand Mr. H. Leach contributes an article on "Herbert Schmalz" as a great sacred artist. Members of the Unitarian Workers' Union Welsh party last summer will be interested in an article by Mr. H. M. Vaughan in the English Illustrated on "Cardigan and the Valley of the Teifi," in which, starting from Llandyssul, the valley, full of picturesque beauty and historical interest, is graphically described.

TEACH children first self-control; teach them secondly the doing of good deeds to others.—P. C. Mozoomdar.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HAVE any of the little folks who read this column ever watched the poor little starved sparrows in the hottest part of summer?

What? you say, starved in the summer? Yes. Absolutely starved, and not only sparrows, but many other little birds; but only sparrows appeared to be in need in my garden last year, and I cannot explain why other birds did not come in like distress or where they found food in sufficient quantities to keep them away, for in winter I can sometimes count ten different kinds of birds one morning. In the hot, dry summers the ground is so dry and hard their little beaks cannot pierce it, and the corn is not yet ready for them to plunder, and most of the small fruit has already been picked, so what are the poor little things to do?

I will tell you about some thirty or more of these little "feathered children" who were my constant companions last summer.

To begin with, I must explain that I spend many hours daily living in the open-air in my little town-garden, and the birds are so accustomed to my presence that they are never afraid of me.

One day I had been reading aloud to my little boy, from Mrs. Brightwen's "Wild Nature won by Kindness," and it was the chapter upon this same distress of the little birds in the dry, hot summer days.

Although I read and wondered, I foolishly did not apply the knowledge gained just then, but as I was leaving the garden in the evening I noticed a few poor thin little sparrows pecking the few crumbs they could find from the top of a drain-grid and looking very miserable on that beautiful evening.

I at once thought of the story I had read in the morning, so I put out a thick round of brown bread nicely softened with milk, and was more than repaid—nay, even reproached, for not doing so earlier in the day.

Next morning, so selfish is the human creature, that no thoughts of the little sparrows troubled me, and I never thought of spreading another feast until I became quite disturbed by the anxious twittering of birds. When I looked up they were not in the trees, but quite twenty or more thin, starved-looking little creatures were gathered round my chair not more than three feet away, and they pleaded so plaintively I knew at once they were asking for help. Then the memory of those few little thin birds on the drain-grid of last night came back to my mind.

This was about eleven o'clock in the morning. I put almost half a loaf out this time, and in less than an hour all was gone.

I had no intention of giving more that day, but at four o'clock in the afternoon the same twittering began, and the number was increased, so what could I do but yield? Every morning and afternoon for the next dry fortnight they had their two meals a day. As time went on I thought I would try if sparrows are as greedy as some say they are, so once or twice I put a third meal out at two o'clock; but although many of the birds were in the trees about me, not one would take his second meal until a sort of order seemed to pass from what I judged to be one of the head birds about the regular four o'clock feeding-time.

You can imagine my summer was much brightened by these little friends. My little boy put out an open cage every day, hoping one little bird would go in and stay with him. I should not have allowed him to keep it, and never imagined one would go in, so I did not object to the cage being there; but one morning he came to me almost too excited to speak, to say a father and mother bird were trying to teach one of their little ones to fly, and it had flown into a corner of his own little garden, so might he cage it?

I allowed him to do so for one hour, just for the joy of petting the little thing. We put it in and shut the door, and after a short time the parents came and fed it through the bars of the cage; so after watching it a little longer we gave them back their baby.

After a few hours the little bird gained strength to fly to a tree near by, but until we went to bed at night it had not succeeded in flying back to its own nest, but one of its parents was on a bough above watching.

In the morning we found it gone, and we saw it no more, or if we did it had lost its weakly baby look and we did not know it from others of its tribe.

THE seventy-third anniversary of the founding of the Brahmo Somaj by Raja Ram Mohun Roy will be celebrated at Cambridge to-day and to-morrow (Sunday). Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Manchester College, Oxford, will deliver an address at the Conference of Brahmos on Sunday at 3 P.M. (64, Jesus-lane) on "Brahmoism: Its Place in Modern Religious Thought." The Divine Services will be conducted by Mr. B. C. Ghosh, M.A. (Cantab), and Mr. P. K. Sen, B.A. (Cantab).

THE Co-operative Holidays Association has existed about ten years, and has achieved remarkable success in providing for large numbers of guests health-giving and educational holidays at a moderate cost, together with pleasant companionship. The good-fellowship which has come into being at holiday times has given rise to the desire "to meet again" in the winter months. A social meeting of "holiday members" in Manchester continued the unconventional freedom of the open-air summer life in the midst of the city gloom. Professor Chapman heartily commended the attempt to teach simplicity in living, and described the Association as a protest against "the absurd and hideous luxury of the age." "We must keep before us the ideal of simplicity, and we must make our holidays as simple and useful as possible; especially must we be simple in our dress and food." One thing which helps to produce the mutual goodwill of the visitors to the holiday homes is fellowship in service, guests doing various things for themselves and one another which at a hotel or boarding-house are done by servants. It is well known that the founder and organising secretary cherishes the desire for the utmost simplicity and the minimum of paid service, and later developments have gone further in this direction. The result is simplicity, economy, comradeship; and a delightful holiday is made possible for many to whom the ordinary boarding-house or hotel is impossible.

IN SELF-FORGETFULNESS.

THE true life of Churches, as of individuals, we said last week, is not in self-seeking, but in self-forgetfulness. The urgency of work for the Kingdom of GOD and testimony to Divine truth must always have the first place, before any thought of what may be called denominational interest. There is, indeed, here the same great spiritual law as in other relations of life. Whoever would save his life shall lose it: he that is willing to lose his life in service of the Highest shall find it in a richer, fuller measure than was even dreamt of before.

And that very denominational interest, if it mean a desire for healthy vigour and effective union of our churches in one close-knit fellowship, will undoubtedly be best served by self-forgetfulness, which is too eagerly engaged in active service to have time for introspection, or is occupied with the machinery of organised effort only for the sake of perfecting the instrument which has a definite work to do.

We believe whole-heartedly in our churches and their mission in the world, and in the great truths of the religious life to which as Unitarians we bear witness. But truth will prosper according as clear and resolute thinkers are also faithful doers of the Word, and our churches will be baptised anew into a spirit of rejoicing and triumphant faith as they realise to the full the service of the world's needs to which they are called and make the great surrender to that overmastering impulse to ministry in pure, unselfish love.

The claims of theological controversy in the past have been too apt to turn aside our thoughts from the ultimate purpose for which such self-vindication was demanded, and there has been a consequent impoverishment of spiritual life in the churches. The need is no less urgent now than in the past for clear and fearless utterance of the truth as we apprehend it, or rather, as it has possessed our souls and is the inspiring and ruling impulse of our life, and there are still occasions when direct theological controversy cannot be avoided. But the great testimony of the churches to Divine truth is not borne in that way, and it is hard indeed, when controversy occupies the pulpit, to avoid making self-vindication and criticism of others an end in itself, and thus falling into the pride of superior intelligence, which is a hateful marring of the true spirit of worship. Truth as the inspiration of life is the message of the Church, and is to be declared as far as possible in self-forgetfulness. This can be done with the full acknowledgment that truth is progressive, that we and others to whom things appear in different guise are yet being led onward to fuller vision and more blessed life, and our part is simply to declare that this is the way GOD has opened to us, here the Divine light is clearest to us, and with all the earnestness we can command we must seek to make it clear to our brethren. If there are those who have found what to them proves a more helpful way, we can rejoice with them in their strength and peace, and be emulous with them in good works; but for ourselves, we must bear our own testimony, and we know that there are many who are lonely and in the shadows of doubt, who have heavy burdens of misery and even of terror to bear, and to them we must offer the deliverance we have found, and the spiritual fellowship, which is the strength and joy of our life. A Church surrendered with humility and gladness to this ministry of helpfulness, has found the secret of the true life.

It is the same with regard to work. Self-interest is fatal to the highest beneficent activity of the Church. Deliverance into the larger life is found in absolutely unselfish service of the Kingdom of GOD. The Church that is self-conscious, that is occupied with thoughts of its own position and numbers, its relative strength, and its own virtues as compared with others, rather than with the work it is called to do, suffers from a restless fever which cripples strength and misses the secret of a happy life. Our churches ought to be bent simply on the complete fulfilment of helpful duty, eager to be spent in the service of the kingdom and the brethren. Demonstration of the truth may be regarded as part of that work, and the maintenance of a true place of worship, the home of spiritual rest and quickening, and of genuine Christian brotherhood. But then out of the strength of that union and that inspiration of the inward life, springs the steadfast service in the world, which must be, even more than the most eloquent word, the demonstration of Divine truth and power. The churches must forget themselves in the service of righteousness, through individual members and, wherever it is practicable, through corporate action, standing fast for the principles of true citizenship and national honour, with impartial judgment speaking out for justice, for compassion, ministering to the needy, grappling with the hard problems of the day, willing to share the heavy burdens of the least fortunate, bringers of light and the message of new hope into the darkest places of our common life. The Master went about doing good. Can we say that ultimately the Church is here for any higher purpose? or that without this any other purpose can be justified? The ills of self-conscious fretfulness are no longer remembered by those who have thrown themselves with strenuous devotion into such service, and in it have found their true life.

UNCONSCIONABLE LONGEVITY.

A WELL-KNOWN humorist reports that "it is said that the Unitarian denomination is decreasing." With Caledonian astuteness he will not commit himself beyond that safe entrenchment. Some "ancient myths" are full of thorns, and all brier bushes are not bonnie. It is well known that the Chinese, by a vigorous and persistent blowing of trumpets and beating of drums, can succeed in frightening away an eclipse. That is, no doubt, why they are called Celestials. It is not, perhaps, so well known that it is a common and cherished belief amongst our religious well-wishers that by periodically proclaiming from their denominational house-tops that the Unitarians are ceasing to be, they will succeed in bringing about their decease. Never did anything so wicked take such an unconscionable time in dying, never did pious but avaricious heirs so begrudge the longevity of feebleness. Perhaps a little thoughtless noise and bluster might help to hasten the end. It might at least cheer the dying to behold such animal spirits and to appreciate the hitherto unrevealed capabilities of the living. Blowing trumpets and beating drums has been a characteristic, time out of mind, of the Church triumphant. Without crowing on an elevation, how are your sleepy or dying neighbours to know that you are alive? Yea, a more excellent way of assuring a doubting world that you yourself are alive is by alleging that someone else is dying. And not only so, but by saying so with Chinese persistency. It may seem to the uninitiated or to the incredulous like a Chinese puzzle; but with grace to persevere (Ah! dear Lord, the chiefest) the end must come. There is Chinese warrant for it. The one thing we want first-hand evidence of is of our own decease. To take such a matter on hearsay betrays an ultra-Athenian love of some new thing. There is no mental state pleasanter than to be told so "sweetly and so cool" that you are dying; to see in the newspapers—those ephemeral works of fiction—the report of your approaching death, and yet to know "That sure the rogues they lied." It was the unexpected that happened, "The dog it was that died." "Beware of dogs," says the Apostle. Facts, figures, statistics, evidence leave us unmoved, un-dead. We subscribe, in a non-subscribing sense, to the Monroe doctrine.

Figures (of our decline) flit across our dream,
Muddle through and flicker out;
We remain,—
Some in cocksure blessedness,
Some in philosophic doubt.

But we remain, not merely are remains. Our wakefulness seems to thrive on a tendency to periodic slumber, our vitality seems to increase with our fatal proneness to seem to die. One of the celebrities I have not known said not long ago that his "reputation increased with every one of his failures." That is something like an obiter dictum. We could almost welcome death to have that for an epitaph. There is enough faith, hope and charity in it to build an all-comprehensive cathedral out of. The very thought of it and the newly invented painless detraction give us a new lease of life—not that we needed it yet. You cannot die while people are being interested in you. It would be sheer ingratitude, and display a lack of interest in anthropology.

A change of interest is the orthodox medical prescription for the protraction of Valetudinarianism, which, it is to be feared, people of soft sentiments and hard bigotry think is Unitarianism writ large. But how are we to die? It is not in the Category of Possibility. If Athanasius could, single-handed, hold the world at bay! But the experiment needs not yet to be repeated. The world is too much with us. Everyone one meets is a Unitarian of some kind, and everybody is modelled upon our fundamental principle, that nobody can believe what he cannot but what he can—except, indeed, the people who believe that we are going to die: people who believe that will believe anything, and they usually do. Once upon a time one of the old masters of Balliol, I believe, tried what effect it would have to write our name with a small "u." It was a joke, but hardly a capital one. It was a failure, and only increased our reputation; we might say, our mutual reputation. Some great men I have heard of considered it strategic to "let us go to the devil in our own way." We shall never die, for the simple reason that no sooner do outsiders cease to worry us into self-consciousness, than insiders take up the endless tale. The name Unitarian is not likely to die, either, for the equally simple reason that nobody will leave it alone, neither friend nor foe. It is the "pet aversion" we see of the new Moody and Sankey. Could any news be more refreshing to us than this? Never did moth or rust take to a bright and shining thing as all sorts and conditions of men take to this name, even when they don't intend to take to it. People try throwing cold water on us, but that, not unnaturally, seems to make us thrive the more, and we can always have a good supply free of tax. People used to indulge in the pleasant delusion that we were cold; but they soon found that to call people cold was the most infallible way of making them hot, and so their labour was in vain. Nor did we ever realise that the measure with which we were to mete was to be a thermometer. They feed us on locusts and wild honey in the wilderness, dry and unpalatable, but food of the harbinger of the coming Truth. If any man of us having witnessed the amazing doings of Conformity and Nonconformity in National and International affairs in recent years in the name of religion, has not loathed what he has seen, and is not proud of his Dissent and Descent, he deserves to die and his cause with him. There are fewer of the "Unitarian" Denomination than men surmise, but the remnant stands four square on the love of God and on the Love of Man, never consenting to kill nor to rob for burnt offering. We shall not die though every throat grow hoarse reiterating mortuus est—till Doomsday. That is a pretty German ballad of the Knight and the Squire and of the Epitaph in the Churchyard:

Propter nimium est est
Dominus meus mortuus est.

When we write the epitaph we shall also take warning against the vile habits of vain repetition and false prophecy.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE 117th annual meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 15th. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. WILLIAM COLFOX, and there were also present the Rev. Dr. Drummond (Principal), the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter (Case Lecturer), the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and C. Hargrove (Visitors), Mr. Charles W. Jones (Treasurer), the Revs. C. T. Poynting, P. M. Higginson, J. Wood, J. C. Street, D. Agate, T. Lloyd Jones, F. W. Stanley, George Evans, T. Robinson, R. T. Herford, P. Prime, H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, F. K. Freeston, A. Bennett, and V. D. Davis; Messrs. W. Long, Russell Scott, J. H. Brooks, G. W. R. Wood, G. H. Leigh, Grosvenor Talbot, R. Harrop, S. B. Worthington, T. Worthington, A. W. Worthington, P. S. Worthington, J. Dendy, H. P. Greg, R. Robinson, E. A. Steinthal, and J. W. Scott; the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and Mr. A. H. Worthington (Secretaries), and Mr. E. W. Marshall (Assistant Secretary).

The minutes of the June meeting of Trustees, together with the catch-words of minutes of subsequent Committee meetings, having been read and adopted, the TREASURER presented the accounts, which showed an income from investments of £2,363 14s. 11d., and annual subscriptions, £1,030 4s. 6d. The adverse balance of £326 7s. 4d. would have been much more if the balance of £167 13s. from the New Century Fund had not been transferred to the general account; but this, he said, they might regard not altogether with dissatisfaction, because it indicated an increase of expenditure due to the number of students at the College. There was no reduction of expenditure to be looked for, and what they really needed was an additional annual income of £500.

On the motion of Mr. E. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Mr. R. HARROP, the accounts were passed.

The PRESIDENT then submitted the Annual Address of the Committee, dwelling upon points of special interest.

The Address opened with a reference to the retirement of Professor Upton from the Chair of Philosophy, which he has held for twenty-seven years, as successor to Dr. Martineau, and embodied a resolution of grateful appreciation of his services, with an added request that Mr. Upton would hold the position of Professor Emeritus, "and continue to exercise that inspiring personal influence which has won for him the deep affection of so many generations of students." The Address, having congratulated Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton on the completion of their "Life of Dr. Martineau," recorded the losses sustained by the College during the past year through the death of valued supporters. Among these were Dr. Vance Smith, an old York student, and at one time a member of the College staff, afterwards Principal of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, and a member of the New Testament Revision Committee; Mr. William Rathbone, a trustee of the College since 1854, of whom it was said:—"A life of service of God and man, endowed with large means, all held in trust for the fulfilment of the single aim of a beneficent philanthropy as wise as it was generous, marked this great-souled layman, as true a minister of God as ever breathed"; Mr. Frank Taylor; Mr. Henry Tate, from whom a legacy of £1,000 was received; Miss Mary Ellen Martineau, Miss Lamport, Mr. I. M. Wade, and Mr. P. W. Clayden.

The Address gave particulars as to the students and their work, showing that for the session 1901-2 there were fourteen regular students, of whom the six who completed their course had entered on various ministerial engagements, while the new session opened with twelve regular students. The two special students, from India and Japan, Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., and Mr. Z. Toyosaki, are continuing their studies for a second session, and of the seven external exhibitioners six are at Oxford, preparing for graduation. The report as to the Residence was thoroughly satisfactory, and a number of gifts to the College were recorded.

The Address recorded and enforced the President's tribute at the June meeting to the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who had completed fifty years of service in the ministry and had rendered great services to the College; it referred with satisfaction to the public lectures given by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, as Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History, and to the foundation of a post-graduate scholarship at Carmarthen.

Concluding their Address, "after a year of service, gladdened by brightening prospects for the College," the Committee added this final paragraph:—

"But there is one further thought that has been in the mind of the Committee in these latest times. It is the sense of something wanting to enable the College to fulfil its high work for the Church of Christ—not as to its local habitation in its beautiful Oxford home, with all the fine influences of its surroundings, and not as to its teachers, with their devout learning and their Christian lives, but as to a spirit in the churches to whose cause the College is devoted, which will fill its class-rooms with their best and most cultured youth, to become ministers who will take a place second to none in their several communities, intellectually, socially, and religiously. It was one of the hopes, when the College was removed to Oxford, that it would draw in such as these. The hope has been but imperfectly fulfilled. Fine as are the characters and abilities of many of the students whom the College welcomes today, and who go out to be true ministers of Christ as they leave its walls, doing honour to their Alma Mater, the Committee regret that the College does not enrol as students the sons of the old families, in whose veins runs the blood of generations reared in the spirit of the unfettered religious liberty that characterised the churches founded by their Presbyterian ancestry. Would that their fathers' enthusiasm for the search for the truth of God, and their fathers' devout Christian faith, could enter their hearts and bring them to College, that they might bear aloft the banner of religion pure and undefiled as they pass beyond its threshold, to become ministers of their fathers' God!"

Appended to the Address was the following note:—

"Since the Address was passed by the Committee, and printed for circulation amongst the trustees, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., has received and accepted the appointment to the Chair of Philosophy, and will enter on his duties in October next."

The Rev. C. HARGROVE, in moving the adoption of the Address, recalled the fact that great changes had been made of recent years in the College, every one of which had been strongly opposed at the time, and had been the occasion of vehement discussion, but now not one of those changes was regretted. Among them was the establishment of the Residence for the students, which was now regarded with unanimous approval. He asked for further consideration of certain points in regard to the regulations and curriculum of the College.

Mr. W. LONG seconded the motion.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND spoke of the retirement of Professor Upton, which, he said, brought to them a great sense of loss in the severance of his long connection with the College; but they looked forward with high hopes to his successor, for in Mr. Jacks they had a man of strong personality, a strong and original thinker. They were fortunate to have secured a teacher of his calibre, and they confidently expected that he would exercise a great influence on the College.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING spoke of the gratitude they all felt to Dr. Drummond and Mr. Upton for what they had achieved in the Life of Dr. Martineau.

The motion for the adoption of the Address having been unanimously passed, Mr. Colfox was re-elected President, on the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, seconded by Dr. DRUMMOND, both of whom dwelt upon the great value of the President's services and of the loyalty of such a representative layman to the College.

Messrs. David Ainsworth, James Arlosh, and Harry Rawson having been re-elected Vice-presidents, the Rev. J. C. STREET proposed and Mr. R. ROBINSON seconded the appointment of the Committee, the last two names being those of new members, namely:—

The Rev. S. Alfred Steinthal (Manchester), the Rev. H. E. Dowson (Gee Cross), Mr. Harry Rawson (Manchester), the Rev. C. T. Poynting, (Withington), the Rev. P. M. Higginson (Eccles), Mr. Geo. W. Rayner Wood (Manchester), Mr. Robert Harrop (London), Mr. S. B. Worthington (Manchester), Mr. Russell Scott (London), Mr. A. H. Worthington (Manchester), the Rev. V. D. Davis (London), Mr. Chas. W. Jones (Liverpool), Mr. J. Howard Brooks (Wilmslow), Mr. Henry P. Greg (Styal), the Rev. Charles Hargrove (Leeds), Mr. William Long (Thelwall), Mr. David Ainsworth (Cleator), the Rev. Henry Gow (London), Mr. George H. Leigh (Swinton), Mr. Grosvenor Talbot (Leeds), Mr. Richard D. Holt (Liverpool), the Rev. F. K. Freeston (London), Mr. William Colfox (Bridport), Mr. J. W. Scott (Bolton), and the Rev. R. Travers Herford (Stand).

Mr. STREET, in proposing the Committee, said that it was with deep regret that they noticed for the first time the absence of the name of Mr. R. D. Darbishire from the list. They must all gratefully recognise the magnificent services he had rendered to the College.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON explained that the Committee would have been only too glad to have retained Mr. Darbishire among their number; it was only on his own insistence that his name had been dropped. They put his name as high as that of any who had done the best and truest and most self-sacrificing service to the College.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON added words of the warmest tribute to Mr. Darbishire. After Mr. Beard's retirement from the secretaryship he had the honour of being Mr. Darbishire's colleague, and that was a high privilege. If ever there lived a minister of God, he was one. His services were inspired with the best spirit of the College.

The treasurer and secretaries were then re-elected, with cordial acknowledgment of the value of their services, and Messrs. A. E. Steinthal and F. Nicholson were appointed auditors.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, and seconded by the Rev. DENDY AGATE, brought the meeting to a close.

THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

To the series of articles under this title contributed by Dr. J. H. Crooker, of Ann Arbour, Michigan, to the November Sunday numbers of the Springfield Republican we have already referred in our issues of Dec. 27 and Jan. 10.

The fourth article is on "Our Master of the Inner Life." Dr. Crooker vividly pictures the life of Jesus among his own people at Nazareth, amid the troubles of that time, and in contrast to the popular expectation of deliverance to be brought by the Messiah, sets the Master's truer spiritual ideal:—

"To Jesus this waiting for outward help was a sad delusion. The remedy they sought could never come. He saw that the Messiah must be born within every soul. The divine deliverance must unfold from within; the great thought that illuminates and the noble sentiment that stirs to action. What they needed was Inner Life—more truth to guide, more love to sanctify, more hope to uplift, more sympathy to quicken."

"Nothing that could transpire without them as a mere political event or social revolution could place them within the gates of paradise. The leaven of love must work within the soul before heaven could be reached. First the heavenly spirit in the heart and then the kingdom of heaven in the world. Let Rome, then, rule on, and the firmament stand; they could all, then and there, make of themselves a kingdom of heaven by growth and purity of soul! Have that Inner Life, then the soul is a kingdom at peace, the home is a paradise, the neighbourhood is a sanctuary, and the whole universe is an embodied smile of God! This was the gospel that Jesus went forth to teach; that his people might have eternal life, not as a future purchase, but as a present reality."

"To the wayside group that had come up from the hamlet nestling at the foot of the hill Jesus spoke the truths of the Spirit in simple words that befitted their majesty. To their wan, restless unbelief, that saw no present God, but expected one to come, he revealed the Father. He made the trees, the flowers, the birds, the clouds speak to that Divine Presence. He made them see the Infinite Beauty resting on field and sky. He made them share his feeling that he was indeed a child lying in the lap of Infinite Love. He aroused in them the consciousness of God as Indwelling Life!

"Jesus told the people of the wonderful things of love; how love for each other would give them a new life; how it would sweeten all occasions and rectify all wrongs; how it would make woman pure and high-minded, and man peaceful and clean-hearted; how it would do away with strife, and sorrow, and cruelty; how it would set the solitary together in families, restrain the wayward and establish justice and mercy throughout the world! He discovered to them the sphere of the Spirit and its marvellous riches of joy and peace. He told them how, if they took this sense of God as the Supreme Goodness and this holy love as a rule of life back with them into the hamlet its sorrows and evils would cease and each one would become a kingdom of heaven. The person who would thus rule his own soul and serve his brother would be greater than the man who should drive the Romans out of Jerusalem. Everyone who grows into an abundance of Inner Life reaches what the Son of Man cannot bestow. Salvation is not what is put on, but what is inwrought; not what exists without, but what grows within; not what transpires, but what inspires."

Such was the teaching of Jesus, in which we see him in a very different light from that reflected in subsequent theorisings of the Church, and its significance for our own life is thus brought home to us by Dr. Crooker:—

"As thought and love take hold of that sublime personality, standing not in miraculous and spectral isolation, but within the realm of humanity, we find our life growing sweeter and tenderer. We see no halo of mystical light about his head, but whenever we turn from his presence to the world we see all men robed in a new sanctity; so that we restrain our anger while we multiply our services of love. He is unto us a divine example and a powerful encouragement. The human nature that blossomed in him into such moral and spiritual beauty is ours also, to blossom likewise, if we but give it the warmth of love and the light of truth."

The concluding article of the series sets forth the true nature of the Authority of Jesus, which has, indeed, already become abundantly clear from the exposition of the previous articles. It is thus re-stated by Dr. Crooker:—

"We turn to a person of transcendent purity for spiritual authority. His character is an argument that texts, statistics and statutes can neither improve nor invalidate. Moral law incarnate in a gracious and heroic personality has an authority that no official ordination can confer, nor is it dimmed by the lapse of ages. 'We believe that holiness confers a certain insight,' wrote one great American prophet. Beauty pleases us, truth strengthens us, the good commands us. A genius charms us, a philosopher instructs us, the saint leads us. Art embellishes life and makes the world more attractive; learning trains and enriches the mind and makes life more dignified; religion, the artist of the good ideal, regenerates the soul and brings in a new kingdom of love. The imperial Augustus is a vague form to all but a few; the learned men of his time are barely known to the antiquarian; the merchants who supplied the wants of that gorgeous age are forgotten; but the Man of Nazareth, whose personality was a diviner parable than any that he spoke, has to-day supreme authority and creative power in cottage and in palace! The office of Jesus's authority is to make men like himself, so far as he stood for the essential truths of the spiritual life. In order that this result may follow, men must come into rational, sympathetic relation with his character. They must feed upon his spirit rather than recite dogmas that relate to his origin and rank. Belief in the miraculous birth of Jesus will no more make us like him than belief in the potency of the planetary influences at the birth of Angelo will make us master artists. The true authority of Jesus, like all spiritual influences, is not magisterial dictation, but personal inspiration and dynamic disclosure of truth."

"The authority of Jesus is in the fact that he made clear a better way of life as the builder of the first arch made plain a better method of handicraft. Jesus published and demonstrated in himself an essential fact, eternal in the construction of the moral order. Whoever has tried has found here the pathway to blessedness. Millions of men have made the experiment and reached the result. The world has moved steadily toward this point since his day. Here is his influence and authority. All this was felt at the beginning. At the end of the Sermon on the Mount it is recorded that Jesus 'taught them as one having authority.' He made this impression because he spoke out of his own experience directly to the hearts of his hearers. He spoke with power, because he spoke with simplicity and earnestness about great truths that were to him a personal discovery. He used scripture for illustration, but not as a dictum to overawe those who listened.

"The movement toward spirituality in religion—toward forgiveness that overcomes hatred and toward service as better than sacrifice—which he created, has been as irresistible as the flow of the mountain waters to the sea, because the authority of the facts which he revealed is as supreme as the law of gravitation. This influence is not, however, something supernatural and apart from our common human experience. The gospel is authoriative because natural and human, and therefore most truly divine."

Those are words pregnant with meaning, for which we are grateful to Dr. Crooker, and we must say once more how great a satisfaction it is, that such articles as these should have obtained the wide publicity ensured to them in the columns of the Springfield Republican. There are other passages which we should have been glad to reproduce here, but we shall cherish the hope that in book form we may meet again with Dr. Crooker's lucid and stimulating interpretation of the "Life of Lives."

Our Readers will be interested to hear that Dr. Crooker has accepted an invitation to preach the annual sermon of the B. and F.U.A. at the meetings in London next Whitsuntide.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ROBERT BLATCHFORD'S "BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH."

SIR,—Mr. R. Robinson's letter of Jan. 3 suggests that my article of Dec. 13, entitled "Robert Blatchford on Morals and Wages," does injustice to the book "Britain for the British." My first word in reply is that his letter does an injustice to me. He says that I "reviewed the book in an adverse fashion." He speaks of the "very one-sided and limited view taken of the whole book and its teaching by 'Laboris Amicus.'" I must point out to him how deliberately and distinctly I refrained from attempting that which he attributes to me. I did not review the book. I had intended to do so, but abandoned the idea in order to discuss a single doctrine of the book with some thoroughness. The very title of my article indicated that it would deal with a particular question. The article itself clearly stated the limits of its range. Mr. Robinson says he "finds" my quotations to be, "with one exception, from two chapters only out of nineteen." The word "find" implies discovery. But I myself said, "Let us look at our author's method of handling some one point. . . . Let us go to Chapters XIII. and XIV."

Not only so. I gave a whole paragraph of praise to Mr. Blatchford as a man and a writer. True, I did then raise the question, whether he is an "accurate thinker upon economic subjects or a wise political leader." And I accepted his extraordinary challenge—so boastful in tone, according to ordinary standards, and only excusable in a veritable prophet or a raw recruit in the art of thinking, a mere beginner who had never sounded the difficulties of any social problem—"I defy any man, of any nation, how learned, eminent, and intellectual soever . . . to refute the reasoning contained in this book." But, of course, to meet this defiance it was not necessary to deal with the whole book. That task would have required another book. All that was necessary, or possible in a short article, was to examine a crucial example of Mr. Blatchford's reasoning. And I thought that if even I, far behind a host of others in the qualifications named by him, could accept such a challenge, and show the challenger to be utterly and disastrously wrong in a vital and practical question, then some readers of "Britain for the British" might dare to doubt the writer's infallibility in other questions and might scrutinise more carefully other parts of the same book and other books of the same kind.

Of course, however, it is conceivable that a man may be even madly wrong in one piece of reasoning and yet faultless in every other, or that on one point his advice may be utterly vicious, and on all others supremely good. But I confess I am disappointed to find anyone ready to plead this kind of possibility in the present case. Mr. Robinson has not a word to say in defence of Mr. Blatchford's doctrine which I criticised. I am glad that the ground is so far clear. But, he says that the two chapters I dealt with are "not part of the main argument of the book contained in the first ten, or the practical political advice which is given in the last three, but are part of what may be described as side issues, outside buttresses of the argument of the book." And he cannot see that anything I urge "can be taken as controverting the main contention of the book in the first ten chapters." I had fain been spared more of that close examination which I desired to stimulate others to do for themselves. But as the questions involved are of the highest importance, I take up the modified challenge with which Mr. Robinson supports Mr. Blatchford's.

I must first take exception to the words with which Mr. Robinson slights my previous criticism. He has been drawn some way into that snare which is so tempting to an advocate—namely, the plea that a refuted argument has no significance and brings no discredit. He says that I have only touched an "outside buttress," a "side issue." This estimate seems to be based on mere verbal bulk. For surely no statement could be of graver import—if true, as a condemnation of our social system; if false, as a revelation of the utterer's faultiness of vision—than this:—

"Sobriety, thrift, industry, skill, self-denial, holiness, are all the good things; but they would, if adopted by all the workers, simply enrich the idle and the wicked, and reduce the industrious and the righteous to slavery."

Mr. Blatchford himself would not describe this as a mere "side issue" or "outside buttress." It is a natural part of his view of the present social system as the cause of social evils, and of his theory that the first if not sufficient remedy for those evils is a change of system. Even if Mr. Robinson's estimate be allowed, he must still see that the argument is calculated to add tremendous force to the Socialist propaganda—to become, indeed, like the tail that wagged the dog. He must see how powerfully it might be used (is it not so used already?) to excite the ignorant and passionate, and to make Socialism the watchword of violent revolution. And this possibility, if logically connected in any way with Mr. Blatchford's theory, should prompt to a careful probing of other parts of that theory.

I wish Mr. Robinson had shown, even by the briefest hints, what he considers Mr. Blatchford's "main contention" to be, and where he thinks its strength lies. If he had summarised, or even referred to, what he deemed weighty passages of sound reasoning on any leading question at issue between Socialists and their opponents, he might justly have claimed to be putting something into the scale against my criticism, and I should have been able either to welcome the resulting balance, or to show why I thought the new weights to be, if not on my side, at least light. But Mr. Robinson's quotations are either mere statements of fact which are the common property of economic students, or expressions of sentiment which are not peculiar to any class of social theorists. They are not relevant to an inquiry whether Mr. Blatchford is "an accurate thinker upon economic subjects, or a wise political leader." Unhappily, then, it falls to me to refer to other passages which throw light on this point.

I.—On p. 32 are three paragraphs which tersely summarise Mr. Blatchford's whole theory of production and distribution. They are all, in my opinion, important enough to be styled "main contentions."

(a) The landlord produces nothing. He takes part of the wealth for allowing the workers to use the land.

(b) The capitalist produces nothing. He takes part of the wealth for allowing the workers to use the capital.

(c) The workers produce all the wealth, and are obliged to give a great deal of it to the landlords and capitalists who produce nothing.

Now, if this account of the matter were true enough to be accepted in any sense, even as the barest outline of the facts, then the injustice would be indeed stupendous and universal; and I, for one, should not demur to the sweeping language of the extreme Socialists that landlords and capitalists are tyrants and robbers and the workers are wage-slaves. But Mr. Blatchford's account, though not wholly false, cannot be said to be even approximately true. Sentiment or circumstances may easily blind men to the extent of its untruth, and a great deal of needless conflict and bitterness springs from belief in it. But all who desire to distinguish real from imaginary wrongs will scrupulously examine so wholesale an indictment before endorsing it.

We have here to do with some of the fundamental questions of economic fact, which demand scientific exactness and the scientific temper. The great snare and the great difficulty of all discussion upon such points is the subtle ambiguity of language. Let us see how the above propositions are vitiated through disregard of this fact.

(1) In (c) we have "The workers produce all the wealth." What does this mean? It may mean either of two things according to the meaning of "the workers." Mr. Blatchford does not wholly overlook the dangerous ambiguity of this term. But his warning against it comes like a mere afterthought; his sense of the danger is wholly inadequate; only momentarily does he appear to escape it; the habitual forms of his language ignore it. True, it is on the same page that he says that amongst "the workers" are "thinkers as well as doers; inventors and directors as well as the man with the hammer, the file, or the spade." But does he realise what this interpretation makes of (c)? Both landlords and capitalists may be "workers" and wealth-producers, and in that case where is the Socialistic sting of the paragraph?

It may, however, be said that alike in (a) (b) and (c) working landlords and capitalists are tacitly included in "the workers," and that Mr. Blatchford is speaking of landlords and capitalists as such, and only as such does he regard them as non-producers. Then why did he not insert those two short words "as such"? They are so important that (supposing them to be adequate—a point to be yet considered) they ought to be incorporated in all general statements of the kind quoted. But there is a reason for their omission. The term "the workers" is popularly used in a sense exclusive of landlords and capitalists, and sometimes of all except weekly wage-earners. In such senses it is used for obvious descriptive and controversial purposes. Mr. Blatchford so uses it continually, as in the whole discussion on morals and wages in Chapters XIII. and XIV. In that case, however, the ambiguity of the word was not dangerous, because the question was not one as to the division of wealth between workers and supposed non-workers. But in any question of the latter kind, such as that now before us, the term "the workers," unless used in a clear sense easily distinguishable from other senses, may darken a whole economic argument, and produce a subtly misleading effect. This is the effect of Mr. Blatchford's use of the term in (c). He himself does not seem to realise (at least he gives no hint to his readers) that the proposition, "The workers produce all the wealth," if interpreted in the popular and narrower sense generally employed by him, is refuted by itself, if interpreted in the economic and broader sense which he subjoins.

(2) But suppose Mr. Blatchford to mean that "the landlord and the capitalist as such produce nothing." Is the statement true even then? Let us bring to it the light of Mr. Blatchford's own definition of capital. "Capital is stores. . . . Stores are wealth. . . . There is not an atom of capital in the world that has not been produced by labour." (P. 30.) Now consider an ordinary case. A man has worked, accumulated capital, and retired. He lends his capital and lives on interest. He is now a mere capitalist. Can it be truly said, in Mr. Blatchford's sweeping style, that he "produces nothing"? Or does there lurk in the word "produce" an ambiguity unnoticed by him, but requiring to be noticed? The proposition is true only if "produce" implies present personal exertion. But such exertion is not the only economic or moral fact involved in production. Past exertion and present abstinence are equally important. Plainly it is nonsensical literalism to insist that such a capitalist is not a producer. The stored results of his labour are used for production, and he is entitled to a share in the produce.

I make no pretence of covering the whole ground. I only show that Mr. Blatchford does pretend and fails. And I ask whether a man who fails to see some of the most fundamental facts of our social system in their true colour and proportions is fitted to prescribe comprehensive remedies for social evils. It is one thing to condemn the man who has inherited wealth but feels too little responsibility for it and never attempts to render anyone a proportionate service; it is quite another thing to condemn every landlord or capitalist in so far as he does not produce in a prescribed manner or time. The income of the Society idler or rake is not to be compared with that of the aged, the widow, or the leisured citizen who serves his fellows. Socialism of Mr. Blatchford's type takes no sufficient account of such distinctions. A wise Socialism cannot be founded upon such reasoning as his.

II. I had hoped to deal fully with other points. A brief word about one only.

In Chapter I. Mr. Blatchford invokes the doctrine of "self-interest" as the guide of life, and it is notable that he uses "selfishness" as an equivalent. I thought it was a boast of Socialists that they had been fighting this doctrine since their movement began; that, owing to their attacks, no writer of repute dares now put it forth; and that it will henceforth be regarded as the obsolete shibboleth of the blindest school of economists. Why has Socialism taken the viper to its own bosom?

It is the more necessary that such questions should be asked and answered, because a number of well-known men—Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. George Haw, and even so careful a writer as Mr. J. A. Hobson—are advertised as giving the book lavish and unmixed praise, and the author announces "Second Hundred Thousand Selling fast."

I wish, Sir, that my signature might again suggest solely that I am "Laboris Amicus," but at your bidding I subscribe myself H. RAWLINGS.

DURNING HALL, LIMEHOUSE.

SIR,—While our churches and missions are under review in the London Unitarian Letter, and a census of attendance is being given, it will not be out of place, I hope, to give you a report or sidelight on the work of the year at Durning Hall, Limehouse. At the present time much depression in trade and signs of poverty are evident. In Stepney, Ratcliffe, St. George's-in-the-East, and Limehouse, committees have been formed in readiness as far as possible to meet the distress. I have been invited and joined these committees; this is the sad side of the missionary's work, and he knows all its mazes and difficulties. But my report deals and my work lies rather among the thrifty, for as a rule in alms and doles I have nothing to give; yet I am far from discouraged as I see more joy and satisfaction on the faces of men when they come at the end of the year to receive their savings than I see on the faces of those whose wounds have been probed and whose cases have been investigated and help given. Yes, they often, I fear, despise their helpers. This makes me the more satisfied with the results of our thrift societies. For the past year Durning Hall Provident Association, under the presidency of Sir Edwin Durning Lawrence, Bart., M.P., shows an income of £2,366 13s. 9½d. and a balance of over £1,400 paid out to 400 members on Saturday, Dec. 20. The Post Office Savings Bank deposits amounted to £173 0s. 8d.; the bulk of this money was drawn during the year, leaving only a small balance at the end. The members of the Mothers' Meeting saved for materials £14 2s. 3½d. and £22 3s. 7d. on postage stamp forms, and gave in collections for the needy members £2 10s. 0d. The members of the Young Women's Sewing Class paid £4 1s. 0d. for goods. The Sunday-school teachers subscribed £4 7s. 6d. to their Christian Life Guild, the Boys' Brigade £1 18s. 1d., Industrial Guild, £1 9s. 7d., and Brass Band £1 9s. 4d. to their several societies. We have held over 400 meetings with an average attendance, young and old, of 2,500 per month. The Sunday-school average is 300 children and 25 teachers, and the Sunday evening services are well attended. The work of the mission entails much labour, forethought and liberality. Sir Edwin and Lady Durning Lawrence bear the whole burden of expenses, and also give much attention to the cause and encouragement to the workers. As time passes my debt of gratitude to my fellow-helpers increases, but the burden is lightened by the evidence of their affection and kindly response, and I thus feel strengthened by their friendship.

JOHN TOYE.

23, Church-crescent, South Hackney, N.E., Jan. 8.

WANTED: CHEERFUL CHRISTIANS.

IN some weekly paper lately I saw a remark quoted with approval that "The world will never be converted by dancing Christians." The saying seemed effectually to dispose of dancing and theatre performances and many other modes of merriment. Apparently we never ought to hear any more of them. After this, even in our most joyous moments, when we have met our friends for the express purpose of happiness and fellowship, we shall not venture on the slightest movement in musical time, because—it would convert nobody. Just as we were about to enjoy ourselves, and forget worldly care in the heartiness of good fellowship, we would remember that some people needed to be admonished and exhorted and converted, and how could we attend to them while dancing? Ashamed and humiliated we go back to our chairs and (not begin to preach, but) fill up the time in some other way. Ought we?

Let us change the picture and imagine an earnest preacher, bent on doing good to men by opening their eyes to the solemn issues of life, reasoning with them as Paul with Felix of self-control, of justice, and of the judgment of God. Should he stop, and blush, and apologise, because seeing a dancing and deportment teacher come in to his assembly he suddenly reflects that the world will never dance to a revivalist's tune? A great authority has reminded us that the head cannot say to the feet, I have no need of you.

It has much need. We live in an unmusical and unpoetic world most of our time. Our duties seem often trivial and tiresome. We are tempted to weariness of spirit, to unsocial and unkindly ways. There is need enough of the discipline that bids us to step lightly, joyously, tunefully. We need greatly to cultivate a rhythmic temper, to learn to listen for the pulsations of melody.

All the world may be converted, and that in no unworthy sense; may learn to hate what is vicious and false, and to love that which is true and admirable. But if at the same time nobody could dance; if the art of moving rhythmically, the art of sprightliness, the light springy step, and all the poetry of action were lost, the world would be immeasurably the poorer. Let us keep the Commandments, but let us not throw away the song-book. Let us ponder the fiftieth Psalm in due season, but let us also enter into the spirit of the old hundredth, and heed the monitions of the one hundred and fiftieth, "Praise Him with the timbrel and dance." There are people in the world who have much less need of the threatenings of Holy Writ than of its human encouragements: its reminders of the festivities of life, its pictures of wholesome mirth, its cheap estimate of the righteousness of that man who was so busily enslaved in the service of the Lord that he would rather stand outside and grumble than forget his weariness, chide his own censoriousness and join his relatives in mirthfulness and music, in dances and delight. Truth is, it will do us good if, though none of us are converted by dancing Christians, we should all be converted into dancing Christians, Christians more ready to sing than to find fault, more ready to take our time from the music than to interpose a discord.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

I CANNOT remember whether I have written a provincial letter since the visit of the B. and F.U.A. to our city last October. Certainly that autumnal session gave a fine initiative to our winter's work; and we are still carrying on our enterprise under the inspiration we received from the most successful meetings held under the presidency of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong. It was a matter of deep regret that, immediately after his vigorous work amongst us, our esteemed friend should have suffered from so serious a breakdown of his health; and to us, in this North-Eastern District, the news was most welcome that told us of the love and loyalty of his congregation and of his resumption of the work to which his life has been devoted. Immediately after the autumnal meetings all our churches set to work with greater zeal than ever. In Newcastle we are just now conducting a second course of theological lectures on Sunday evenings; and though we have the severe competition of popular lectures in one of the theatres, we are encouraged by the presence of a large number of strangers, who are evidently interested in the exposition of our faith. One special feature of our work this season has been the inauguration of a young people's singing class, which has proved most attractive and popular; though a large class meets every Tuesday evening, there has been no diminution in the enthusiasm shown by the young men and women who gather every Thursday evening to our literary and debating society, indeed, the average attendance at this most interesting society has, thus far, been larger, I think, than during any of the former seventeen sessions during which I have been acquainted with it.

These signs of vigorous activity in the church with which I am most closely connected are, I believe, indicative of a revival of enthusiasm in all the churches in our province. Only a few weeks ago I was visiting the Tees-side churches, and though the efforts to maintain their success involve much toil and self-sacrifice, I heard no lamentations of failure and no complaints of discouragement. Our friends perfectly well realise that their task is arduous and is thwarted by many obstacles; but as brave old Martin Luther said he would go to Worms though every tile on the roofs was a separate devil, so these strenuous workers in our good cause will serve it to the utmost of their power in spite of hindrances that sometimes seem as spiteful as the devils against which the Reformer believed he was contending. And they have much to encourage them, if I may judge by a hurried visit. At week-night theological lectures, they secured audiences of sixty-four at Middlesbrough, seventy-four at Darlington, and eighty at Stockton; so that it is clear there are many who are ready to listen to our message, if we will take the trouble to lay it before them. I am glad to report that Mr. Lambelle is now able to concentrate his energies upon Middlesbrough, while Stockton has secured the services of the Rev. H. Cross, who we hope will inspire us with some of the Methodist fire that characterises the community he has left. Darlington, I am sorry to say, is still without a pastor; though the return of Mrs. and the Misses Lucas to that town should be a source of much encouragement. Both Miss Lucas and Mrs. Tweedy, of Newcastle, render occasional help as lay-preachers, and give a good example to their sisters in the faith to undertake such public services, and so expound religion in that simple, tender and beautiful fashion, whereby the truth seems doubly precious from a woman's lips.

Our Sunderland church has had a bazaar, and threatens to have another before the year is over; our churches at Byker and Carlisle have both had successful sales of work; and I have just received an invitation to a similar function to be held at South Shields next March. We live in an atmosphere of bazaars! And yet it is wonderful how readily the goods are provided and how soon they are disposed of by generous purchasers. I know all the arguments that are employed to decry this method of raising funds for religious objects, and that good lady, Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, has written a tract to denounce it. Well! one can only speak from experience, and a lady once assured me that the happiest and healthiest year of social life in her church was the one when they were all working desperately hard to promote what is called "the biennial bazaar."

What we need most of all in this district is to come more frequently into touch with one another; but frequent reunions seem difficult to promote; we are separated at considerable distances, and travelling involves both time and money. For instance, those who study the "Essex Hall Year Book" will be inclined to congratulate our Association on its large force of lay-preachers; but it is the most difficult thing to organise these earnest and faithful men into a Union with punctual meetings and mutual helpfulness. I have sometimes thought it would be wise for every Missionary Committee to make provision for a Lay-Preachers' Union; even if such provision involved the cost of travelling expenses to the meetings, I am sure there would be ample compensation in the new enthusiasm which such a brotherhood would bring to our work.

There is one experiment we have made in our province with such success that it may be commended to others. Two of our churches are unlikely for many years to be able to secure the services of a minister; they have only one service on the Sunday in addition to the Sunday-school, while the week-day duties are scarcely onerous enough to occupy the whole of the time. Over these churches we have appointed two faithful men who maintain most ably the interests of the congregations under their care, and, at the same time, are able to labour at their daily calling. I believe that many a feeble congregation might be kept alive by such an arrangement as this; there must be many earnest and tactful men in our ranks who, without undertaking the full responsibilities of the pastoral office, are quite able to combine the oversight of a mission station and the labour of their life. In this way our Associations would relieve the financial strain; our smaller churches would find leaders; and, in some cases, the lay-helpers themselves would ultimately enter one of our colleges, all the more fitted for the curriculum by their practical experience of the work of the ministry.

Let me close this rambling letter by expressing my strong conviction that at our Conferences we do not sufficiently enforce the immense importance of our lay-ministry; without it many of our churches would have died long ago; apart from its agency our Associations would be paralysed; from its ranks have come some of our most devoted and self-sacrificing missionaries. There is no subject that the coming Liverpool Conference could discuss of more vital interest to our churches than that of the organisation of the lay-preachers in our fellowship. I believe the day will come when lay-preaching will no longer be regarded as a makeshift for the "regular ministry," when it will take its place and discharge its functions as an essential and organic part of our missionary enterprise. But this is a large subject—too large to be dealt with adequately at the close of a Provincial Letter. FRANK WALTERS.

Newcastle-on-Tyne, Jan. 15.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Chelmsford.—The annual tea-meeting was held on Wednesday week, a good number mustering. Numerous recitations and songs were given, and a piece entitled Rehearsing the School Concert was admirably performed by five members of the Sunday-school. A pleasant evening terminated with the distribution of volumes of "Young Days," 1902, kindly presented to the schools by a London friend. A good programme of preachers has been arranged for the present quarter.

Dromore: co. Down.—In connection with the sewing meetings inaugurated this winter, a pleasant social evening was held on Monday, Jan. 12, in which various members of the congregation joined. After tea an entertainment followed, which was much enjoyed, and to which, among others, the Rev. A. Davison, who occupied the chair, contributed.

Horsham.—At the annual Christmas party there was a Christmas tree, which was loaded with beautiful presents, from friends and teachers for scholars, from friends for friends and parents, and from scholars for teachers. The elder classes had undertaken the decoration of the schoolroom, and among the prizes nine were given for attendance without missing during the year and no late mark. They were distributed by Mrs. Prewett. Copies of the "Sunday School Helper" and "Childhood of Jesus," sent by "Aunt Amy" for three young folks who had been admitted as junior members of the church during the year, were also bestowed; recitations were given and hymns were sung. Hearty cheers were accorded to Mr. and Mrs. Marten, Mr. D. Price, Mr. B. Baker, and the friends who had helped to provide so enjoyable an evening.

Hull.—In connection with the winter session of the Workers' League of the Park-street Church, an entertainment to the "older and needy folk" was given by the members on Saturday evening. The guests, to the number of nearly 100, assembled for tea, after which an excellent programme was carried out by the members of the League. A musical comedietta, performed by children of the Sunday-school, a very pretty scarf dance by young children, trained by one of the senior scholars, and a dramatic sketch, entitled Cheerful and Musical, by Miss Freeman and Miss Grace Holmes, formed the longer items in an entertainment which gave considerable pleasure to all present. The Band of Hope and Temperance Society held its annual meeting a few days ago. According to the official report, twelve monthly meetings have been held during the year, the lowest attendance at which was during the summer months, about eighty being present; the highest attendance, on the occasion of the first anniversary meeting, was 250. The average attendance has been 124. New pledges to the number of sixty-six were taken during the year, the total membership being now 142. The society is in a very flourishing condition, and there is every indication of its extending its usefulness.

Leeds: Hunslet.—During the past few weeks a number of meetings have been held here in connection with church and school. On the 27th ult. the ladies of the sewing meeting organised a tea-meeting and Christmas tree, which drew a considerable company together, and which resulted in upwards of £10 being added to the church funds. During the evening a little drama, entitled Princess May and her Wonderful Law, was given by a number of the scholars, and added much to the enjoyment of the evening. On the 3rd inst. the Sunday scholars had their usual tea and romp, which are always enjoyed by those who attend them. On the 5th inst. a high-class concert was given in the schoolroom by the Harrogate Celia Glee Quartette, under the auspices of Mr. H. Gamble. The weather was very inclement, yet a good company assembled, and were highly delighted with the rich musical treat that was given. On the 17th inst. the annual teachers' and parents' meeting was held, and although the attendance was not so large as usual, a thoroughly pleasant evening was spent. Tea was served at half-past five o'clock, and at seven the public meeting was held. The chair was occupied by Mr. John Thornton, an old friend and member, whose genial presence always casts a glow over the audience. The report and balance-sheet were read, showing upwards of 100 scholars on the roll, and a balance of £6 in hand. Mr. W. Holbrooke distributed the prizes and gave an interesting address. Weighty addresses were also given by the Chairman and the Revs. Charles Hargrove and J. Morgan Whiteman. On the motion of the Rev. John Fox, seconded by Miss Whitely, the lady superintendent, the various speakers were thanked for their attendance, and the meeting was brought to a close with a hymn and benediction.

Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society.—The first annual meeting was held on Saturday, Jan. 10, in the Ullet-road Church Hall. After tea, at 4 P.M., the President, the Rev. W. J. Jupp, presided at the business meeting. The report of the first session was adopted, and also the treasurer's statement of accounts; and the Rev. Dr. Klein was elected President for the ensuing year. The council are preparing a scheme for the opening of a Temperance public-house, which it is hoped will soon be completed, considerable progress having already been made.

London: Bermondsey.—On the 15th inst. the prizes and medals for attendance and conduct at the Band of Hope were distributed by Mrs. Allen, who spoke to each prize-winner separately, and to the assembly at large as well. The Rev. F. Allen was also present, and addressed the children. Considering the absence through illness of Mr. A. W. Harris, the indefatigable conductor of the Band of Hope, the conduct was excellent. Nine youthful members of the band at Stamford-street contributed to the programme of the evening.

London: Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union.—A Soirée and Religious Conference was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, and attended by close upon fifty members and friends. The President, Miss Tagart, and Lady Wilson were unfortunately prevented by illness from being present, but the guests were received by Miss Florence Hill. After an hour for tea and social talk, the chair was taken by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and a paper was read by the Rev. G. Critchley on "The Miraculous Element in the Four Gospels." Mr. Critchley noted the changed attitude on the subject in orthodox circles, miracles being no longer cited as evidence for doctrine, but rather being the subject of apology, on the ground of belief in the doctrines. When with belief in the miracles, he said, they had lost the ecclesiastical Christ, they would gain the real Christ, the teacher of great truths, the brother man, who lifted humanity so near to the divine as to demonstrate the potentiality of sonship in all alike. An interesting examination of the Gospel miracles followed, with suggestions as to the various causes in which the stories had their origin. A brief discussion followed, in which the Chairman, Miss M. C. Martineau, the Revs. H. W. Perris and V. D. Davis and others took part, with expressions of thanks to Mr. Critchley for the interest of his address, and he in a few words responded. It was announced by the Chairman that the next meeting would be held on Monday evening, Feb. 23, when Mr. T. J. Hardy would give an address on "The Moral Danger of Theological Reserve."

London: Islington.—On Friday week the Sunday-school scholars of Unity Church had their New Year's party. With an unusually large muster of children, parents, and visitors the festivity passed off most successfully. A large Christmas tree, containing a present for each one, looked very beautiful in the light of a hundred candles, and the children's songs and glees were most creditably rendered. A pleasant feature of the evening was a presentation to Miss Harris from the teachers and members of her singing class, in recognition of the very devoted service she has rendered in training the children for the musical competition. There was also a presentation to Dr. and Mrs. Dawes Hicks. On Saturday last, in connection with the Girls' Club, Mrs. Stuart and Miss Tyler gave an "At Home." Over seventy responded to the invitations sent out. After tea the school was suddenly converted into a drawing-room, when parlour games were played, interspersed with songs, glees, and instrumental music. A most enjoyable evening terminated by singing "Auld Lang Syne."

Newark-on-Trent.—On Sunday, the 11th inst., the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Ilkeston, conducted the services in the Free Christian Church. There were good congregations, especially in the evening, when the service was enriched by special music, and Dr. Griffiths delivered a fine discourse on "A Lofty Ideal." On Wednesday, the 14th inst., the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, a former minister of the church (who left twelve years ago), paid a visit to Newark and met some old members that evening in the church.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The quarterly meeting of the Union was held at Stalybridge on Saturday last. The Committee met immediately after tea, and reports were received from the schools of promises for the Manchester District S.S.A. Bazaar. About 160 were present at the evening meeting, the chair being taken by the President (the Rev. H. S. Tayler), who was supported by the Rev. W. Harrison, the Rev. A. C. Smith, and the hon. secretary (Mr. A. Slater). The ministers present also included the Revs. H. E. Dowson, N. Green, A. C. Fox, T. R. Elliott, B. C. Constable, J. A. Pearson, W. C. Hall, C. E. Oliver, and H. B. Smith. Apologies for absence were received from the Revs. W. L. Tucker and C. Peach, and Mr. E. B. Broadrick. The Rev. H. Bodell Smith (Mottram) received a hearty welcome, he being present for the first time as a member of the Union. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith addressed the meeting on behalf of the Bazaar Committee, after which the Rev. W. Harrison gave an interesting and practical paper on "Efficiency in Teaching." A good discussion followed, closured for want of time, during which several items of vocal and instrumental music were given by the Stalybridge friends. Votes of thanks to the reader, the school hosts, and the chairman brought a very successful meeting to a close.

Preston.—The annual tea-party and prize distribution of the Percy-street Sunday-school took place on Monday last, when about 100 sat down to tea. The chair was taken at the subsequent meeting by the Rev. N. Anderton, B.A. After the reading of the secretary's and treasurer's reports the prizes were distributed by Mrs. William Blackburn, who gave an excellent talk to the children. Following this came a presentation to Mr. R. Newell, who has been compelled to resign the joint-superintendency of the school owing to his appointment as village missionary in Suffolk under the Central Postal Mission. The presentation was made by Miss Kate Gent on behalf of the scholars and members of the school. The Chairman bore testimony to Mr. Newell's faithful work, and to the affectionate interest with which his future settlement at Framlingham and Bedfield would be regarded. He wished him and his family God-speed on behalf of the friends at Percy-street. A capital entertainment was then given by the scholars, including songs, recitations, and a violin solo. Miss Bertha Preston presided at the piano, and the proceedings throughout were most enjoyable.

Richmond.—The Free Church Boys' Guild was opened on Saturday, the 10th inst., when seventeen boys enrolled themselves as members of the guild. After an address by Mrs. Farrington, the premises (in Prince's-street) were declared open, and the boys went to work with a will at certain structural improvements requiring to be made in order to render the premises adequate. At 5.30 tea was provided in the church library, after which the literary section of the guild commenced its studies. The object of the guild is to provide boys attending the church with facilities for practising handicraft and for systematic reading. Cordial thanks are due to those members of the congregation whose liberality has made the project possible.

Scarborough.—The annual tea-party and prize-giving of the Westborough Unitarian Sunday-school was held on Tuesday, Jan. 13. After tea was over, a capital entertainment of songs, dialogues, recitations, &c., was rendered by the combined Sunday-school and Band of Hope. The report of the Sunday-school shows a gratifying increase in the numbers on the books.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The quarterly meetings were held on Jan. 12, at the Unitarian Church, Pentre, at 2.30 P.M., Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips, president, in the chair. Delegates from the various churches were present. The reports from the churches show that the district is beginning to recover from the effects of the want of a settled ministry, which has been for a long time the case in several of our congregations, although the congregation at Pontypridd is still without a minister. The members of the Highland-place congregation at Aberdare are rallying round their energetic young minister, and the institutions connected with the church are in a flourishing condition. Bridgend is still under the anxious consideration of the committee. The Rev. W. J. Phillips, supported by special grants voted by this Society, has been organising services regularly during the past twelve months. After five o'clock tea, generously provided by the Pentre congregation, a religious service was held, conducted by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, and the Revs. J. T. Davis, B.A., and W. Tudor Jones, F.R.G.S., preached, the former on "What think ye of Christ?" and the latter from Hebrews xi. 8, 10, "By Faith Abraham when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive as an inheritance, obeyed." . . . "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God." The service, as conducted by Mr. Jenkins, was most inspiring, and the two sermons were listened to with great attention by a good congregation.

Southend-on-Sea.—The annual congregational meeting of the Unitarian Church was held last Sunday at the close of the evening service, Mr. G. W. Oldland in the chair. Owing to the very wretched weather there was only a fair attendance of members. Reports showed a slight falling off in membership due to the removal of several families from the town. The financial position is sound; the church, after discharging all liabilities, commences the year with a few pounds in hand. The average attendance at the children's class in the morning is ten, and at the preaching service in the evening forty-four. Mr. C. F. Dear was invited and consented to act as minister for another twelve months.

Trebanos: S. Wales.—Last Sunday evening the cantata, entitled "Daniel," was performed, when the recitations by the children and the singing of the choir were highly appreciated. At present the ladies of the congregation are making extensive preparations for a bazaar to be held in the course of a few months, the proceeds to be devoted towards the liquidation of an existing debt and the erection of a new schoolroom, which is greatly needed.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE delay on the part of the Public Prosecutor in issuing his report on the accusation against Mr. Gottfried Schwarz has had the effect of throwing the case too late for the present sitting of the Mannheim Schwurgericht. The trial cannot now take place before April. Apart from personal reasons, the delay is not altogether a misfortune, as it gives more opportunity for the working of public opinion in Mr. Schwarz's favour. A portion of the defence fund has now been transmitted to him; and he desires that his heartfelt thanks be expressed to the donors for their gifts and their sympathy.

IT will be seen from an advertisement in another column that the annual meeting of the members of the Moral Instruction League is to be held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening next, to be followed at 8 o'clock by a public meeting, at which Dr. Stanton Coit will take the chair, and give an address on the work of the League, after which Dr. John Hunter, of the King's Weigh House Church, is to speak on "The Training of the Citizen."

SEVERAL courses of afternoon lectures on various aspects of charitable and social work are at present being given in London. On Thursday this week Miss M. A. Sewell, late warden of the Women's University Settlement, Southwark, began a course of six lectures on "Difficulties in Charitable Relief and how to meet them," at the Maurice Hostel, Britannia-street, Shepherdess-walk, Hoxton, N. (at 4.30 P.M.). Tickets for the course are 1s. 6d., or for a single lecture 6d., payable at the door. On Friday Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet began a course of four lectures on "The English Poor Law," at the Holy Trinity Parish Hall, Pavilion-road, Sloane-square (5.30 P.M.). Admission to these lectures is free. Next Thursday Mr. E. J. Urwick, M.A., is to begin a course of six lectures on "Economics and Social Problems" at the Caxton Hall, Westminster (4.45 P.M.). Tickets for the course 5s., or for a single lecture 1s., payable at the door.

WE received with great regret the last copy of Present Day Papers (December, 1902), the issue of which, at least for a time, is now suspended. This number contains the conclusion of the Editors' "History of the Adult School Movement," and a searching review of Mr. J. M. Robertson's "Christianity and Mythology," by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, from which we may be allowed to quote the concluding sentences :—

The question of the presence of mythological elements in the Gospels is an historical problem, to be solved, if at all, by sound study of the evidence without throwing either our dogmas or our religious sentiments into the scale. But perhaps it may not be unfitting if we affirm, in conclusion, our own conviction, which (pace Mr. Robertson) we have tried to form honestly and in the face of the facts, that the effect of candid historical study of the Gospels is not to dissolve the faith of centuries into the unsubstantial fabric of a dream, as the gorgeous clouds of sunset melt away at the touch of night; for when prejudice is laid to rest, and every deduction has been made that an exacting use of the evidence can demand, we find that the living figure of the Son of Man remains as an ultimate reality, alike in the warm glow of Christian affection and the white light of historical truth.

The Editors' faith is expressed in a farewell address, which reviews what Present Day Papers have attempted during the past five years, and adds these significant words :—

Criticism is performing for us a needed service. It is compelling us from externals to seek reliance on the inward witness of God in the soul, and in this it is making for the essential teaching of the Quaker faith and ever further away from the sacerdotal position to which it has given but a fleeting strength. That the hardest trial is past, that there are no dark hours before the Christian Church, we do not say. We believe the contrary. We believe that in the near future there will be a time of severer sifting than the Church has ever known.

The more careful study of comparative mythology, the broader examination of the Gospel records in the light afforded by older and contemporary religions, will, we believe, force upon us questions that have long been evaded by the Christian apologists.

But those alone will suffer whose faith has been propped too exclusively upon historical evidence, and for whom the inward Voice has no sure message of living consolation. To believe that the essentials of faith can really be touched is to abandon belief in the love of God. The received idea of what is essential may be affected, but that is the destruction of a misconception rather than of faith.

In spite of the conflict that rages about the believing soul we feel in all things the guiding hand of God, and the certainty that His Truth shall triumph in the minds as in the hearts of men.

IN bidding farewell to Present Day Papers it is a great satisfaction, as we have already stated, that we still have the British Friend, a monthly paper formerly edited by Mr. William Edward Turner, and now by Mr. Edward Grubb, M.A., in the interest of a spiritual Christianity, from the standpoint of the Society of Friends. The British Friend is a religious and literary journal, published on the 15th of each month (Devonshire Chambers, Bishopsgate Without, E.C.; 6s. 6d. annually, single numbers 6d., or 7d. by post). The Editor's policy is thus declared :—

The union of intellectual openness with deep religious experience, and of evangelical fervour with social sympathy, which was witnessed in many of the early Friends, appears to be a special need of our own times. The editor's desire is for enlightened spirituality; that while keeping in close touch with advancing knowledge, and stimulating robust thought on the social and religious problems of the day, he may present Christ as the Revealer of the Father, the Light of the world, and the Healer of its deepest woes.

PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE, of Paris, gave a course of lectures at Geneva last autumn on Liberal Protestantism, which made a deep impression, and it is with great pleasure that we have received a copy of the little volume in which these lectures are now published (by Fischbacher, 33, rue de Seine, Paris), under the title, "Le Protestantisme libéral, ses Origines, sa Nature, sa Mission." There are five lectures, of which we hope before long to give some further account.

THE Revue Bleue has an exceedingly interesting article on the Ritualist Movement in England. The writer does not think that it is propelled by any very earnest convictions. It is an appeal mainly to the senses, not to the intelligence or the deeper affections. But a certain possible mischief is very clearly indicated. The closing paragraph, considering that it comes from a French writer, is worth reading once and considering twice.

Beneath this crisis which disturbs England there is a problem more important than the religious future of the country; its political future. If the English people were to renounce their spiritual independence and again to fall under pontifical authority, it would mean that they had lost the magnificent energy which enabled them to throw off that yoke in the sixteenth century; it would be a sign of profound decadence. What would become then of the great word Liberty, to which they have given so lofty a significance that all the peoples of the world have envied them? English liberty is born of Reform. "It is to the Puritans," says Hume, "a sect whose principles appear so frivolous and habits so ridiculous, that the English owe the whole freedom of their constitution." By spoiling this work the High Church would deprive the English of that which has given them strength, of that which is their most precious possession.

THE first of the present course of Jowett lectures was given on Thursday week at the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Tavistock-place, by the Rev. Arthur Galton, the subject of the course being "The Influence of Modern Thought and Knowledge upon Theology." The Principal of King's College was in the chair, and there was an audience of about seventy. Mr. Galton, who after graduation at Oxford, was ordained a priest of the Roman Church, was recently curate of Windermere, and is now domestic chaplain of the Bishop of Ripon. Four years ago he published a book on "The Message and Position of the Church of England," and more recently a volume in the "Church's Outlook" series on "Our Attitude towards English Roman Catholics and the Papal Court." At the opening of his lecture last week he paid a tribute to the memory of Jowett, and read the following significant passage as a prelude to his course:—

The study of "comparative theology" not only helps to distinguish the accidents from the essence of Christianity; it also affords a new kind of testimony to its truth; it shows what the world was aiming at through many cycles of human history—what the Gospel alone fulfilled. The Gentile religions, from being enemies, became witnesses of the Christian faith. They are no longer adverse positions held by the powers of evil, but outworks or buttresses, like the courts of the Temple on Mount Sion, covering the holy place. Granting that some of the doctrines and teachers of the heathen world were nearer the truth than we once supposed, such resemblances cause no alarm or uneasiness; we have no reason to fable that they are the fragments of some primeval revelation. We look forwards, not backwards; to the end, not to the beginning; not to the Garden of Eden, but to the life of Christ. There is no longer any need to maintain a thesis; we have the perfect freedom and real peace which is attained by the certainty that we know all, and that nothing is kept back. Such was the position of Christianity in former ages; it was on a level with the knowledge of mankind. But in later years unworthy fear has too often paralysed its teachers: instead of seeking to readjust its relations to the present state of history and science, they have clung in agony to the past. For the Gospel is the child of light; it lives in the light of this world; it has no shifts or concealments; there is no kind of knowledge which it needs to suppress; it allows us to see the good in all things; it does not forbid us to observe also the evil which has incrusted upon itself. It is willing that we should look calmly and steadily at all the facts of the history of religion.

That was a passage from Jowett's essay on Natural Religion in his Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, published in 1855, and it was a remarkable utterance, to have been made at that time. A clergyman declaring such truths half a century ago might well be described, Mr. Galton said, as a voice crying in the wilderness. But now, modern Oxford looked upon Jowett as its most distinguished representative. Mr. Galton's first lecture, which was read in a subdued and monotonous voice, not calculated either to awaken or maintain interest, was on "The Mediæval Theory of the Universe." The second lecture, this week, was on "The Revival of Learning." Next week's subject is "The Reformation," and subsequent lectures are to take up the special subjects of Astronomy, Philosophy, Evolution, and Philology, the eighth and final lecture giving "Results and conclusions." The lectures are on Thursday evenings at 8.30, and are freely open to the public.

IN the current number of the National Review there is a delightful article by Miss Catherine I. Dodd on "A Holiday Course at the Jena University." It seems that Jena was the pioneer in Germany of such summer meetings, taking up the idea which has had such fruitful results in this country, which again received its inspiration from the great Chautauqua summer meeting in America. The first Summer Course in Jena was held in August, 1889, when a little company of about twenty students came to hear Professor Rein on Pedagogy and Professor Detmer on Biology. Last year, Miss Dodd reports, there were 275 students at Jena, of both sexes and many nationalities, and Professor Rein's lectures on the theories on which education is based are still the great attraction. Following the example of Jena, Greiswald began to hold summer meetings in 1894, Marburg in 1896, and since then Kiel, Breslau, Würzburg, Munich, Bonn, Berlin, Königsberg and others have followed suit. Our friend and contributor, the Rev. E. I. Fripp, has been among the lecturers both at Marburg and Jena.

MISS DODD looks back with some regret to the earlier meetings at Jena, before the members had grown to their present proportions, and gives a charming picture of the informal social side of the meetings, when the whole party could meet in the Burgkeller on the first evening round one table and declare their name and nationality, and subsequently, after the day's work, the professors could lead out the whole company for the pleasantest evening walks to the surrounding hills and woods. If any teetotaller is shocked at what he finds at the bottom of p. 749 let him take comfort in the following:—

The influence of the Englishwoman was felt on the Jena Holiday Course, chiefly in the matter of tea-drinking, for no matter where she is, or what she is doing, this sociable woman drinks tea herself and insists on everybody else doing the same. So at a Jena Holiday Course she insists on giving tea-parties, out of doors in the Schiller Garden; and she brings the tea from England, and goes the length of making the bread, and cutting the bread-and-butter herself, in order that English custom may be properly respected. And the Germans, the Greeks, and Servians, and the rest, come and drink the tea she gives them, when they would ever so much rather have coffee or beer, and then the Englishwoman is satisfied.

AT last year's meeting at Jena there were twenty-five courses of lectures, six of them being on various aspects of educational theory and practice. Miss Dodd naturally insists on the immense progress Germany has made in this direction. "Germany," she says, "is a century or so ahead of us in the matter of educational theory, for this nation has taken education seriously ever since its crushing defeat in the battle of Jena." The great uprising of the German people, inspired by Fichte and others, began in the school; but for us, Miss Dodd says, "a great prophet in our country has yet to be born."

A LITTLE pamphlet on "The Atonement and Kindred Subjects," by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, and published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association (1d.), deals, in the form of a letter to an inquirer, with various questions raised by the orthodox conception of the Atonement. It is prefaced by the following interesting note:—

This pamphlet appeared originally in The Coming Day, and was entitled, "A Theological Excursion." The following letter from Archdeacon Wilberforce suggested its reproduction, and he consents to its appearance here. It is well that meeting-places for pilgrims should be established wherever possible, if only for a greeting by the way.

20, Dean's-yard, Westminster Abbey,
Dec. 8, 1902.

Dear Mr. Page Hopps,

I have read your "Theological Excursion" in The Coming Day for September, and, though there are probably not a few theological questions upon which we differ widely, I think this "excursion" so excellent and so useful that I cannot help expressing the hope that you will reproduce it in pamphlet or book form.—I am, sincerely yours, BASIL WILBERFORCE.

SPEAKING last week of the valuable articles by Dr. J. H. Crooker on "The Historical Jesus" in the Springfield Republican, from which we had largely quoted, and of the great pleasure with which we look forward to Dr. Crooker's visit to this country, and to his preaching of the B. and F.U.A. annual sermon at Whitsuntide, we ought to have remembered the admirable little book which he published some years ago (1888, 3rd edition 1900) entitled "Jesus Brought Back." There are five chapters, dealing with the character and teaching of Jesus, the condition of thought among his people, and finally his relation to our own time, each chapter being prefaced by a list of references to works on the subject. There is also an essay by Dr. Crooker on "Different New Testament Views of Jesus" (1891), and a book on "The New Bible and its New Uses" (1893). Copies of these books may be had at Essex Hall.

OUR souls are bathed in a spiritual atmosphere; a spiritual sunlight falls upon them. Here and now—yes, truly, in this living present—we dwell in the spiritual world. There is a realm in which the Spirit is directly manifested, without the media to which we are accustomed in the flesh. There is also in use a faculty to open, as the petals and leaves of a plant open. The grandeurs and beauties, the peace and joy of this enveloping world, no words can reveal.

LITERATURE.

A TERRIBLE INDICTMENT.*

MR. BRYCE writes with wide knowledge and with fine sympathy on the question of the relations of the "advanced" to the "backward" races. But his pamphlet is not pleasant to read. Christianity has inspired many noble individuals to heroic and self-sacrificing efforts on behalf of many native races. But it appears never to have established a sense of brotherhood between a white and a coloured race living together, and never to have dictated the conduct of a white community to a coloured community with which it was in direct relations. This is the more noteworthy inasmuch as the Mohammedan religion frequently shows this power. In dwelling upon "religion" as one of the influences that tend to overcome the aversion that separates different human types, and that vitiates their relations, Mr. Bryce is obliged expressly to confine his illustrations to Islam.

An appalling commentary on the general theme of Mr. Bryce's book is furnished by the history of Congoland detailed by Mr. Fox Bourne.

In 1884 and 1885 an international conference was held at Berlin which resulted in the recognition in 1886 of the "International Association of the Congo" as an independent State by Germany, France, Great Britain, Portugal, Spain, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Sweden and Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium and Turkey acting collectively. The proceedings seem to have been manipulated with great skill by the King of Belgium, Leopold II., and Mr. Stanley, who entered his employment; and when the State was thus established it was announced that Leopold was its Sovereign. He had despotic power within the limits of the conditions laid down by the International Act of Recognition, which insisted on free trade (since modified) and the equal rights of all nationalities, and prohibited all privileges and monopolies and slavery and the slave-trade. The whole project was generally regarded as partaking largely of the nature of a philanthropic effort, and it was solemnly blessed by Prince Bismarck at the close of the Berlin Conference, with references to "solicitude for the moral and material well-being of the native populations," and the "noble aspirations" that had dictated its inception.

The King of the Belgians treated the whole vast area as his private property, but when he got into financial difficulties he had to apply to the Belgian Parliament for loans, making certain terms, and also had to construct certain joint-stock companies in which he was always the chief and the controlling partner. Several of these companies in good years have yielded roughly from 50 to 250 per cent. profit on the nominal capital.

One of the chief hopes entertained in connection with the new State was that it would suppress the Arab slave-traders in Central Africa. It did so, but the means adopted were appalling. Very few Europeans were concerned in the military attack upon the Arabs. The work was done by "friendly" blacks, sometimes under a European officer or officers, sometimes not. These "friendlies" were many of them cannibals. An Englishman who was present (Dr. Hinde) tells us that the cannibal chief himself, lu-Tete, remained for three days in his own quarters after the decisive victory because "the sights in his camp were so appalling that even he did not care to put himself in the way of seeing them unnecessarily." No wonder; for after a battle the victorious survivors clear the field by at once cutting up and carrying off the dead and wounded of both sides. (P. 155.) The Arab settlements had attained in many respects a refined civilisation, and the land they controlled was admirably cultivated. They were superseded by a gross and wasteful barbarism, marked amongst other features by a spread of cannibalism amongst tribes that had not hitherto practised it. Still one might be content to pay a heavy price for the destruction of a great slave-power did it mean the fall of a great slave-system. But it did not. A French observer, M. de Mandat-Grancey, appeals to the present facts in confirmation of his thesis that "the race which has survived three centuries of the slave-trade will be destroyed by fifty years of philanthropy" (p. 246), and another Frenchman, M. Jean Hess, says "it is proved up to the hilt that the Belgians, in order to obtain ivory and rubber from the Congo, have perpetrated abominations, and that to his title of King of the Belgians and Sovereign of the Congo State his Majesty might add King of the Slave Dealers." (P. 294.) All the worst features of the slave-trade survive. Families are broken up, children are kidnapped, sent down by the hundred with untended ulcers on their bodies and fever burning in their veins, thousands of miles away, to become public slaves, though not so-called, if they survive. Women are no more spared than children. An Englishman, Mr. Grave, speaks of "strings of poor emaciated old women, some of them mere skeletons, working . . . in gangs with a rope round the neck, and connected by a rope one and a-half yards apart. They are prisoners of war. In war the old women are always caught." (P. 186.)

What is it all for? It is to make the 50 to 250 per cent. profit for the companies. The trade is in ivory and rubber, and the natives that are not enslaved are put under forced contribution. The labour itself is often cruel in the extreme. M. Edouard Picard, a Belgian, thus describes the carriers, "for the most part broken down, sinking under the burdens made heavier by their weariness and insufficiency of food . . . pitiful walking caryatids; beasts of burden with lank limbs of monkeys, pinched-up features, eyes fixed and round with the strain of keeping their balance and the dulness of exhaustion . . . dying on the tramp, or, when the tramp is over, going to their villages to die of exhaustion." (P. 245.) The "discipline" necessary to work the system of which this is a part is maintained by the bastinado and the chicotte, a lash made of "raw hippo hide," and described by Mr. Grave as (especially when new) "trimmed like a corkscrew, with edges like knife-blades, and as hard as wood." The description of the effect of this lash one reads with the sickening feeling that haunts one after perusing an account of mediæval tortures. A hundred strokes of this "terrible weapon" is not a rare sentence, and Mr. Grave believes that it needs "an extraordinary constitution to withstand it," and that very often the man who goes through it "has his spirit broken for life." (P. 191.)

The rubber is gathered by the villagers. Each village has to bring in a certain amount. If any native is found (or suspected) to be occupying himself about his own affairs when he should be gathering rubber he is shot and his hand cut off. This is in order that the hands may be sent to the responsible commissioner in order to show him that the cartridges served out have not been wasted. (P. 210.) When stronger measures of compulsion or retaliation are thought necessary, villages are burned and natives are massacred. On one occasion Mr. Grave tells us that two men (blacks) had been killed (and eaten) by the victims of their persecution. "Arabs were sent to punish the natives; many women and children were taken, and twenty-one heads were brought to the Falls, and have been used by Captain Rom as a decoration round a flower-bed in front of his house." (P. 193.)

The King of Belgium has had these facts pressed upon his attention; and he is, as we have seen, the preponderating partner in the companies that derive their profits from the system into which they enter. England is one of the Powers to which the violated pledges "to watch over the preservation of the native populations and the improvement of their moral and material conditions of existence" were given, and, moreover, it appears that her trade rights have been grossly infringed, that one at least of her subjects has been murdered, and the asylum of one of her ships violated. Similar outrages have been suffered by other Powers that were parties to the Berlin Conference. Our Government, says Mr. Fox Bourne, "has promised to take such action as it may find practicable." (P. 278). What and when will that be?

SHORT NOTICE.

What I saw in South Africa, September and October, 1902, by J. R. Macdonald, L.C.C. This is an excellent little book at a very low price. The writer tells his personal experiences and opinions in a natural, straightforward manner, which inspires confidence and respect. A journey through a country so terribly war-stricken as South Africa would tempt many a man to produce highly-wrought pictures, especially if he were anxious to draw a lesson. Mr. Macdonald has decided views upon the late war and its origin, but they are not obtruded. If his pictures are sometimes vivid and moving, it is only because they plainly describe things seen. When he deals with the course of events since peace was made, he freely criticises what he deems to be wrong lines of policy or mistakes of administration. But his language is always marked by a spirit of moderation and fairness, and his opinions are supported by facts. His book should be widely read. It gives a good idea of the magnitude and delicacy of the problems which have to be solved by South African and British statesmanship, and by the peoples concerned. (The Echo. London. 6d.)

PROFESSOR A. B. DAVIDSON.*

IT is just a year ago (Jan. 26, 1902) that Professor Davidson, known far and wide as the expositor of the Book of Job, died very suddenly. Two volumes of his writings have since been published, and others are understood to be in preparation. The book named below contains a short but careful and tenderly-written biographical introduction, as well as the group of sermons which suggests the title; and it is to this and to some other brief memorials that we are indebted for the materials of the following sketch. Next week we hope to call attention to the characteristics of such of his writings as are contained in this and the companion volume, the title of which is "Biblical and Literary Essays."

Andrew Bruce Davidson was born in 1831, in Aberdeenshire, on the farm of Kirkhill, nearly twenty miles from Aberdeen. The farm, never inclusive of more than a hundred acres, was mostly reclaimed from the barren waste by Andrew Davidson, the elder, father of the future Professor of Hebrew. There were six children, four of them boys. A very significant picture is presented by that Highland home. There is the dour, vigorous Free Church farmer himself; the little mother with raven-black hair and ruddy face; a brilliant eldest son who died at twenty-one, leaving a loose sheaf of verse and prose behind him; a second destined to succeed to the farm, and, though keenly interested in literature and learning, giving up his chances of a superior education to the youngest. This youngest, black-haired and ruddy like his mother, shy, short-sighted, gentle of gait, must be the minister of the flock—in spite of the loss of patron's help that went when the reins of the Establishment were flung off. There was a way to be discovered without the help of a patron, and the little mother and the lad found it between them.

He was sent out, a reluctant little fellow, as "herd" on the farm; but every day after work was done he ran his two or three miles to a teacher who had his own wee bit of land and grew corn on it; and master and pupil might be seen in harvest-time walking in the corn-plot, the former cutting with the scythe, the latter saying his lessons from the book. So by hard-gained steps the boy got to the Aberdeen Grammar School at fourteen, taking up his abode in an attic to which fortnightly supplies were brought—meal, eggs, butter, &c.,—by that indomitable mother, who would walk thither and back, a distance of nearly forty miles. She thus "saved expense" and gained for her laddie a chance in life.

He took it—won his bursary (from £10 to £20 for four years)—graduated M.A., and then came a "step aside." He became teacher at the Free Church School in Ellon, and so continued for three years and a half. This check in the path contemplated seems to have left a deep mark on the young man's impressionable mind; echoes of disappointed hope and long waiting sound in the sermons; but events were shaping better than he knew. After all, powerful as his few sermons were, he was never well fitted for the ministry. As it were by accident, while continuing his studies as teacher at Ellon, he picked up a work on Hebrew, and so entered upon the scene of his life's long and fruitful labours. In 1852, when, in spite of his "step aside," he was as yet but twenty-one, the little mother foresaw clearly his coming eminence. "The day will come," she prophesied, "when Andrew will be in a chair." The day came surely, but still not too swiftly.

That same year he entered New College, Edinburgh, and so began a forty years' connection with it. In 1856 he was licensed by the Presbytery to preach, and for two years he went about preaching occasionally and once taking six months' temporary duty. But the congregations did not take to him. He was shy. His heart palpitated at the thought of a congregation. He did not "like" preaching. Nature had not made him of the stuff that can be periodically unrolled for all men to see their own secrets written there, He was marked by aloofness, elusiveness; casual observers to the last thought him cold, saw in him something "enigmatic and unresolved," marked the "splendid solitude" of his life. Such splendour is bought with a price.

For keener eyes saw how, to the last, "with the least touch of emotion, the sensitive lip quivered keenly," and "the thin pulse in a spare cheek" was lost in a vivid flush sweeping over the face. When, in the midst of a lecture on the Hebrew prophets, his mind was filled with passion sympathetic with their own, the students saw those temples flushed, "and the thin voice rose into a kind of scream, and his stiffened fingers moved swiftly through the pages"—a sight and sound to fascinate and paralyse the hearer, and notes were forgotten, and young hearts throbbed as the meaning of man's highest thoughts dawned at last upon them from the far-off Scripture that is for ever living to him who understands. It was as the interpreter of the Bible, especially the Old Testament, that Davidson proved an invaluable friend to many a young man preparing for the ministry. Hebrew ceased, under his magic touch, to be a dead and dreary study. The secret that makes the Bible records, and especially the Bible oracles, seem alive was now at last revealed to them; they followed their master's guidance into that new method of historical insight which was so sadly lacking to the fathers. To Professor Davidson, as nowadays to every wise teacher, the Bible was intolerable when regarded as an artificial enigma constructed to puzzle the intellect by its hidden meanings; it became a transcript of human experience. So handled, it afforded the needed counterpoise in many a young mind bewildered by the subtle questionings of philosophy. They left the clouds and touched solid ground again.

The enthusiasm and gratitude with which successive generations of students regarded him, and who in distant manses still cherish his memory, may be well understood. He was to them much more than a teacher of Hebrew; he was a revealer of the things of the spirit.

The impressions given by those who knew him personally leave us wishing that nature had been a little kindlier to this man; but all the gifts are never given at once. The stern faith in which he was cradled—was it the best for so tender a heart? He seems to have had at times an over-mastering sense not of the sins, but of the sufferings of the world. Deep-welling tears would start unbidden. Profound pity, which was almost too pained to help, seized him again and again. It was just this temperament, however, that fitted him pre-eminently to be the interpreter of the Book of Job. The "obstinate questionings" he found there he had felt; the wrestling of the mind with problems insoluble under the silent heavens was his own experience. Seeming to be a lonely self-contained man, he was really filled with love for all around him, and the fire burned the more fervently within while his lips refrained even from good words. There is little wonder that when he did find utterance it was with singular power; it is less wonder that his prevailing word to his brother-man was one bidding him take refuge from his sorrows and perplexities in the shelter of the Most High.

W. G. TARRANT.

* "The Called of God." By the late A. B. Davidson, D.D., &c., Professor of Hebrew, New College, Edinburgh. Edited by Professor J. A. Paterson, D.D. With Biographical Introduction by A. Taylor Innes, Advocate. T. and T. Clark. Price 6s.

THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.*

THE author of this book, who is Warden of the Bermondsey Settlement and Wesleyan minister, informs us that it embodies the substance of a series of lectures delivered at the Settlement to a small class of theological students during the past three years. The main object of the volume is to show that the deepest meaning of religion lies in the realisation of the Fatherhood of God through Jesus Christ. Mr. Lidgett feels that the doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood has not secured sufficient attention at the hands of Christian theologians. His book exhibits wide reading and intimate acquaintance with the history of theological doctrine and philosophy, but from the point of view of a satisfactory interpretation of the meaning of Fatherhood it loses in force by a continual insistence on the literal interpretation of New Testament texts. If Mr. Lidgett had adopted a more critical attitude he would have produced a more valuable treatise.

He is willing to adopt the modern attitude towards the Old Testament, and praises the efforts which have been made in the nineteenth century to read it in the light of history, science, archæology, &c. In the fourth chapter on "The Doctrine of the Old Testament" in relation to the Fatherhood of God, clear light is cast on the conception of Fatherhood and its growth. When dealing with the New Testament the author himself adopts from beginning to end the spirit which he condemns in those who treated the Old Testament as being of equal value with the New. No attempt is made to distinguish and to account for the differences in the Gospels. Scores of verses are taken and made to fit with the particular doctrine which the author seeks to establish. Where other books of the New Testament do not seem to emphasise the author's conception of the Fatherhood, these are treated as exceptions, and our author adopts throughout the optimistic practice of ending in such a manner as this, in order to establish his theory:

Thus we may pass from our survey of the Epistles of the Imprisonment with the conclusion that throughout the final statements of St. Paul's theology, and especially wherever its ultimate presuppositions are laid bare, his thought interprets God's dealings with mankind from first to last, by means of His Fatherhood towards the Son and towards the race in Him.

As regards the New Testament as a whole the conclusion arrived at is that the conception of Fatherhood is reached by the believer alone through the conception of the sonship of Christ. In this manner a theory is set forth which takes a view of human nature in New Testament times contrary to that taken of it in Old Testament times. Under the old dispensation our author leads us to believe that man had "living experience of the true God." Under the new dispensation this living experience seems to come through the Son alone. Two different estimates of human nature have to be held before the conclusions of the author's doctrine of the Fatherhood from the New Testament can be established.

The treatment of "The Fatherhood in Church History" is full, and presents a lucid account of the doctrine. Mr. Lidgett shows that the doctrine of Fatherhood was not prominent in the Church from the fourth century to the Reformation, and here an interesting question presents itself. For nearly ten centuries, with all its development of orthodox doctrines hampered by but little heresy, the Church did not bring prominently forward the doctrine of Fatherhood. Why not? This book states that it was due to "defective treatment of the Christological problems which were dealt with in the fourth century." May not another answer be true—that it was through having Christological problems at all that the Church failed in its conception of Fatherhood?

Space will not permit of our dwelling on the account of the revival of the doctrine. We are told that "the Socinian teaching bore only indirectly upon the Fatherhood of God." "Eventually, however, Socinianism, as it passed into modern Unitarianism, gave prominence to the Fatherhood of God, and to its universality in one particular respect. Its conception of the Fatherhood has not indeed, except in the case of a few exceptional thinkers, become more profound."

It is something new to us to be told that it was in Methodism that the doctrine of Fatherhood came prominently forward a century ago. Where is the literature on this subject? We search in vain, as we search in vain in this book for the names of great Unitarian writers in England and America who were almost alone in their teaching of the Fatherhood. And is it not true that the Sovereignty of God far more than the Fatherhood was, and to a large extent is even to-day, emphasised by Methodists and some other Evangelical Bodies?

Mr. Lidgett's treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity is the familiar one, which argues that because God is love there must be a trinity of persons. But why a trinity? Why not at once adopt Professor Wm. James's hypothesis of polytheism?

The book is a laborious attempt to reconcile two irreconcilable things—namely, a theory built on the letter of Scripture on the one hand, and the theory of the whole creation as spiritual in its nature and in process of perpetual unfolding on the other. However praiseworthy such attempts may be, two things may be said of them all. (1) They cannot connote man's religion with man's whole nature. (2) They are unsatisfactory and incomplete, for they allow lacunæ in the universe. The mind and spirit of man cannot accept any such theories but as provisional, and must seek elsewhere than in the letter of Scripture in order to understand the deepest meaning even of the Scriptures themselves.

TWENTY-TWO TALKS.*

A SHORT series of essays or little sermons by a well-known Brooklyn pastor. They are well printed, on good paper, in small compass. Had we been inclined hastily to scan it and then put it down, the tiny address to the reader, printed in facsimile, and the opening words of the first talk would have compelled more attention, for the words are: "I was born on January 10, 1822." Here, then, are the exhortations of a very aged minister, and therewith some samples from his life's experiences. A certain progressive order may be noticed. The first essays seem to be intended as calls to the unconverted; then a section speaks to the reader as a Christian; toward the end we have hints evidently intended, in the first place, for such brethren as have entered or will enter upon the Christian ministry.

The style is the same throughout. It is always plain, intelligible, but unadorned, and, to those who do not hear in it the voice of the living man, unexciting. Even the personal touches have nothing very distinctive or special in them. As concerning the essays which have no autobiographical hints, they seem curiously deficient in imagination, in fire, in the word that strikes home. Let us take a passage from the essay headed "This One Thing." Whoso reads this short quotation will know the style of the entire book:—

> How little any of us know in regard to our Bible or in regard to ourselves, in comparison with what we might know! We are right by an exhaustless ocean, and too seldom put down our tiny vessels for a draught. How little we know of the wants and the woes of the dying world! There are thousands of Christians who spend more time over the paltry gossip of the town in which they dwell than they spend in studying their Bibles, or in watching for opportunities for service of their Master, or even in trying to save immortal souls. The red-hot zeal of Wall-street and the Produce Exchange ought to shame our coldness. The accumulations that men are making in scientific knowledge, in art and in wealth, ought to make us blush that we are not striving to become richer in faith and good works.

From a passage on pp. 60 and 61 we understand that Dr. Cuyler ascribes the First Epistle of John and the Epistle of James to John and James the sons of Zebedee. At the opening of Essay XIV. the proverbial expression "a mother in Israel" is ascribed to the wise woman (2 Sam. xx.) who begged Joab to spare the city. Surely the Song of Deborah is of earlier date; there, too, the phrase is used of a woman, as Dr. Cuyler uses it; in Samuel it apparently means a mother city. No one will read the book for doctrine or Scripture exegesis; but if one gives no lead in these matters it is also as well not to mislead. Perhaps the most beautiful thing in the book is the prayer of an aged teacher quoted in the last essay but one; and one of the best sayings in the book is this: "The sermon that no sceptic can answer is the sermon of a clear, vigorous, happy and fruitful life."

[SECOND NOTICE.]

THE reviews of books occupy less space in the second number of the Hibbert Journal than the first, but the fifty pages devoted to them are filled with matter of great interest and value. The two chief reviews are of Mr. Stopford Brooke's "Poetry of Robert Browning," by the Dean of Ely, and of McTaggart's "Studies in Hegelian Cosmology," by Professor Baillie, of Aberdeen. Dr. Stubbs writes very pleasantly of Browning, with considerable quotations from Mr. Brooke's volume, but with a final regret that no study of Browning's theology, centred in his fundamental belief in the Immanence of the Divine in Man, was included. Having quoted the great confession of Paracelsus, just before his death, ending with the lines,

> If I stoop
> Into a dark tremendous sea of cloud,
> It is but for a time; I press God's lamp
> Close to my breast; its splendour soon or late
> Will pierce the gloom; I shall emerge one day,

Dr. Stubbs adds:—

> Here are all the great moral affirmations which underlie Browning's poetry—God, the heart of all being, the Father and Educator of Humanity—Evolution, God's way of order and progress—Love, the energy of all life—Life, meaning mission, meaning discipline, meaning redemption—Never one lost good—Noble failure, the way to ultimate success—Imperfection, only perfection hid—Death, only the entrance to fuller life and clearer vision. And it is because of these affirmations, because of this faith, because Browning himself—to quote the words of Mr. Stopford Brooke's noble peroration—was "creative and therefore joyful, at one with humanity and therefore loving, aspiring to God and believing in God, and therefore steeped to the lips in radiant Hope, at one with the past, passionate with the present, and possessing by faith an endless and glorious future"; because, too—to quote his own death words—he was
> "One who never turned his back, but marched breast forward,
> Never doubted clouds would break,
> Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
> Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better, > Sleep to wake"——

that his poetry must ever remain for his countrymen a well-spring of spiritual strength, prompting them to abundant moods of worship and reverence of deep-seated gratitude and sovereign love.

Among the other reviews is one by Professor Adeney, of the new popular edition of "Supernatural Religion," which should be read by all who are interested in that once famous book. To-day, Professor Adeney says, the book comes back to us as an anachronism. "Although its author informs us that it has been carefully revised, its spirit and tone and temper are unchanged, and they are the spirit and tone and temper of an effete Philistine Anti-Christian Crusade." The book, this notice admits, is based on much genuine knowledge, and its arguments are stated with admirable lucidity and force. But the new edition has not benefited, as it should have done, by Lightfoot's searching criticisms, "Supernatural Religion is not a scientific dissertation, it represents the special pleading of a debater." Professor Percy Gardner contributes a notice of "Contentio Veritatis," welcoming the book as a wholesome sign of earnest liberal thought among the younger Oxford Churchmen. "It is very pleasant to find the rudiments of an Anglican school of Broad Church theology at Oxford. Nor can it be said that the intellectual level of the book is lower than that of the more noted Lux Mundi." Another Oxford study is the notice by Professor Upton of the volume of philosophical essays on "Personal Idealism." Reviews are also contributed by Dr. James Moffat, Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, Dr. S. H. Mellone, the Revs. A. L. Lilley and Charles Hargrove, Mr. F. C. Conybeare and Professor Bacon, of Yale, while the valuable synopsis of the contents of recent theological and philosophical periodicals is furnished by the Rev. J. H. Woods, of Willaston, and Dr. Hicks.

A new feature in this second number is the "Discussions," taking up points in Professor Gardner's article in the first number on "The Basis of Christian Doctrine"; Professor Royce's article on "The Concept of the Infinite," Mr. Conybeare's "Early Doctrinal Modifications of the Text of the Gospels," and Mr. Armstrong's and Dr. Horton's notes on "Catastrophes and Moral Order." This method of procedure, at intervals of three months, does not appear to us to produce a really satisfactory discussion of the vital questions raised by the Catastrophes of Martinique and St. Vincent. The single contribution in this number repeats what have long been the common-places of the "non-religious point of view," and leaves us entirely unsatisfied and asking for an immediate response. Three months hence, we must hope that Mr. Armstrong or Dr. Horton will have the opportunity of some further word on the subject.

There remain four of the principal articles to which we did not refer in our first notice.

Dr. Drummond's study of "The Meaning of 'Righteousness of God' in the Theology of St. Paul," begun in the first number, is concluded in this, and brings weighty reasons to establish the natural moral significance of the words in question, pleading that this righteousness in Paul's view exists as a divine essence in God, and is shared by faithful men. Contrasting it in men with a righteousness, which might be supposed to be attained by perfect obedience to an external law, Dr. Drummond says:—

> There is, however, another righteousness, the absolute and eternal reality, God's own Spirit of Holiness, Justice, and Love, which does not consist in obedience to a law, but is itself the fountain of law, and the generator of all pure and beneficent activity. Of this unfailing stream man may drink by faith; and then he no longer stands over against God, with reluctant passion and prudential strength, but is on the side of God, with the divine life working in and through him, and yielding with the spontaneous ease of love the righteous acts which formerly were wrung from an unfilial heart.

In curious contrast with this article is that by Professor W. B. Smith, of Tulane University, New Orleans, "Did Paul write Romans?" which denies and asserts a good many things with great emphasis, and which we may leave to be dealt with by Professor Schmiedel in the April number of the Journal.

Mr. C. G. Montefiore, writing on "Jewish Scholarship and Christian Silence," convicts leading Scholars on the Chsistian side of a not very creditable ignoring of the arguments of the most recent and best equipped Jewish scholars, which run counter to the conceptions current among Christians of the burdens of the Jewish law, and particularly of the Sabbath.

For the pleasure of a final quotation from this rich number, we have kept to the last the attractive article by Professor Lewis Campbell on "Aspects of the Moral Ideal—Old and New." In spite of all signs to the contrary at the present moment, Professor Campbell has faith in the persistence of the higher ideals, and, taking up the word of Pericles to the Athenians, insists that any greatness in this or any other country must be built upon the sterling character of individual men and women. To this end the strength of the Hebrew prophets and the Christian ideal remain with us, and he briefly refers to some of the greatest of the more recent inspirers of our best life, especially the great English teachers of the last century.

Of Matthew Arnold Professor Campbell speaks as "little less than a prophet," yet for effectual inspiration "we must go back to the fresh and inexhaustible sources of an earlier time; to the Gospels, not as read through the medium of St. Francis or of Marcus Aurelius; to the Hebrew prophets, not as explained away; to Æschylus, Plato, Epictetus, the teachers of an earlier world. And we must also listen to the Eternal Voice that calls to us through the events that pass in our own lives and in the course of history." Even those who do not thus come to feel at once that they are in the hands of a Higher Power leading ever to greater good, will find, Professor Campbell declares, that what they suffer is discipline that is leading them, as through a dark porch to the sun, and that taken rightly it is rich in possibilities of good. And his final appeal is thus expressed:—

> Let us use our liberties to climb upwards into the ampler air. We can afford to deal in affirmatives, and not in negations merely. Self-devotion rather than self-abnegation; affections not renounced, but expanding into universal kindliness; that human love which in a higher love endures:—not bare refusal of the gifts of life, but the strong determination to be ever giving more than we receive.
> Self-preservation also, but for the sake of others, and personal liberty jealously guarded, but only that we may serve the more. Not other-worldliness, but an increasing sense that what is best in this world points to a better world beyond; earthly passions not annihilated, but subdued to spiritual aims.
> Such are some of the watchwords of religious freedom. If only we can acquire a genuine sense of proportion, so as to be aware when higher purposes claim a right to overbear all lower motives, then we may go forth to action without uneasy scruples, and enjoy without self-reproach. Ourselves standing firmly on the upward path, we may strengthen our brethren and support the weak; combining warm emotion with clear thought and an unwavering will; resolved to live always in the spirit of what is good and beautiful and true.

OBITUARY.

JOSHUA WARNE.

ON Sunday, Jan. 18, there passed away the oldest member and trustee, and one of the founders of the West Ham-lane Unitarian Church, Stratford. Joshua Warne was born nearly eighty-five years ago. He was a native of Norfolk, and was brought up in the Methodist Church. Early in life he thought out his religious faith for himself, and became a Unitarian. When the late Rev. Thomas Rix commenced Unitarian services in a small room in Bow Mr. Warne became one of his earliest and most earnest adherents. Upon the removal of the church in 1869 to the present building in West Ham-lane he was appointed one of the Church Trustees, and from that date down to within the last few years he was seldom absent from either of the Sunday services. For many years he was Chairman of the Church Committee. He was a man of sterling character, and being firmly convinced of the truths of Unitarianism himself he never allowed an opportunity to pass of advocating them. He was a tailor by trade, and used to speak of persecutions he had suffered in the workshop and elsewhere on account of his views. Not only was he an advocate of Unitarianism, but he was well known in West Ham as a temperance worker, and in earlier life was a telling platform and open-air speaker. He was a member of several temperance societies and lodges, and his influence was widely felt.

On Saturday last a funeral service was held in the West Ham-lane Unitarian Church, conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. The church was quite full, many temperance friends being present. Two of Mr. Warne's favourite hymns—"Lead, kindly Light," and "Abide with me"—were sung. Mr. Edwards spoke of Mr. Warne's strong convictions, of his courage and his faith in Unitarianism. His remains were brought there that afternoon to the church he helped to found, and which he had loved so well. He had lived and he had died a Unitarian. The body was taken from the church direct to the grave in West Ham Cemetery, where, after the concluding service, Mr. Hodges, of the "Charles Connolly" Lodge U.O.T.A.S.P., spoke of the excellent work Mr. Warne had done in the cause of temperance. He was one of the founders of the lodge, and his name would go down as an inspiration to those who would follow in his footsteps. On the following evening the Rev. W. H. Rose made feeling reference to the subject, and urged upon those present to go on with the good work in which Mr. Warne had taken such an active interest. The church stood for freedom in the neighbourhood, it was open to all, and no conformity to creeds or articles of faith was essential for membership. It rested with those present to continue the good work so well begun.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A LITTLE girl is learning to read, and of all the words she knows already, she likes best to read "Oh!" and "Why?" She finds that she can put so much expression into an "Oh!" and "Why?" is such a useful word just by itself.

You have perhaps noticed how many different meanings there are of the word "Oh!" according to the tone of voice. It is a sort of Jack-of-all-trades that can do the work of any other calling-out word, exclamation, or interjection, as it is called in grammar. It may stand for alas! or hurrah! or bother! It may mean how jolly! or how tiresome! how lovely! or how ugly! how delicious! or how nasty! how wonderful! or how stupid! how nice! or how silly!

And have you noticed that whatever meaning is put into the sound of the "Oh!" is put also into the expression of the face at the same time? In this way even a deaf person can tell the meaning of our exclamations, can read our "Ohs!" by the look on our faces.

It is still more remarkable that the sort of "Oh!" we use most often makes itself gradually seen in the general expression of the face even at other times. A child whose "Ohs!" generally mean "how jolly!" comes to have a pleasant face. One whose "Oh!" more often means "how tiresome!" is apt to get an unpleasant expression. The children who are in the habit of saying "how silly!" or "how stupid!" to the games of other children, or even of saying just "Oh!" with that sort of meaning, will soon show their lack of interest in their faces. An "Oh!" of that kind may be like a splash of cold water to a younger child—what we call a wet blanket! Indeed, the tone of your "Ohs!" makes sunshine or shadow for your companions, and especially to the younger brothers and sisters at home.

An "Oh!" may speak encouragement or discouragement, interest or lack of interest, readiness to help or unreadiness. It is wonderful how much sympathy may be put into an "Oh!" It may speak comfort for a broken toy; it may ease the ache of a bruised finger.

In fact, an "Oh!"—like any other interjection—says just whatever we are feeling at the moment, for it is like an open door that lets out whatever is nside.

If we are in the habit of letting out many disagreeable interjections, it is a good plan to try to keep the door shut when disagreeable feelings want to come out. Then, when we have overcome such feelings, the door can be opened again. Try to keep the door shut on the impatient, irritable, and discontented "Ohs!"

The happy voices of young people make bright music in the world, but if many of the unpleasant tones come into the voices, then this music is like

> Sweet bells jangled
> Out of tune and harsh.

And now what about the "Ohs!" of real pain? Some people cry out before they are hurt, and some cry out before they are hurt much.

We all expect little children to cry sometimes. As they grow into bigger children they learn to bear their hurts without crying. And having learned this, they are sometimes impatient with the younger ones who still cry. An "Oh, you cry-baby!" adds the new hurt of unkindness to the hurt that is there already, whilst a kindly, encouraging "Oh, I am so sorry; but don't cry!" helps the little one to be brave.

We all have to learn to bear our hurts without crying out, to keep the door shut on the "Ohs!" of pain, and to be cheerful, not glum, doorkeepers.

But we cannot learn this all at once, and we may do much to help one another.

Remember that other people too are doorkeepers to their own "Ohs!" of impatience or pain, or worry or weariness. If we were all to let out such "Ohs!" what a chorus of lamentation there would be!

I know of a home for crippled children where they are taught from the first, not to cry, not to complain. There are so many of them that it would never do for them all to be crying together. And however kind and loving the nurse may be, she could not comfort them all at once. So they learn not to make it sadder for one another by crying or complaining; and it is wonderful how much happier they all are through learning to keep back the "Ohs!" of pain and to let out only the "Ohs!" of pleasure.

These children are brave, cheerful doorkeepers. And in their home, instead of "sweet bells jangled" there are bright voices making sweet music in their little world.

And because they are not busy crying out when the pain is bad, do you not think that they must be able, all the better, to hear the voice of God in their hearts? He hears their silent "Ohs!" He knows all about it, and is with them in their pain.

There are a great many of us in the world, and though only a few will have so much pain all their lives as those little cripples, we shall all have to bear some pain and disappointment.

Our spoken "Ohs!" of complaint often prevent our hearing "the still, small voice," speaking to us quiet "Ohs!" of comfort and cheer.

Let us remember that we are all alike children of our Father in Heaven, and that He is never too busy to hear even our silent "Ohs!" Nor is He too busy to hear us at all times and to care whether our spoken "Ohs!" are of the kind to hinder or to help our companions.

MELBOURNE JUBILEE FUND.

SIR,—Will you grant me a little space in which I may thank those ladies and gentlemen who have generously contributed the £88 13s., just come to hand, towards our Jubilee Fund? It is a beautiful Christmas-box; and I can assure the contributors, on behalf of the committee and church, that this timely sympathy and help has deeply touched our hearts. The Rev. W. C. Bowie has acknowledged these donations privately on our behalf, and we are greatly obliged by his courtesy and kindness; we, however, desire to express publicly our thanks to the donors and also to the B. and F.U.A. for the help and encouragement thus given. They will be glad to learn that, thanks to this assistance, the success of the movement is assured, as we have every confidence that within the specified time the whole £500 will be raised. That is so far cheering and satisfactory, and I trust that the uses to which this money will be put may amply justify the generosity of our English friends.

BOOKS WANTED FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—Will you allow me through your columns to ask if any of your readers have a surplus of books for which they would be glad to find a good use? Facts coming to light by every mail tend to show that the destruction of property in South Africa has extended to whole libraries.

While we should be eager to supply the physical needs of our new fellow-subjects, we ought to recognise the bond of sympathy which a common desire for culture produces. The loss of books has been specially felt by ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church, as well as in a large degree by the better class of farmers.

To give a few instances:—

The Rev. Mr. Snijman, of Ventersberg, has lost his whole library of one thousand books. The minister of Fouriesberg has only torn pages left of his library. At Rouxville Manse, Matthew Henry's "Commentary on Lamentations" was picked up from a heap of refuse. At Phillipolis, the Manse of the Rev. Mr. Fraser and its belongings were wholly destroyed. Lindley Town and four churches have suffered complete destruction; Bulfontein, the manse was destroyed. At Jacobsdal, the Rev. Mr. Boshoff is trying to repair his losses. At Schweizer Reineke, Transvaal, the Rev. T. F. C. Faustmann finds house, church and possessions wholly demolished. And at Hartebeestefontein a similar state of things is described by the minister lately returned there.

At this juncture, when salaries are necessarily diminished and all available monies needed for the bare necessities of life, there will of course be no margin for the purchase and replacement of books. It has been thought that many people in England, who feel unable to contribute in other ways, would gladly embrace this opportunity by giving assistance. This might be done:—

1. By gifts of books, including theology, history and general literature.

2. By redirecting magazines, monthly or weekly, for which addresses will be furnished when applied for.

I earnestly desire also to collect any old Dutch Bibles, of which many are known to be in England, with the view of restoring them to their former owners. These Bibles usually contain the family records, which have now extra importance considering that the church registers have been so largely destroyed.

THE MINISTRY OF WORSHIP.

WHEN it is asked how our churches may be rendered more effective in the service to which they are called, and how we ourselves may gain a new impulse of gladness and strenuous devotion through a more distinct and profounder sense of the greatness of that calling, one answer is quite clear. Make the Church more truly what, according to its first and most essential meaning, it is intended to be, a House of GOD, a place of prayer, the meeting-place of those who are gathered together for worship of the living GOD and true communion in the hidden spiritual life. Other answers there are, to one of which we referred last week, in speaking of the need of self-forgetfulness in beneficent work, but this, which lays stress on the need for a deeper and more steadfast spirit of worship in the Church, is no less urgent and cannot take any second place in the consideration of what is essential to the true and effective service of our churches.

It must be laid upon the heart and conscience of every member of a Church, that this is an obligation shared by all alike, from the appointed minister to the humblest member, not merely to come for the help that may be received, not merely to be ministered unto, but to minister, to give of that humble, reverent, prayerful, and aspiring spirit, which in the union of numbers, cleansed of discordant elements, makes the quietness of the house of prayer, the uplifting of a united holy purpose, in answer to which comes the sense of a Divine overshadowing and blessing, the great joy and inspiration of worship in spirit and in truth.

Herein is to be found a distinct aim, which appeals to the faithfulness of each one. This is what the Church is for, and the Church can only live in the faithfulness of its members. It is a distinct work of helpful ministry, of which the world stands in sore need, and in which we are every one of us called to do our part.

For the sake of our own need we are to do it, and still more for the sake of our brothers' need, as an act of helpfulness, to strengthen that which is best in our common life, to make the places of Divine quickening, of rest and inspiration, that shall reach out helping hands, and gather in and heal those whose need is the greatest.

We are to come together simply and earnestly, to be together in the presence of GOD, in a quiet prayerful spirit, with receptive mind and heart, with ready sympathy and the frankest fellow-feeling; then will the word of truth and right appeal to us as it glowed in the prophet's heart, the song of praise will be a genuine rejoicing, in which voices blend and hearts are kindled to a new sense of the beauty and the worth of life, while in the silence of devotion or the uttered prayer, men are brought nearer to GOD and nearer to one another, conscious of the deeper life of the spirit, with a strong hold upon the unseen things, which are eternal; in that communion the FATHER'S will becomes more clear, His blessing is more fully known, and self-surrender more complete. A place of quietness, of quietness with GOD, of insight and inspiration—that is what the Church must be, and what the people must make it; for, by the grace of GOD, that is what they can make it.

There is a well-known and very striking passage in ROBERT BARCLAY'S "Apology," in the section on Worship, which tells of the power of ministry there was in the gatherings of the early Quakers, and throws much light on this subject :—

> Yea, sometimes, when there is not a word in the meeting, but all are silently waiting, if one come in that is rude and wicked, and in whom the power of darkness prevaileth much, perhaps with an intention to mock or do mischief, if the whole meeting be gathered into the life, and it be raised in a good measure, it will strike terror into such an one, and he will feel himself unable to resist; but by the secret strength and virtue thereof, the power of darkness in him will be chained down; and if the day of his visitation be not expired, it will reach to the measure of grace in him, and raise it up to the redeeming of his soul. And this we often bear witness of, so that we have had frequent occasion in this respect, since God hath gathered us to be a people, to renew this old saying of many, Is Saul also among the prophets? For not a few have come to be convinced of the truth after this manner, of which I myself, in part, am a true witness, who not by strength of arguments, or by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and convincement of my understanding thereby, came to receive and bear witness of the truth, but by being secretly reached by this life; for when I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart, and as I gave way unto it, I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And, indeed, this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root, and such a knowledge will not be barren nor unfruitful. After this manner we desire, therefore, all that come among us to be proselyted, knowing that though thousands should be convinced in their understanding of all the truths we maintain, yet if they were not sensible of this inward life, and their souls not changed from unrighteousness to righteousness, they could add nothing to us. For this is that cement whereby we are joined, as to the Lord, so to one another, and without this none can worship with us. Yea, if such should come among us, and from that understanding and convincement they have of the truth, speak ever so true things, and utter them forth with ever so much excellency of speech, if this life were wanting, it would not edify us at all, but be as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

There are things in that testimony which we shall do well to ponder. In our gatherings for worship, is there such a secret power, so that those who come in know that they have entered a House of GOD? Architecture, music, eloquence, all may have their rightful place, but it is not they, it is the secret life of a faithful people, in the act of earnest reverent worship, which does the truest work of ministry; and this is the ideal to be kept ever clearly in view, for it is a great and holy service which is to be rendered, which only living Churches can render to the sorest needs.

Amid the haste and stress of modern life, and the insistent claims of multitudinous interests, it is to be feared that habits of private devotion, and still more of family worship, are sadly neglected. They cannot be permanently abandoned without a lamentable impoverishment of life; but meanwhile there must be all the more strenuous endeavour to maintain the united worship of the Church, and religiously to guard those quiet places of our common life.

It is a purpose which may rightly claim the most earnest thought and devotion, to which the highest gifts are fitly consecrated. Even in the humblest gathering for worship, in the lowliest house of prayer, the word of Divine truth may be spoken with convincing power, and the inspiration of the true life be felt. Not for splendour or wealth must be our prayer, but for simplicity and sincerity in worship, a humility and reverence through which the strength of the Eternal may be breathed, that our churches may indeed bear witness to GOD in the world, controlling baser passions, putting all unworthiness to shame, and inspiring noble purposes of well-doing. We may well ask ourselves whether we give all the time we can to this great work of the hidden spiritual life, out of which must spring all else that is noblest in the world, whether we give not time only, but the humble and strenuous endeavour of mind and heart and soul, to bring the worthiest gifts, and in the fellowship of our brethren to make our churches worthy of that sacred ministry to which they are called.

AND THE MEN?

THERE lies before us an appeal to the consciences of all such as love the twin-pearls of purity and equity. It bears the signature of the "Open Brotherhood"—a source, though shrouded under a thick veil of anonymity, from which we are beginning to expect utterances cleaving to the marrow of conscience with the prophetic fervour of men burning with hatred of evil and longing for righteousness and truth. No pleading that has come to us from this quarter has awakened in us a deeper sympathy and respect than the present appeal.

It refers with a plainness which to many readers may be unwelcome, yet which has in it a wholesome savour for which the world will be the better, to certain aspects of the recent case in connection with the Comedy Theatre at Manchester. It is not necessary here to recall the details of the case. It is enough to remind the reader that the lessee brought an action against the Chairman of the Watch Committee for libel, that the latter met the charge by adducing proof of shocking misconduct in the management of the theatre, and that the Court pronounced unhesitatingly for the defendant.

The "Open Brotherhood" recognise the great service rendered by the defendant to the cause of morality. But they point out and deplore certain features of the proceedings which gravely detract from their moral value, and constitute a most lamentable violation of equity. Those who conducted the case, it appears, relied exclusively on the evidence of women guilty of misconduct to the exclusion of the men who were partners of their guilt. Young women and girls were forced to testify to their own shame, while no like stern compulsion was placed upon the sharers of their sin. This fact alone is to be deplored, and must inevitably tend to lax and corrupt judgments on one of the most awful ethical problems that can challenge the human conscience. But if the propounders of this appeal are correct, and doubtless they do not write without knowledge, the case is very much worse than that, for they depose that men were deliberately shielded from exposure. They speak of the pity and the shame with which they have beheld the exposure of "our poor sisters." But they declare that they have observed "with far exceeding shame, the extraordinary care with which the citation of any one of the causers and partners of that degradation has been avoided." If this be true, if male witnesses capable of giving relevant evidence, though to their own disrepute, were purposely screened and spared from public exposure, no language can be too strong in which to denounce so flagrant a violation of equity and decency, and no person, however eminently placed, who was a party to or condoned such an arrangement deserves the recognition of honourable men; and the citizens who expose and denounce the scandal will have the grateful approbation of all lovers of justice and humanity.

The authors of the appeal go on to further reflections which deserve the most earnest consideration of all elements of society. These guilty, but shielded, men are moving about freely in society. Their fellow-sinners are received by no householder, shut out from every home. But they, burdened by yet a deeper guilt, are moving among the wives and daughters of Manchester unabashed. Their presence is a pollution. They poison the atmosphere in which they move.

But they who pray for the coming of the Kingdom of GOD cannot rest satisfied with the denunciation of the corrupters of society. They will not be content with their exclusion from the drawing-rooms of decent people. They also are immortal souls. Stained and polluted, they yet are children of GOD. There are many organised efforts for the "rescue" of the woman. Is there to be no attempt to rescue the men who frequent the streets with evil intent? A strong and valiant Christianity would have words to speak also to them. "Can we not," ask the Open Brotherhood, "scourge to repentance and new life our brother-men?" And if we have not command of the speech or touch by which they too might be converted, at least let us arouse ourselves to the call to save their boys and ours, that the innocent may not put off their innocence, and the ingenuous eye of youth may not be dulled by the fouling of the well of life.

There be many who turn with aversion from all contemplation of the awful problems lying about such themes as these. To all of us they are hard to deal with well and wisely. All gratitude and honour, therefore, to godly men who, speaking with wisdom and conviction, lay before us such issues as those of this dark episode in the social life of Manchester, and recall us to the eternal law of GOD.

R. A. A.

THE Ruskin Hall movement promises well in Stockport. There are about a dozen residents, nearly all working men engaged in daily labour. At the inaugural lecture on "John Ruskin," by the Rev. Priestley Prime, despite very inclement weather, some 130 people attended and listened with intelligent interest. Mr. Richard Robinson is also among the lecturers. He is to speak on Carlyle's "French Revolution" and on George's "Progress and Poverty," in a series of lectures on "Epoch-making Books." In the same course Mr. Prime will deal with Wordsworth's "Prelude."

COMMUNICATIVE ENTHUSIASM.

"We have found him, of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph."—John i. 45.

WE are none of us strangers to enthusiasm. A country walk, an absorbing story, a brilliant play, a volume of suggestive essays immediately calls up to the surface of the soul a glow of desire that others should participate in our enjoyment. The "bore" and the fanatic witness to the same profit-sharing tendency. Unfortunately, their distortion of the quality has not recommended it, but that is the fault not of enthusiasm but of their own deficiency, and it ought not to make us niggard of our joy. Unless there is something very wrong with us, to enjoy in isolation is pain. The man without enthusiasm is like

> The man that hath no music in himself
> Nor is not moved with concord of sweet sounds.

—and probably for the same reason; for though we may dispute the etymological affinity of the two words, we shall admit that music, as the divinest expression of consciousness, is the nearest approach to that God-given utterance which the Greeks had in mind when they gave us the word "enthusiasm." The higher in the scale our pleasures are pitched, the more imperative does the quality become. There is not a single discovery that does not set all time echoing "Eureka!" Science, knowledge, poetry, art—all are crystals of enthusiasm. The higher man rises the more must he give; the loftier his attainments, the more lavish his hand. It is good to share a pleasure; it is heaven to share the truth. And who shall say that the truth of truths does not lie in the etymology of "enthusiasm"? who deny that word and faculty alike are significant of our true nature? that in small things as in great, in the boy who relates to his schoolfellows the latest instalment of a serial, as in the bard giving birth to "rending" song > on isles of the Ægæon

> Lovely and eager when the earth was young, this quality proclaims our parentage? Very strongly did the philosopher-poet feel this:—

> Poor vaunt of life indeed
> Were man but formed to feed
> On joy, to solely seek, and find, and feast . . .
> Rejoice we are allied
> To that which doth provide
> And not partake, effect and not receive!

I verily believe there is more of our Divine parentage articulate in the flush of a child's enthusiasm than in the glow and glory of setting and rising suns. Blessed is the man who retains this child's spirit, this eager, self-communicating joy, blessed for his own sake and for the sake of all about him. Of such are they who keep the world from staling, nay, they infuse new life, they achieve a new birth, they are of Him who at the first commanded the light to shine out of darkness, and "of his own free will" bequeathed matter with the germ of eternal life.

This eager communicating joy was by no means confined to the Greeks. It had a foremost place in the Hebrew mind, though the objects of his enthusiasm were vastly different, and the channel his enthusiasm took was often dark and terrible. In the instance selected here, however, it is altogether happy. I need not tell you the story of Philip's finding Jesus—one of the shortest and brightest incidents in the story of Nazara. Recognising in Jesus the man he had been taught to seek, his first impulse was to find Nathanael and communicate the glad news to him. Such a story, so simply true to the best within us, can never fade; nor does it require any further words to point out its intrinsic beauty. I refer to it as indicative of that personal note which it seems so desirable should animate our Church life to a greater extent than it does at present.

Rejoicing together in the Light.

God has shown us that we are not alone; that there are others whom He has been leading by the same rugged path. In their company we have found that community of thought and feeling for which in the days of doubt we longed so ardently; more than that, we have found that our minds, at rest in this element of human sympathy and love, have slowly clarified, precipitating into solid conviction the thoughts that troubled us, and leaving our souls clear to reflect a brighter earth and ampler sky.

Take two instances only of this new and glad experience: We feel, with the poet,

> A presence that disturbs us with the joy
> Of elevated thought; a sense sublime
> Of something far more deeply interfused than that deity, so little removed from pagan conceptions, that is the bare tradition of so many. We rejoice in a present God, One who > presses palpably

> His soul on ours, who

> Speaks to us in bird and brook
> Equally as in His book;
> Speaks to this our present age
> In each voice of bard and sage;
> And by deeds of love and grace
> Hallows every day and place.

Yes; we have found Him whom all law and all prophecy proclaims. And when we think of the manifold way in which this glad assurance mingles with all our activities, relationships, hopes, and aims, are not our hearts overflowing with joy?

Again, we have found in Jesus, not a creature of myth whose incredible birth and resurrection belied our hearts' love, whose "Divinity" filled us with despair, but a Man; one who was no stranger to our limitations and temptations, but who overcame because he read aright the secret of human greatness, and made service the supreme interest of his life; who > taught mankind

> What 'tis to be a man; to give, not take;
> To serve, not rule; to nourish, not devour;
> To help, not crush; if need, to die, not live.

In him we find a guide for life, an incentive to the humblest duty, a rational hope for the race's progress, and, as some of us must believe, a living and personal leader to-day

> Whose voice directs us in the strife,
> Whose love still lifts the level of life.

Once more, I say, if Philip had cause for rejoicing, if Luther broke out into jubilant song, if our fathers who found, under Wesley and Whitfield, the joy of "sins forgiven," sent their enthusiasm like an electric current through the length and breadth of the land, how much greater cause for joy have we who have all the assurance in harmony with reason and progress!

These things are not merely intellectual assets in the wealth of life; they are much more; they are the experience of the soul. They answer to what our fathers meant when they spoke of "passing from death unto life." Filled with a glad sense of them, heart and mind and spirit should be fused in one enthusiastic glow. We ought to be the most enthusiastic people alive! One reads in the "religious" Press till one is tired that Unitarianism is a "negative religion." A negative religion! Not to those who come to it with heart-ache of earnest search; not to those who approach it across the desert of a starved spiritual experience. To them it holds the very water of life, and appears the most "positive" form of religion extant. I am unable to conceive of a people under a deeper obligation, and with a more joyful incentive to communicate their experience to others than we are.

To help the Brethren.

Everywhere our message should be certain, clear, magnetic. In the workshop, the office, the house-party, it should be our delight to "find" and to "tell." If we have to hold aloof from much that appeals to the amiable and unreflecting sympathy, our very aloofness should have something joyous, something positive about it. You remember the picture, "Diana or Christ"? the quiet peace on the face of the Christian maiden who cannot sacrifice to Diana though her lover implores her? Stern times were those, times calculated to breed an iron will. And not less stern are these if we are true. It is no longer, "Diana or Christ"; but "Christ or Jesus." The real issue of the time was expressed by Dr. Guinness Rogers the other day, when, in his Merchant's Lecture, he drew the line between a human Jesus and the Christ of the Churches. You and I know very well all that is implied in that contrast. We feel that the hope of progress largely rests on keeping "Jesus of Nazara, the son of Joseph," clear from the alien superstition that has obsessed him. There can be no manner of compromise. Our language is:

> Stand thou on that side, for on this am I;

yet, like the maiden in the picture, we can show that our inability to acquiesce in superstition is caused by the upwelling within us of the joy of salvation! The tone of our mind must discover the fact, not that we are sceptics, but believers; that what we have found is too precious to be foregone for the opinion of society, or for life itself.

Share or Lose it all.

Nor must we be tempted by false modesty to economise our joy. If it really is joy, the enthusiasm will be perfectly natural, therefore perfectly modest. But where a natural shrinking in our disposition tends to stifle our communicative joy, let us remember that the vindication of enthusiasm is helpfulness. God has not caused us to cross the wilderness for ourselves merely, but that truths which we have found may find and quicken others. Every kind of freedom is freedom to serve. "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren" is what the Voice says to all. Too often we forget they are brethren, too often we say that the light and freedom we enjoy require a special kind of preparation, that without an experience similar to our own what we hold dear is not likely to be appreciated or even understood. So far as the preparation is concerned that is true, but we have no reason to regard our preparation as confined to ourselves. How often some soul suddenly opens to our gaze, revealing the same needs, doubts, troubles, soul-history as our own. There is no heart where the divine agency is not active, where law and prophets have not been at work.

Men may seem careless and women superficial, but there is no life that is not secretly thirsting for a higher good than it already knows. And if we would but let ourselves be more simple and natural we should find continually the Divine without us ready to respond to the Divine within. If only we would rid ourselves of our artificial modesties and precautions, and let ourselves go with the spontaneous enthusiasm of a child, what a current of joy would cleanse this earth! There is a passage in Bushnell that every one of us would do well to get by heart:

> The joy that broke into the disciples' hearts burned up all false modesty. Their humble position was exalted by their attachment to Jesus, and they stood forth in all the singularity of the cross, cowed by no superiors, and daunted by no perils. God made them heroes simply by making them natural. ("The New Life," p. 278.)

Finally, let us remember that without communicative enthusiasm the joy we experience will die. This is the simple and inevitable working out of law, for, our true nature being "allied to that which doth provide," if we are false to it, and economise the joy instead of spending it, we must pay the penalty of our falsity, i.e., loss.

> The torch that is not waved aloft
> Will fail and die.

The high thoughts on which we have loved to dwell will dwindle into impotent truisms. Many a young man at the instigation of an inquiring spirit has thrown in his lot with Unitarianism, but fearing to be thought a bore or some other terrible thing, he has stifled his convictions where best they might have borne fruit, and the result is that they have "continued for a time and then withered away." Profound is the psychological truth of those words of Jesus: "He that denies me before men, him will I deny before my Father." To conceal the truth we feel, is to cease to be gript by it. For such a one the spiritual world with all its wonder and worship passes away, as well as reason and insight, and will, leaving him unmanned among the shadows, a poor, pitiful creature who has a name to live but is dead.

No such doom shall be ours, if we obey the universal law of development, use in service. Therefore let us openly rejoice in the blessedness we have found. Let the discovery which has proved deliverance and life to us first reach those with whom we are brought into daily contact, and through them flow on in ever-increasing eddies until the furthest shores of human need are refreshed with the baptism of our own joy.

AN OBSTINATE FALLACY.

SIR,—Without any desire to reopen the friendly and valuable discussion between Mr. Davis and Mr. Lummis I should like to draw attention to certain interesting issues of the controversy that appear insufficiently realised. In the first place, one may rejoice to see that both parties are pleading for a free Church. But there is an important difference in the freedom demanded by them. Mr. Davis requires that one generation shall not be fettered by the last, and on that ground claims the right to call our churches Unitarian now, whatever they may have been formerly. We are, in fact, to be free to grow and develop from age to age without definable limit, but he maintains that at any particular moment there must necessarily be limits to the diversity of view tolerable within any conscious unity, such as a true Church must surely be. On the other hand, if I rightly understand Mr. Lummis, his ideal of freedom is that every individual shall be free all the time to hold any opinions and yet to belong to the Church. In other words, every member is to be his own judge of whether he has ipso facto ceased to be a member of the "communion," and no name or outward definition or estimate must be there to prejudice his decision. This is certainly an enticing vision, and is already an actual reality to some extent amongst us. But, as at present stated, it makes our practical organisation and progress extraordinarily difficult, and, what is far more important still, it is, I am persuaded, in its most common form based on nothing less than "an obstinate fallacy."

For in truth our very faith in freedom is derived from a dogma so deep-rooted as generally to be sub-conscious. All fellowship is necessarily based on some conscious or sub-conscious community of ideas. And a Church without any dogma is a contradiction. So far as the human race itself really is a brotherhood, it is so far more essentially on account of a certain root kinship of mind than of mere bodily likeness. Now, the root idea or dogma which makes us believe in freedom and really binds us into a fellowship is faith that the light within each soul bears a real and individual relation to the absolute Light. From this fundamental faith (which may be expressed in many different ways) we deduce the position that truth is best served by freedom, that is freedom to follow or express the true, the rational, or the divine (call it what you will) within us. And this is the only possible justification for freedom. The vital importance of recognising this may be illustrated by an imaginary and extreme but quite relevant case. A missionary among the blacks would scarcely be expected to make much headway if his only gospel were freedom of religious thought! For freedom, while it is the condition of all truth, is not in itself any truth at all. But if on the other hand he goes possessed with the idea that each savage soul has a dersonal relation to the universal Deity involving him in the dignity of personal rights and duties, his gospel may bring light and freedom too; because, however imperfectly, it reflects in some measure the foundation truth of all human progress and knowledge.

In other words, if we are to spread our light we must have a positive conception of it. Yea more, we cannot even associate on a mere negation such as freedom. What we can associate upon is faith in one another, that is in the "light within."

But if this is so, does it not afford a concordat between Mr. Davis and Mr. Lummis? Mr. Davis can still find a ground of coherence for his Church in the doctrine of faith in the "inner light," and if he wishes, he can still most aptly call it "Unitarian," since it is founded on the supreme unity, or the relation between Mind and each mind, that is, between human faculty and truth. And, again, Mr. Lummis can still make it his ideal to "evoke faculty rather than impart knowledge," on the ground (the only possible one) that faculty is in some sort veracious or divine.

JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

"BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH."

SIR,—A newspaper correspondence is apt to become like a snowball, bigger as it rolls. I feel that I must compress what I wish to say in reply to Mr. Rawlings within the smallest possible space.

In the first place I am quite willing to admit that I may have misread his first article on the subject, and gladly accept his disclaimer as to attacking the whole book then. I understood from his language that he did disapprove of the whole book and its teaching, and that he picked out two chapters as a sample of the fallacious reasoning contained throughout the book. My contention was that these two chapters were not a fair example of that reasoning. Mr. Rawlings now comes forward to attack the main contention of the book, and the economic and moral position taken up by the writer.

I need do no more with regard to these two chapters (13 and 14) than to point out that Mr. Rawlings is hardly fair to Mr. Blatchford. The statement he quotes, that "sobriety, thrift, &c., would, if adopted by all the workers," "enrich the idle and reduce the industrious to slavery," cannot be separated from the context, which is directed to the contention that these things will not of themselves bring about the social elevation of the workers, for which the writer yearns.

Mr. Blatchford says (p. 127): "The steady man benefits by his own steadiness and thrift, because his steadiness makes him a more reliable, and therefore a more valuable workman than one who is not steady."

But then he proceeds to argue that the present economic system, which places in land and capital the power to exact most of the wealth produced, will inevitably bring the chief share of such improved conditions of labour into their hands, and they and not labour will reap most benefit. I do not agree with Mr. Blatchford here, but it is only fair to him to point out that the reason why such a result as he fears would probably not be brought about is because the system breaks down, and considerations other and more powerful would certainly defeat so dire a result We can see the process in operation before our eyes. While the sobriety, thrift and steadiness of the workers are growing, so also is the Socialistic system of communal and national life.

Mr. Rawlings quotes three statements as Mr. Blatchford's "main contentions." They will do, though they are extremely bare and unqualified by themselves, and they are amplified and qualified each of them through the first few chapters of the book. They are, however, fairly representative. I will shorten them still more.

(a) The landlord produces nothing.
(b) The capitalist produces nothing.
(c) The worker produces all the wealth.

Mr. Rawlings says if he believed this "he would not demur to the sweeping language of the extreme Socialists, that landlords and capitalists are tyrants and robbers, and the workers are wage-slaves."

Mr. Blatchford does not say this. He says (p. 37): "I am not going to denounce either landlord or capitalist as a tyrant, a usurer, or a robber. Landlords and capitalists may be, and very often are, upright and well-meaning men. As such let us respect them."

Mr. Rawlings says that Mr. Blatchford warns the reader against the ambiguous term "workers" as an afterthought. I beg to differ. It is an essential part of Mr. Blatchford's argument.

(P. 32).—Work is said to be of two kinds, hand-work and brain-work, but really work is of one kind, the labour of hand and brain together. (P. 32).—When we say labour produces all wealth, we do not mean all wealth is produced by farm labourers and mechanics and navvies, but that it is all produced by workers—i.e., by thinkers as well as doers. (P. 36).—A capitalist may use capital, but in so far as he uses capital he is a worker. . . . As a capitalist he claims interest, as a worker he claims salary. A landlord may farm land, but in as far as he farms land, he is a worker.

I wish that Mr. Blatchford had dropped the personal terms "landlord" and "capitalist," and used the economic terms "land and capital." His argument would have been just as sound, and he would have avoided the personal note, which, to do him justice, he disclaims in the plainest way, but he would have saved some misconceptions of the kind that Mr. Rawlings has fallen into.

For let us look at Mr. Rawlings' instance, his typical ordinary case. The man who "lends his capital and lives on interest, he is now a mere capitalist." Mr. Rawlings asks: "Can it be truly said that he produces nothing?"

That depends. Certainly he does not by the mere act of lending his capital out at interest. He may do in some other way—by superintendence, by distribution, by rendering valuable service to the community, as writer, preacher, artist. But the passive act of lending capital is not production. Labour may use it in production; the natural properties of the land may provide the reward for the labour out of which interest will be paid.

Who is the producer? It lies between the Giver of the land (who seems to get less acknowledgment than any other under the present arrangement) and the labour.

The spade which I lend to Hodge, and which I bought with the produce of my labour, and for which I charge him 2s. 6d. per month, is used by him to dig his garden. The result of the digging, and planting, and attending is potatoes. Have I produced the potatoes? I lent the spade, and received payment. So far as that operation goes I am entitled to remuneration, for the spade was mine, and Hodge wanted it, but I cannot claim in that particular act to be a producer.

I must confess that I cannot follow Mr. Rawlings when he argues "that past exertion and present abstinence are equally important in production." Production is a continuous process, and unless, it goes on day by day somewhere past exertion will not avail much, and present abstinence will become a necessity. Indeed, Mr. Rawlings himself abandons this position. He says: "The stored results of his labour are used for production, and he is entitled to a share of the produce." Certainly. They are used by the producer, and he is entitled to interest.

Now Mr. Blatchford's whole position may be summed up in this. He says to the workers: The land belongs to the community by right, moral and economical. Be your own landlords and capitalists, paying fair compensation to existing "owners." Let Britain be for the British. As it is at present, private owners of land and private owners of capital charge too much as rent and interest for their share of the wealth which you, the workers, produce.

One word about Mr. Rawlings' closing point. He says Mr. Blatchford "invokes the doctrine of self-interest as the guide of life, and uses selfishness as an equivalent." I cannot find it. Mr. Blatchford begins by saying (Chap. I.), "Non-Socialists say that self-interest is the strongest motive in human nature. Let us take them at their word," and he proceeds to argue on this assumption and on this line.

I think Mr. Rawlings will admit that, judging by the usual character of non-Socialist political appeals we have listened to and read during the past few years, Mr. Blatchford's contention may be accepted as current. If not the interest of the self individually, it is the interest of one's own order, one's own class, one's own Church, one's own nation, one's own Empire that is most frequently appealed to. To beat the enemy on ground of his own choosing is Mr. Blatchford's endeavour.

He claims to prove that (p. 11)

> As it is cheaper and better for a city to make its own gas, or to provide its own water, or to lay its own roads, so it would be cheaper and better for the nation to own its own land, its own mines, its own railways, houses, factories, ships, workshops, and to manage them as the Corporation tramways, gas-works and water-works are now owned and managed.

There is the issue, and I am grateful to Mr. Rawlings for having drawn the attention of the readers of THE INQUIRER to this, the problem of the present and future. May I confess that I was a reluctant convert to Socialism, bred and trained in another order of political and economical thought, but forced and now glad to adopt it, because of the utter failure of any individualistic writer or thinker I could come across to solve the problem of the "slums" satisfactorily, and because of the recognition of the fact which the great Individualist Philosopher himself acknowledges when he says that "every man may claim the fullest liberty to exercise his faculties compatible with the possession of the like liberty by other men." (Herbert Spencer. "Social Statics.")

The check can only be properly and justly exercised by Society itself, by the community. The transition from this to the Socialist position cannot, I think, be logically refused.

SOUTHEND HOUSE.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—Friends of the London Sunday-schools will be interested in seeing some little report of the seaside home established in 1899, at Southend, by the kindness of Mrs. Bayle Bernard for the benefit of teachers and elder scholars.

Bernard Cottage, 15, Hillcrest-road, is a small seven-roomed house, well placed on high ground in a quiet road away from the crowded High-street, yet within ten minutes' walk of the sea, and will accommodate six guests. It is placed under the charge of the London Sunday School Society, and the management is in the hands of a sub-committee, the local hon. secretary, Mr. G. W. Oldland, and of a capable housekeeper.

The home, now open for three years, has, during this period, received 250 visitors; and it is satisfactory to be able to say that no complaints as to comfort or of the meals provided have been made, and that very many guests have expressed approval of the arrangements made.

There would appear, however, a need to make known among our schools the advantages of this health resort, as during many months in autumn, winter, and spring there are very few visitors. The committee feel sure that this would not be the case if all connected with our Sunday-schools, teachers, scholars, and parents, realised that at a moderate cost—namely, 7s. weekly, a short stay by the seaside was provided for them.

The cost of the year's maintenance, including housekeeping, wages, taxes, and repairs, amounts to about £140, from which sum the boarders' payments have to be deducted. These payments for 1900, 1901, and 1902 amounted to £48, £52, and £44, leaving the balance to be met by the subscriptions. The treasurer, therefore, requires annually about £100 in subscriptions to keep the home open and efficient, not a very large sum, considering that it is kept open all the year round.

If our present subscribers continue their kind support, about £30 increase of annual subscriptions are still required to meet the necessary outlay, and the treasurer now appeals with confidence for this sum to relieve the management of future anxiety. Lastly, it should be stated that at the end of last year the amount due to the treasurer was £21.

AN IMPUDENT ADVERTISEMENT.

SIR,—It would seem from the modern art of advertising that there is no faith like the faith of the advertiser in the folly of his fellow-beings. He is religious in it, but there his religion ends. It would be difficult to find a parallel to the following postcard for sheer impudence of ingenuity. It seems to be going the round of our ministers. It was as follows; of course, with the substitution here of new nom de plumes.

MY DEAR X——,—"Hieroglyphic's" book is now on sale. Has he, or his brother, mentioned that he has adopted the nom de plume of U. P. A. Tree, and that the work is entitled "An Ordinary Bargee"? (Published by Beam, Ends and Co., London. 3s. 6d.)

You might, for "auld lang syne's sake," give him a leg-up, by inducing friends and the book-agents in your neighbourhood to promote inquiries about his initial effort.

As you know already, "Hieroglyphic" is nothing if not satirical, and in this book he has given full play to his satire. Several of our friends have been caricatured, you yourself not excepted, for there is no mistaking the original of his character of Y. Z. However, his sarcasm, though keen at times, is never spiteful; and I don't think your annoyance will prove long-lasting.

Trusting you're in the best of health, with kind regards from wife and self,—Yours sincerely, "HIEROGLYPHIC."

Is not this "a noble gull-catcher"? Could you forbear hurling things at him? But he makes himself scarce, as he is trying to make his book. But the gull, as the dodo, is probably an extinct species of the public; at any rate amongst ministers. They are not to be taken cum grano salis, though the fool hath said in his heart, there's no harm in trying.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

IRELAND.

THIRTY-FIVE out of our thirty-nine Irish congregations are in Down or Antrim, and as you look at the map they seem to lie generally within easy distance of the Capital of the North. One would expect to find among them, therefore, a good deal of inter-congregational intercourse and a spirit of mutual encouragement and helpfulness in common religious work. The reality, however, is disappointing. The distance from town to town seems much less easy when you have to drive it or walk it, and hereabouts, if our railway lines are many, our trains are few; and when the last train that will get you home leaves at 6.20, say, what chance is there for the Evening Meeting, which is the chief promoter of inter-congregational good feeling and the sense of a common aim among members of a group of churches? It is difficult enough to keep up the enthusiasm of members with a declining population; and the workmen scattered upon the wall almost lose the feeling of comradeship in service when they are parted so far asunder that they can hardly hear each other shout.

Just that feeling of belonging to one another and to a common cause is our great want here. We are too separate; we have too many small local organisations; we need a stronger union among us for counsel and for work; our ministries are too individual; we have not even a name to which we all consent to answer; and the members suffer and the body suffers too. And so we find at times that when young people come up from the country to push their fortunes in the city, or a city family goes out into the country to settle, they are often lost to us, sometimes, it may be, for want of a word of introduction from or to a minister, but more commonly by lack of all feeling of membership in a living, earnest, and necessary movement; and then, in the disengagement that comes with change of residence, any one new Church connection seems as good as any other. I have acknowledged the difficulty of awakening and strengthening this feeling that we do belong together; but it is one of the things on which the welfare and the very life of our churches must depend.

This leads me to venture a word or two as to the position of our ministers at their isolated outposts of duty. They are nearly all college-trained men, not a few of them men of University standing; and they work hard and faithfully, almost without a break the year through, sometimes with little enough to keep home going, and sometimes in neighbourhoods where there is hardly any chance of intellectual companionship outside their own doors. I am not saying a word against the artisans and farm-labourers who compose so large a part of many of our congregations. I am speaking merely of the fact, and fact it is, that a man may leave college and settle in the ministry and be plunged into duties which bring him opportunity every day of helping the lame and halt and blind, but which offer him very little chance of companionship in intellectual pursuits and tastes. All the more may one sympathise with and honour the men who are trying to live the life in such isolation.

And let me add, that while the necessary cost of living is a trifle higher in the North of Ireland than it is in the North of England, ministerial salaries are generally rather more than a trifle lower. Put this to the other fact, and think what they amount to. I had a letter the other day from one of our ministers here in reply to a question I had been asked to send round concerning a scheme for the circulation of new theological books. "I cannot afford it," my friend said; "living is dear here, and I have had to use up even the money I had tried to set aside for my children's education; I must be content with such books as I already have." I wish some good friend would give me £500 to spend in replenishing the well-worn libraries of some of these isolated, laborious, thoughtful and faithful ministers of ours.

We are at pause just now, waiting for the report of our Commission on University Education, and wondering what will come of it. I have ventured, in former letters, to speak of the unsatisfactory condition here of both higher and elementary education; and while, as I think, it will be necessary to let Trinity College alone, and while, further, the broad unsectarianism of the Queen's Colleges is not in any way likely to be interfered with, there is need for change in other parts of the work. Mr. Russell says: "It may confidently be expected that Lord Robertson's Commission—and it is a body of great learning and authority—will report in favour of the Catholic claims, and that a solution may be found in the establishment of a College, Catholic in the sense that Trinity is Protestant, but with no tests applicable to either students or teachers." There is much virtue in that "but." It would be interesting indeed if, after their shabby treatment of Mr. O'Donnell, the Commissioners were to report in favour of barring out the bishops, the very thing he would have pleaded for. How do you suppose the bishops will take it? Why, it was only the other day that they were fulminating even against our unsectarian Queen's Colleges, protesting that they had been "too long maintained in opposition to the persistent remonstrances of the Catholics of Ireland." Nobody knows yet, in fact, how much will have to go into the melting-pot; but I cannot help thinking that something will come out better than the golden calf whose worship has made higher education in Ireland too much a wrangle about State endowments and a scramble for money prizes.

Would that I felt as confident of the future of Elementary Education! If, beyond what one may see for one's self, evidence were needed to show a case for reform, Dr. M'Keown, of Belfast, has just issued in pamphlet form certain letters which he recently addressed to a local newspaper. The letters are worth reading. People do not realise that even in this great and prosperous and boastful city of Belfast children are being taught in schools that are overcrowded and understaffed (upon any reasonable reckoning of needs), and which are unsanitary, playgroundless, and up alleys and in back-yards. It comes of the miserable system which identifies the education of the children with the fortunes of the sects. It is clerical control that causes the trouble. Priest and parson both are playing the game of catch the children. The strong bodies retain and multiply their day-schools, and miserable things most of them are. The weaker bodies hold on to their schools as long as ever they can, and ultimately have to let them go. Here in Belfast I judge that we have about 500 Unitarian families. Out of that number there should be at least 500 children of school age. There are two day-schools here which are under the management of Unitarian managers, and at one of these there are about half-a-dozen Unitarian children, while at the other there are none. We have indeed a Model School, where the children are looked after by their own ministers, and some twenty of our boys and girls attend that school. But the rest, all who are at the National Schools, are at schools under clerical control from watchful orthodox managers. There is a Conscience Clause, of course. It is about as useful here as it is across the water.

We had an illustration of this body-snatching propensity of our orthodox friends not long ago. Finding that the boys in our Sunday-school liked playing at soldiers, we proposed to organise for them a cadet corps, associating in it boys from all our Belfast Unitarian schools. Even so, however, our numbers would be too small to make the thing succeed, unless we could join the Belfast battalion, which is gathered from the city schools at large. On behalf of a conference of teachers, therefore, I wrote to ask whether this privilege would be granted to us, and I received a very prompt reply that Unitarian schools were not allowed to join. Meanwhile, naturally enough, some of our own boys have been drawn away to other Sunday-schools, expressly that they might join the cadet corps attached to those schools, and we see them no more in Sunday-school or church. It is small game to fly at, perhaps; but there have always been people who have been eager to compass sea and land to made one proselyte, whatever becomes of him in the end.

DOUGLAS WALMSLEY.

UNITY CHURCH, GATESHEAD.

CORRESPONDENTS in the North have expressed to us regret that in last week's "Provincial Letter" the Rev. Frank Walters should have made no reference to the church at Gateshead, where the Rev. Arthur Harvie has just closed his ministry on his removal to Northampton. The following record of successful work is sent by Mr. Charles Carter, of Newcastle-on-Tyne:—About five years ago Mr. Harvie, who was at that time the district missionary of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association, commenced his work at Gateshead by a course of theological lectures, which were followed by Sunday evening services at the Co-operative Hall and later at the Beaconsfield Hall. Feeling how desirable, indeed how necessary it was, if they wished to establish a permanent church, that they should have a building of their own, Mr. Harvie, assisted by an enthusiastic band of fellow-workers whom he had attached by his preaching, but still more by his self-sacrificing labours, set about the work in real earnest. As a result the present modest unpretending church was built, at a cost, including site and building, of £600, and was opened about two and a half years ago, entirely free from debt. This is the best piece of missionary work that has been accomplished for many years by the assistance of our local association, and a provincial letter that claims to give a general record of the work done by the churches in our district ought certainly to give prominence to the success of such worthy labours in our missionary field.

"What we need most of all in this district is to come more frequently into touch with one another." I very heartily endorse this statement in Mr. Walters' letter; in the case of Gateshead especially it would not be a difficult matter for some of the members of the larger and more influential Newcastle congregation to pay a friendly visit occasionally, as the Gateshead Church is only about three miles from the Church of the Divine Unity, and some of the most eminent members of the latter actually live at Gateshead. It is very gratifying to be able to state that a faithful few, and among them some of the most active and faithful members of the Newcastle Church, have rendered valuable help and shown their sympathy with our Gateshead friends from the beginning, and I trust that more of my fellow-members will endeavour to pay an occasional friendly visit to the youthful church in the sister town. The intercourse I have had with them enables me to bear most emphatic testimony to the fervour and devotion of the members and the healthy vitality of all the institutions connected with the church.

In conclusion, I desire to express the admiration and gratitude which is felt by a large number of our friends here for Mr. Harvie, whose loyal and strenuous labours have resulted in such a worthy addition being made to the number of our churches in this northern district.

THE Methodist Recorder announces that the service to be held at the Royal Aquarium on Monday next is likely to be one of the largest the Methodists have ever held. "Before a single placard has been issued, simply as the result of the announcements in newspapers and from the pulpit, applications have reached the office of the Twentieth Century Fund more than sufficient to fill every seat that can be hired for the occasion." The interest aroused by the new scheme is evidently very widespread and very much alive. It is the Methodism of the whole world, not British Methodism merely, the Recorder explains, which wants a church-house that it can see and easily find.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdare.—At the Old Meeting House on Sunday evening the Rev. R. J. Jones gave a review of the Rev. Tyssul Davis's booklet, "Towards Unity," dealing specially with the first chapter—"Grounds of Reconciliation between Theist and Agnostic." The congregation were so much interested that they have asked Mr. Jones to continue his review, taking the three remaining chapters more in detail on three successive Sunday nights.

Acton.—The first anniversary services of this congregation were held on Sunday last, Jan. 25, when sermons were preached by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., in the morning, and in the evening by the Rev. Edgar Daplyn. There were good attendances at both services, and collections were taken on behalf of the building fund. A spirit of heartfelt gratitude and thankfulness was felt for the measure of success which had so far attended the effort to establish liberal religious services in Acton. On Sunday evening, Feb. 1, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed will commence a series of lectures, the first of which will be on "The World of Science."

Birkenhead.—On New Year's night a Sunday-school tea-party was held, when a large Christmas tree, provided by the elder scholars, was laden with a great variety of gifts for the children from members of the congregation. After tea an address was given by Mr. Embury, the superintendent, and Mr. Hewitt presented the prizes for the past year. The evening was a great success.

Bradford.—On the 22nd inst. the annual meeting of the members of Chapel-lane Chapel was held, under the presidency of Mr. John Ellis, the senior warden for the past year. The report, which was of an encouraging nature, stated that both the chapel and school were entirely free from debt, and that there was sufficient money in hand to purchase new hymn books and service books for the congregation. The officers and committee were appointed for the coming year, and at the close a vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones.

Bridgwater.—The scholars' annual party took place on Thursday, Jan. 22, when upwards of sixty sat down to tea in the schoolroom, the entertainment being given in St. Mary's Parish Room (by kind permission of the vicar). During the evening prizes were distributed by Miss Spiller, and the little ones gave a number of recitations, action song, and three plays.

Burton-on-Trent.—As stated in our recent North Midland Letter, a few friends are holding together and meet on alternate Sunday evenings at the house of one of their members, Mr. Ball, of 89, Calais-road. To-morrow (Sunday) evening Mr. S. D. Hall, of Derby, is to conduct the service and deliver the address. On Wednesday week a most enjoyable social evening was spent at Mr. Ball's house. The members intend to maintain these meetings until the autumn, by which time they hope to have overcome present financial difficulties and to make more decided progress.

Chester.—On Wednesday week the annual Sunday-school tea-party and prize-giving took place in the schoolroom of Matthew Henry's Chapel. After a musical and dramatic entertainment given by the scholars and friends, Major Johnson distributed the prizes and certificates, and a vote of thanks to him and all the helpers was passed on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Haycock, seconded by Mr. A. Orrett.

Clifton.—Two remarkable Sunday afternoon gatherings have just been held at Oakfield-road Church, in connection with the M.O.M., which continues to flourish. On Jan. 18 the Rev. J. Moffatt Logan, in acceptance of Dr. Warschauer's challenge to state and defend the orthodox position from our platform, spoke on "My Belief Concerning Jesus," having, however, insisted on the significant condition that Dr. Warschauer was to take no part in the discussion. The presence of an audience in thorough sympathy with Mr. Logan was insured by the closing, for that afternoon, of his own Men's Discussion Class, and Oakfield-road Church was crowded to its utmost capacity by a throng which filled the chancel, overflowed into the organ gallery, and even the available standing room at the back of the building. The address was characteristic of the speaker, who, among other things, informed his listeners that he had read everything that had been written upon the question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, and that there was nothing in the whole domain of literary criticism more assured than that the four Gospels had for their authors the men whose names they bore. This, however, and more of the same calibre, was much relished and cheered by the speaker's supporters. On the following Sunday Dr. Warschauer was announced to speak on "My Belief Concerning Jesus: a Criticism and a Statement." The orthodox Men's Discussion Class, needless to say, was not closed on that occasion—had, indeed, arranged for a special attraction; nevertheless, there was an audience of some 300 men who listened to an address in which Dr. Warschauer, after doing justice to Mr. Logan's utterance of a week earlier, traced out the Unitarian conception of a Jesus purely human, to whom for that very reason we were drawn irresistibly in love and reverence, and to whom we owed a debt only one stricken with moral and spiritual blindness could deny. The address over, the speaker submitted himself to fifty minutes' keen cross-examination, the keynote of the questions being the undoubted earnestness of the interrogators, of whatever shade of opinion. A desire was expressed that the address of the afternoon might be published; and there is no doubt that much interest has been aroused by these debates, on a topic felt by all to be of supreme importance.

Gateshead.—On Sunday last, Jan. 25, a large congregation assembled in Unity Church to hear the Rev. Arthur Harvie preach his final sermon as minister of the church, the subject being "The Living Church"; the closing hymn, "Our Father's Faith," being heartily sung. After the service Mr. and Mrs. Harvie shook hands with the whole congregation amid many expressions of good wishes. They go to Northampton with very pleasant memories of their work, and the affection of a large circle of friends.

Horsham.—On Thursday week a most interesting lantern lecture was given at the Free Christian Church by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, on "Scenes and Shrines in the English Lakes." The great wealth of interest in that small district, through associations with Wordsworth, the Arnolds, Wilson, Harriet Martineau, Ruskin, and others, was vividly described, and illustrated by excellent pictures. On the motion of the Rev. J. J. Marten, seconded by Mr. D. Price, a hearty vote of thanks for the lecture was accorded to Mr. Freeston.

London: Kentish Town.—On Thursday evening, Jan. 22, there was a meeting at the Free Christian Church of the Literary and Dramatic Institute, when a most interesting lecture was given by Mr. Alfred H. Mills on "The Laureates of King Demos." The lecture was illustrated by readings from a large number of those who have written in the cause of the people, ranging from Robert Burns to William Morris, other authors being Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Thomas Hood, and Robert Brough, the actor. The lecturer laid stress on the need of a knowledge of these people at the present time, when there are so many signs of a reactionary spirit being abroad. A guild has been formed under the direction of the Rev. George Critchley, called "The Guild of the Disciples." At present it has been meeting before the Sunday evening service, and has taken up as a subject of study "The Book of Job," under Mr. Critchley's able guidance.

London: Stamford-street.—The Band of Hope and Mercy anniversary meeting was held Jan. 23, under the presidency of the Rev. Frederic Allen. The report of the superintendent, Mr. A. W. Harris, recorded a useful and successful year's work and a substantial improvement in regular and punctual attendance, as out of a roll of just over 100, fifty-two members had earned rewards for which a very high standard had been set. Special mention was made of the assistance faithfully rendered at the Sunday services by some of the Band choir. Thanks were expressed to many friends who had sent contributions towards the cost of the annual excursion, and of the new banner recently unveiled. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards pleasantly and appropriately addressed the young folks, and distributed the medals and prizes, the latter again the gift of Mr. A. H. Biggs. A hearty vote of thanks to the chairman and visitors was carried on the motion of the Superintendent, supported by Miss Bridgett and Mr. J. H. Moore.

Manchester: Lower Mosley-street.—The Sunday services during January maintained their progress with the encouragement of increased attendances. On Sunday, Jan. 4, the annual address dealing with the events of the past year was given by the General Superintendent, the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. The Rev. W. Lawrence Schroeder officiated on Sunday evening, Jan. 11, when 108 persons followed his discourse on "Jesus Hominum Salvator" with close interest and warm appreciation. Two addresses on "John Ruskin" were given by Mr. Cobden Smith at the succeeding services, the first dealing with his ideals as "The Art Critic," and the second as "The Social Reformer." Last Sunday the revised "Essex Hall Hymnal" was introduced, having been purchased through the generous gifts of members and friends interested in the services.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—The Unitarian Guild met on Thursday evening, Jan. 22, and after expressing satisfaction at the previous session, and the lessons given to the teachers by the Rev. Walter Reynolds, and papers given by the Churchwarden, Mr. H. Etchells, and Mr. Mullins, decided that for the next few weeks the first hour should be spent in reading Shakespeare's Henry VIII., now being produced in one of the Manchester theatres, under the conductorship of Mr. Reynolds. The study commenced on Thursday evening, Jan. 29. The Band of Hope is this year double the last two years' strength. The congregations for the evenings of January have been the largest for that month for four years. The annual meeting is to be held on Monday evening, Feb. 9, at which a small adverse balance is feared. Mr. Reynolds commences on Feb. 1 a course of sermons on "Seven Saviours."

Merthyr Tydfil.—The New Year's treat was given to the Sunday-school scholars on Friday, Jan. 16, and was greatly enjoyed by young and old. On Sunday evening, Jan. 25, at the close of the service, a meeting was held for the purpose of bidding a hearty farewell to Miss F. A. Randell, who for the last six years has been head-mistress at the Central Classes for Pupil Teachers under the Merthyr School Board, and who is now leaving the town to take up an appointment at her home in Swindon. During her time in Merthyr Miss Randell has been a faithful member of the congregation and invaluable as a teacher in the Sunday-school. As a slight token of the regard in which she is held by the members she was presented with a set of books by Dr. Martineau, Stopford Brooke, and a beautifully bound copy of the "Revised Essex Hall Hymnal." Speeches were delivered by Messrs. Herbert Jones, G. L. Thomas, E. Hammett, Richard Rees, and the minister, with heartiest good wishes for the future, and testifying to the high regard in which she was held by the congregation. Miss Randell suitably responded.

Nottingham.—Last Saturday, under the auspices of the High Pavement Sunday School Elder Scholars' Institute, Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester, gave his recitation of Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth," and for two hours held the large audience enthralled.

Reading.—The annual meeting was held on Jan. 25. The report showed that a balance of £169 was in the hands of the treasurer, and that the institutions of the church were in a sound and healthy state. Of this sum £150 was voted to the building fund of the church hall, to which £17 was added by the members present so as to close that account. The church is still without a minister; but owing to that fact it has been enabled

A hearty vote of thanks to him and to the other officers of the church was accorded.

Rotherham.—On Wednesday, Jan. 21, at a meeting of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union, a lecture was given by the Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, on "Three Ideal Commonwealths—Plato, More, and Morris." The Mayor, Mr. J. B. Jenkinson, was in the chair, the Rev. W. Stephens being also on the platform. The lecture was much appreciated.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Freedom of the City of Manchester was on Wednesday week conferred on Alderman Harry Rawson and Mr. W. J. Crossley. For over sixty years Mr. Rawson has been engaged in public service in Manchester. Of unswerving integrity in public as in private business, and one whose delight has been in self-devotion to the public good, his record is one of which his many friends are justly proud. As early as 1844 he was appointed on the committee of management of the Mechanics' Institute, which has grown into the present great Technical School; the Grammar School, Owens College, and the Victoria University have shared the benefit of his counsels; one of his keenest interests has been in service on the Free Libraries Committee, and he is now chairman of the world-famed Rylands Library; he was chairman of the Watch Committee through one of the most trying periods of its existence. In a speech before signing the roll of freemen, acknowledging the honour that was done him, Mr. Rawson said: "I have long had a profound confidence in the principle of local self-government. I believe that wisely-directed municipalities may more closely and permanently affect the health, the comfort, and the happiness of their communities than the enactments of Parliament." Manchester has fitly recognised the services of one of the chief of her citizens. We, for our part, know something of what our religious community owes to Mr. Rawson, and tribute in a pleasant form has recently been paid to him; but what we have chiefly to offer him is the crown of univeral esteem and gratitude.

THE annual meeting of the Moral Instruction League was held in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, followed by a public meeting in the large hall (the floor of which was well filled), when an address was given by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of the King's Weigh House Church, on "The Training of the Citizen." Dr. Stanton Coit presided, and the vote of thanks to Dr. Hunter was moved by Sir William Wedderburn and seconded by Mrs. Ruth Homan, M.L.S.B., both of whom addressed themselves to the general subject of moral training. The object of the league is "to introduce systematic non-theological moral instruction into all schools, and to make the formation of character the chief aim of school life," and the committee's report (the fifth) showed that progress had been made. One achievement of the year has been to issue "A Graduated Syllabus of Moral Instruction for Elementary Schools," a carefully thought out skeleton, noting suitable subjects for moral teaching in each of the standards. The issue of illustrative matter to help in such teaching is now engaging the attention of the committee. Mr. Harrold Johnson, 19, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C., is secretary of the league.

DR. HUNTER'S address was an eloquent plea for thorough moral training, and a vindication of such training as essentially religious. At the same time he insisted in conclusion that it remains incomplete without the thought of God as the source of all ideals. He dwelt very forcibly on the responsibilities of parentage and the influence of the home. In the new ethics, he said, generation would be more important than regeneration, and quoted the saying of Oliver Wendell Holmes that to produce a good citizen it was necessary to begin at least a hundred years before he was born. After good heredity must come good environment, and in this the home played the chief part. The dignity and wholesomeness of manual labour needed to be emphasised. At the present day what was lacking was educated labour, not educated people too proud to work. Above all stress must be laid on the education of character, for it had been wisely said that "everything is pernicious which emancipates the intellect without at the same time strengthening self-control."

As to the teaching of religion in public schools, Dr. Hunter said that he had always regretted the acceptance of any compromise by the Nonconformists. The only security against abuse was to leave all theological and ecclesiastical teaching to the home and the Church. So only could religious freedom and equality be secured. But that did not mean the exclusion of religion from the schools. Creed and catechism might go, and even the reading of the Bible in school, yet if there was the teaching of moral duties there was the teaching of religion, for all righteous living was religious living. And he quoted Jeremiah: "To do justice and judgment is not this to know me, saith the Lord." Men who have faith in ideal things, truth, justice, and goodness cannot be classed as infidels and atheists, whatever their attitude towards questions of theology. Therefore he earnestly insisted that the ideal of that league, in urging the need for systematic moral instruction, was in reality a religious ideal.

THE religious teaching in public schools, Dr. Hunter maintained, must be confined to the teaching of sound morals, which was entirely good in itself. Yet he felt bound to add that this could not altogether satisfy him, for it did not secure the highest religious training. He believed in the moral uplift of religious faith. A complete education led through the realisation of the full meaning of morality to its eternal Source Morality in its highest development and efficiency was only possible under the sanction and inspiration of religion; if the sense of their relation with the Eternal was taken from men, they would, in the long run, become less sensible of moral ideals, less enthusiastic and less aspiring. But for this completer education they must look to the home and the Church.

THE opening lecture of Mr. Stopford Brooke's present course on "Naturalism and the Romantic Movement in Poetry at the end of the Eighteenth Century" (in continuation of the course before Christmas) was given at University College on Thursday week, and dealt generally with the influence of the Revolution on poetry. The principles of liberty and justice, of world-wide humanity and brotherhood, were proclaimed by France in 1789, and the noise of the fall of the Bastille, Mr. Brooke said, was the tocsin of a new poetry which found voice in the Lyrical Ballads; but the emotions which belonged to those principles had already begun in 1730 to move in English poetry, and from that time they could be seen, in various forms, like harbingers of spring, in the poetry of Thomson, Crabbe, Cowper, Burns, leading on to Coleridge and Wordsworth. This week's lecture, dealing with Cowper and Crabbe, is to be followed by one on Burns, and then two more lectures will remain for Wordsworth.

ON Friday week the Special Committee convened to consider the effect of the new Education Act upon the administration of Wesleyan schools met in London, the chair being taken by the Rev. J. S. Banks, President of the Conference. The question of passive resistance was deliberately set aside, but a resolution was passed declaring that the Act "directly contravenes the main principles of the Educational policy of the Wesleyan Methodist Church . . . and cannot be regarded as a settlement of the Education question." The Rev. J. Scott Lidgett moved the following resolution, which, after an amendment proposed by Dr. Waller had been rejected by 79 to 52, was carried by an overwhelming majority:—

Trustees and managers of Wesleyan Methodist day-schools are advised so to frame their schemes as to provide that the body of managers shall consist of six persons, of whom two shall be elected by the trustees, and two shall be nominated by the parents of children attending the schools, and by subscribers to the schools, in addition to the two appointed by the local educational authorities as provided by the Act.

And, finally, a resolution was passed advising that no new Wesleyan Methodist day-schools be erected in any place in which the local educational authority undertakes to establish a Christian unsectarian school, worked under the provisions of the Cowper-Temple clause.

Dr. John Brown, having retired from the pastorate of the Bunyan Meeting, Bedford, a farewell meeting was held in the church on Thursday week, under the presidency of Mr. Albert Spicer, when a cheque for £600, contributed by 1,000 friends in Bedford and throughout the country, was presented to him, and among other addresses and testimonials to him and Mrs. Brown, a copy of the Bible in four volumes printed on India paper, from the Bible Society, similar to that presented to Queen Victoria on her Diamond Jubilee. Mr. Albert Spicer, Dr. Guinness Rogers and Mr. S. Whitehead, for forty years M.P. for Bedford, bore testimony to the great worth of Dr. Brown's character and work. He is removing from Bedford to North London.

The Manchester Social Club, which has an attractive set of rooms under the same roof with the Lower Mosley-street Schools, has just held its annual meeting, at which an increase in the number of members and a consequent improvement in the financial position were announced. The unsectarian nature of the institution was shown by the presence of the Principal of Dalton Hall in the chair, and of the Principal of Owen's College, the Archdeacon of Manchester, and the Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association among the speakers. The club affords opportunities of physical and mental training as well as pleasant social intercourse for young people engaged in business in Manchester, many of whom are far from their own homes.

Archdeacon Wilson spoke with great satisfaction of the mingling of the sexes at the social club, which he stated was the only institution of the kind in Manchester which was open to both men and women. He also urged the importance of trying to make the institution self-supporting without collecting subscriptions besides those of the actual members. Subsequent speakers thought this impracticable considering the rate of wages received by many young men and young women. It was reassuring to hear that many of the young people who share in the benefits of the club are engaged in social work for the improvement of the condition of the poorer people of Manchester and the brightening of their lives.

The February number of Sermons for the Day (Liverpool Booksellers' Company) contains the sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in Hope-street Church on Sunday, Jan. 11, the third anniversary of Dr. Martineau's death, and entitled "The Posthumous Fame of James Martineau." There was a special interest in such a sermon preached on that anniversary from Martineau's old pulpit, and it dealt with three aspects of our great teacher's influence, in his philosophy, his religion and his conduct. In philosophy his great service was noted, in the affirmation of the living and Creative Will of the Eternal as source of all, and the self-determining will of man, through which was realised his true relation to God. But still greater, in Mr. Armstrong's view, was his service to religion, in which his spiritual consciousness was "steeped in the sense of the encompassing God." Of this the preacher said:—

No ritual or outward ordinance gave him his contact with the Father. Communion was not a theory or an hypothesis, but the daily and hourly fact of life; and so there was a self-contained element in him which belonged to him and God alone; and his purely devotional utterances, as in some of his sermons and in one or two of his hymns, but (to my mind) still more in some of his canticles and prayers, were filled with a richness which elevates them far above even his most masterly philosophical expositions.

Yet above all Mr. Armstrong placed the influence of Martineau's conduct as the directed expression of his character, and dwelt especially on the significance of his veracity in matters of religion. Thus the sermon concluded:—

He was rooted, indeed, in a favourable soil for this characteristic, with his Huguenot and Presbyterian ancestry and the early Norwich associations. But he imparted to it, by his personality, a white glow of spiritual fervour which redoubled its intensive force. And it is to him, more than to any other man, that it is due that it has become a dominant note of our churches, and has seized, with so great a power, our conscience and our consciousness. Whatever other strength or weakness may be ours, this veracity, so mightily reinforced by him, is a contribution offered to society by our group of churches in a unique degree. And, however little the general conscience of Christendom cares for it or values it, I, for one, believe it to be the most priceless gift which any group of churches can make to the common ethical life of our day, the one most crying need of our country and our time. And I, for one, hold it to be worth while to belong to a small and depreciated communion, if in this one matter of an uncompromising veracity, following the unfaltering lead of our great teacher and prophet, we can do a stroke to strengthen the forces that make for a truthfulness of thought and speech akin to his. That is our fundamental contribution to the coming of the Kingdom of God. Would to Heaven we proclaimed it with a supremer earnestness to a world too ready to accept a lax and easy standard!

The February Seed Sower opens with a most welcome sermon by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, doubtless a New Year's appeal to his people, the burden of which is in the title "Go Forward!" The right kind of self-confidence, and the reality of will-power in man are pointed to as of the first consequence for a true life, which shall really grapple with the evils of the world and achieve a better future. As to the Will in man, this is what Mr. Jacks says:—

What is it that makes a self at all? I am made a self by the fact that I possess a will. Will is the true kernel of personality. Take Will out of our lives and you and I would become mere automata, or, at best, thinking animals. Without Will we should not be persons. Round the fact of our possessing Will gathers all that makes us men. Will is the secret of character, whether it be good or bad. Character is formed not as some seem to think by influence which plays upon us from without, but by the way in which we respond to those influences when they come. And that is a matter of Will. We have a wonderful power of initiative, and it is the exercise of that power which gives form, individuality, and selfhood to a human life.

Into the speculative dispute as to the Freedom of the Will, the preacher does not enter, although from the following extract it will be seen that he has definite convictions on the subject:—

Hold, then, what view you like about the question of free-will, for I shall not embark upon it to-day. But one thing you must admit. You must admit that effort exists. There is such a thing as effort in the world. Let there be more of it! Effort has existed in your lives and in mine during the year that has gone. Let it exist to a greater degree in the year that has begun! Every man knows what trying means. He has tried in the past. Let him try new things, greater things, higher things in the future.

Let me say that I am myself a believer in the free-will of man. I believe that God gave us all a genuine freedom in choosing between the evil and the good. But I am not eager to insist upon it now. I will not argue with the man who disagrees with me about that. Only let me appeal to that man to believe in the existence of effort, and to see to it that the spirit of effort, the spirit of trying, shall not diminish but grow. Explain effort as you will—the fact is there, the thing exists—and am I not right in saying that the supreme interests of life are attached to it.

Every hope of progress must depend in the last resort on the rousing of will-power in the people. Without this no ideal scheme will be of any avail. "Let us believe," the preacher pleads, "that there is no limit to the good things we can win for the world and for ourselves—by trying."

The Rev. J. W. Chadwick propounds in the Christian Register of Jan. 15 what he rightly calls "A Good Scheme." Emerson was born May 25, 1803 (just a week before Channing's ordination on Wednesday, June 1, in that year). Much will doubtless be written and spoken about him in this centenary year, but what Mr. Chadwick proposes as a better celebration still is that we should all of us do what he himself means to do, and read Emerson himself right through during the year. "I stump all who love Emerson to do it," he says—and though we are not sure that we know what stump means in this connection, it is a good idea! And if those who do not yet love Emerson will try, they will do so, says Mr. Chadwick, before the year is out.

"It is much more important to read Emerson himself than to read anything about him." Yet many will be glad of Mr. Chadwick's reference to the best books about him.

It has been Emerson's good fortune to have others write of him in a satisfactory and delightful manner. Mr. Cabot's biography is worthy of the man whom it describes. The younger Emerson's "Emerson in Concord" is wholly admirable. John Albee's "Remembrances" are an appreciation that bring us very near to the great teacher. Dr. Hedge's study is truly multum in parvo. Dr. Bartol's various essays are rich in anecdote and comment. The Concord School essays, "Genius and Character of Emerson," have much excellent matter. Mr. Cooke's elaborate study abounds in valuable details. Mr. Sanborn's little book, and, still better, what he has written incidentally in his Alcott and Thoreau books, will repay careful attention. The biography by Dr. Holmes is proof positive that Emerson came not only to his own, but to many others with a message large and sweet; and we are to have presently Mr. Woodberry's "Emerson" in the "English Men of Letters." It is certain to be good. It will probably be the best criticism we have had. Certainly, his recent "Hawthorne" is better than anything before written on Hawthorne.

MR. G. H. PERRIS, the editor of Concord, who went to America last autumn on a two months' lecturing tour, as representative of the International Arbitration and Peace Association of England, received a warm welcome from the leading friends of the cause in the States, and had opportunities of addressing many large and representative audiences in Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, New York, and other cities. The New York Evening Post of Dec. 6 devoted a column to a report of one of Mr. Perris's lectures, shortly before he sailed for home on the 10th, and both the Springfield Republican and the December number of Dr. Edward Everett Hale's Lend a Hand Record published an appreciation of Mr. Perris's work as "An English Apostle of Peace." The Record, speaking of his two visits to Boston, added :—

He has deeply impressed all who have heard him in America by his large and exact knowledge of international problems, by his stirring impeachment of the waste and wickedness of modern warfare, and by his earnest pleas for more rational and constructive policies among the nations. It is seldom that Boston has had addressing her people at the same time two such vigorous English democrats as Mr. Perris and John A. Hobson.

Mr. Perris's American visit is an event of significance. He is, we think, the first Englishman who has ever come to us expressly to go up and down the country lecturing upon Peace and international justice. He has done it with admirable tact and temper. He has lifted all whom he has addressed above any of their national prejudices by making them feel instantly how far he himself was above national prejudices; and he has shown what a high and special duty it is for all serious Englishmen and Americans to co-operate in the promotion of large and worthy international life, and in the counteraction of those tendencies in their political life which might easily work great bane instead of blessing to the world.

One result of the unhappy and surprising experiences of the last few years in England and America is clearly going to be a larger and better directed activity on the part of the real lovers of Peace and international reason in the two countries. We have been taught sadly enough, and Mr. Perris's countrymen have been taught, how shallow and superficial was much of the sentiment against war and aggression among our people, which we had believed was real and profound. We have learned how much had been left undone in popular education and in the worthy inspiration of public opinion. In the time of peace which has come, it is the duty of the leaders of serious thought on both sides of the Atlantic to organise themselves more effectually to prepare their peoples for permanent peace by the inculcation of the principles of righteous and truly profitable international procedure.

To the February number of the Unitarian World Mr. Z. Toyosaki contributes an interesting article on "Japan Since the Revolution." (Two misprints we may note : p. 22, China had to cede (not secede) Formosa to Japan, and p. 23 for Nieschtze read Nietzsche.) Having referred to some less welcome results of the influx of Western learning in Japan, Mr. Toyosaki says :—

On the other hand, one may notice many signs of the growth of liberal thought and a wiser spirit. Liberal religion is gaining ground. It is peculiarly significant that during the last decade Liberal Christianity has been making wonderfully rapid progress. In Buddhism also a notable change is taking place. Two years ago an association was organised by a comparatively small but important body of men for the reformation of Buddhism. New religious zeal has been shown by another organisation, "The Society of Buddhists in East Asia." The educationalists also are beginning to recognise, what perhaps was not felt so much before, that the lack of sound ethics is the cause of many difficulties in their work. On the whole, I hope, Japan is steadily progressing in the right direction in ethics and religion.

To politics Mr. Toyosaki makes a brief reference, speaking with pleasure of the increasingly friendly relations between China and Japan, and concludes his article with these words :—

And so in spite of various vicissitudes and failures, Japan has been pressing on courageously. Progress is her watchword. Although fully aware of our weaknesses and imperfections, we are not discouraged; we look forward to the future realisation of our hopes and our ideals. That my country may shine, a star in the Eastern firmament, with still greater splendour, and shed her mellow ray upon the life of her sister-nations, is my fervent wish, and the wish, I trust, of every lover of civilisation and culture. For liberal religious thinkers and workers Japan is full of interest. The efficacy of a reasonable faith is now on its trial.

MR. TOYOSAKI has also used the occasion of a visit to Paris during the Christmas vacation to contribute to Le Protestant (of Jan. 31) an article on "Unitarian Protestantism in Japan," in which he tells the story of the movement since 1889, when the first representatives of the American Unitarian Association began their work in Tokyo. In the spring of 1900 the Rev. Clay McCauley, the last American missionary, returned home, leaving the work in a thoroughly sound condition, to be directed by native effort, organised in the Japanese Unitarian Association. Mr. Toyosaki describes the present activities of the Association, which includes regular Sunday meetings, the publication of a monthly magazine, and a number of tracts and pamphlets (he thinks they ought also to have a more popular weekly paper), efforts of social and moral reform, and missionary work in other places besides Tokyo.

AT the end of his record, Mr. Toyosaki expresses the conviction that the future of the Unitarian movement in Japan is full of hope. Many men of influence have been attracted by it, among them Mr. Saburo Shimada, a member of the Chamber and proprietor of one of the most important Tokyo papers. Unity Hall is now too small, and they look forward to a larger building in the centre of the city, for which friends in America are already collecting funds. Mr. Toyosaki hails liberal Protestantism as a powerful means of drawing the nations of the earth together in amity, inspired by love of the one God and a common humanity. He expresses the pleasure it has been to him to offer to liberal friends in France his modest essay on the Protestantism of his own country, as making for the advancement of human brotherhood and universal religion.

AT the meeting of the Cambridge University Nonconformist Union to-morrow (Sunday) evening an address is to be given by Mr. J. H. Whitley, M.P. for Halifax, on "Nonconformity on Trial." On Feb. 15 a discussion is to be opened by a Toynbee Hall resident on "Some East-end Problems." On Feb. 22 Mr. H. Goddard, B.A., will speak on "The Ethics of Gambling," and on March 1 the Rev. F. W. Head, M.A., on "Notes on Bishop Butler." The meetings are held during the present term in the schoolroom of Emmanuel Congregational Church, Trumpington-street, and the papers begin at 8.45 P.M. Mr. F. J. M. Stratton, of Caius College, is hon. secretary of the Union.

THE constable seems destined to hold a place in the affections of the people very different from that indicated by the threat thrown at children and wrong-doers "to send for the policeman." It has long been the habit of some part of the police force in certain of our towns to discourse sweet music in the parks and public places; and in the crowded London streets, the constable, instead of being a terror to the ordinary citizen, is hailed, with gratitude for the sight of him, by many a lady or country visitor who does not know how to get across a crowded street, or how to find a required address. And now the children have fresh reason to think of him as a messenger of beneficence. The Police Aided Scheme for the clothing of Destitute Children is working well in many places. Manchester has adopted it, and it has been at work for about a year with admirable results, limited only by the amount of money available. Besides the chief end aimed at, the provision of warm clothing for the needy little ones with such practical safeguards as prevent its being taken from them, pawned or sold (wherein the help of the police is especially valuable), there is the excellent effect of the work—which is voluntary—upon the police themselves. May we not hope for the time when that terror of wrong-doers, whose main duty is supposed by many to be to arrest and punish, may develop into the beneficent agent of public well-doing in the protection and help of the weak and the preservation and promotion of public joy and beauty, when he will represent the organising beneficent action of the community more than its coercion of refractory individuals?

LITERATURE.

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.*

THE five papers read last Whitsuntide at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association by ministers who had come into our fellowship from that of the Church of England, the Congregationalists, the Wesleyans, the Scotch Presbyterians and the Roman Catholic Church respectively, were subsequently published in these columns, and have now been issued in very attractive book form. The papers, at the time of their delivery, made a deep impression, and taken together constitute a personal record of the utmost significance. Presented now in the pleasant and comely form of this little volume they will, we trust, command a widespread attention.

The most vivid piece of autobiography is that furnished by the Rev. Alexander Webster, who tells of his passage from the dreary Scottish Calvinism, in which he was trained, to the liberty of the glorious gospel of God's Universal Fatherhood; but in each one of the five papers there are characteristic revelations of conflict and fidelity to the highest aims, which cannot be read without keen sympathy and profit to the understanding heart.

We shall not attempt here even the briefest sketch of these five individual records, but strongly urge our readers to procure the book for themselves. In the present notice we shall simply dwell upon one point, which is of the greatest interest, and recall the testimony of each of the writers to what they have found in the religious fellowship in which, from such various quarters, they have found a common home.

The papers are prefaced by a brief introduction, which reproduces passages from a sermon by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, President of the B. and F.U.A., drawing attention to the remarkable significance of this record. Having spoken of the former religious connections of the five men, he continues:—

All these by their several ways, in the course of the years, with much anguish, with daring courage, have fought their way out of intellectual bondage into a gospel of love and freedom and hope, and have found rest and peace to their souls. From many quarters they have with long toil reached one centre. They have all found their home in one household of faith—a household despised and rejected by almost the whole of Christendom; and when they spoke to us they were full of gratitude to those who had received them into their free fellowship, and of thankfulness to God for their deliverance.

Note first that it is the freedom of our communion which is first of all so great a revelation and delight to our pilgrim friends. They find a religious fellowship in which they can obey the leading of God, and no man will gainsay them; in which they can press on and ever on nearer and nearer to the eternal truth of God; in which, not only in the exercise of their thought is there no conflict with any outward authority, Church or Synod, Pope or Priest, but no conflict in the inner man between conflicting duties, since truthfulness, sincerity, is the supreme and initial duty.

Note that first; and then note that none the less each one of these men has arrived at some kind of Unitarianism, that the dogmas have fallen away from him, that love to God and love to man have become to him the very essence, the sum and substance, of religion and morality. We have had our disputations in our own ranks which stands foremost, by which our Churches should be known, their freedom or their Unitarian interpretation of the religious problem. But, behold! to these men the two have come together; there is no disseverance between them. The perfect liberty has led to the beautiful faith of the pure Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man; and the beautiful faith itself has been the sure and certain guarantee that the liberty will never be curtailed. There is that in the orthodox theologies which drives men to the assertion of authority over other men's minds and consciences. There is that in the gospel commonly called Unitarian—which is indeed nothing else than the pure gospel of Jesus, expressed in terms of our modern day—which waters the roots of liberty and forbids the tyranny of Priest or Presbyter.

This is, in truth, the testimony which each of the five in his own way thankfully bears.

Mr. Lummis, loyal to the traditions and rejoicing in the religious fellowship of the Church of England, found the claims of orthodoxy, which could not justify themselves, intolerable. He then describes how such a Churchman as he was, shut out from every creed-bound Church, is driven to seek a community of worshippers, with a basis of free fellowship without subscription to any doctrine. And this is the result:—

"He learns that the churches called Unitarian actually stand upon that basis. The name may arouse his suspicion; he may find it difficult to believe that their open catholicity is genuine and real. But so it is, and so in the end he finds it to be. He casts in his lot with the Unitarians." And having done so he makes another most welcome discovery, for as time goes on it becomes clear to him "that while the door is really open, and people of widely different views enter unchallenged, and work and worship together, still there exists among the Unitarians a great force of common belief. They are far closer together, even in theology—to say nothing of more important matters—than are the members of the creed-bound Church from which he comes."

Mr. Wooding tells of the surprise that it was to him, after he had fought his own battle, to be invited to the freedom of the pulpit at Newington-green. For some years he could not allow himself to be called a Unitarian, but now with changed aspects of thought, he and his people meet, he says, "in what may be called the New Unitarianism; which I do not define theologically, but regard it as offering to its adherents the widest spiritual and intellectual freedom; and to the world, an evangelism of a depth and fulness of meaning such as to reduce the earlier content of the word to insignificance."

Mr. Crook is even more explicit in his emphasis on the attraction of a genuinely free fellowship. He could join none but an undogmatic Church, and thus states his position:—

Dr. Martineau says that he "could not belong to any Church or sect that was understood to pledge itself to the reception of any fixed dogmas or any immutable opinion, feeling that all stipulation, direct or implied, for specified agreement in theological opinion must be discarded from Church union." These words contain the answer to the question—why I, when I withdrew from the Wesleyan Church, have joined the so-called Unitarian Church. I am unpledged to any creed, and have only to be loyally true to the best that can be thought and the fullest that can be known in science and in criticism, being always on the outlook for larger and clearer views of God, Truth, Duty and Immortality. I have always objected to any Church being called by a doctrinal name, and it is most unfortunate that the only Church which is undogmatic in its basis has a dogmatic label. For instance, you must be a Trinitarian to be a minister in one of the orthodox pulpits; but you need not necessarily be a Unitarian in theology to occupy a so-called Unitarian pulpit, for to make Unitarian doctrine essential to our Church life appears to me to imply a re-adoption of that very notion of 'orthodoxy' which we profess to reject—a betrayal of our fundamental principle—our name ought to exclude what we, as a Church, refuse to be.

After this comes Mr. Webster's testimony, with thorough confidence in the Unitarian message even for Scotland. He himself found in it new life, and he thankfully notes the signs of change in the religious attitude of his countrymen.

The earnest mind now does not most deeply concern itself with how many persons there are in the Godhead, but with the deeper question, Does God care? It does not ask: Did Jesus walk on the sea and rise from the dead? but, Did he enunciate any truth that can lift up life? We have our answer ready, and in expounding the Fatherhood which is the new Continent of Religion and advocating the Fraternity which is the new goal of morality, we will help to furnish the living bread which the new day requires. It may not be that the regenerated theology of Scotland will call itself Unitarian, but that it will be highly rational and intensely spiritual I believe. The thistle is stubborn, but that it will burst into "glossy purples" of fervent and luminous faith, I fondly hope. As has been said, "Nature possesses the secret of turning dreams into realities. A knell has been tolled for the whole order of apathy and prejudice; and (to alter the saying somewhat) the new dispensation will evolve the higher national sympathies, and offer compensation to the suppressed soul of a creed-ridden people.

And finally from Dr. Klein we have this valuable statement:—

As to your Free Churches, commonly known as Unitarian, they represent something far more valuable and sacred than a mere denominational organisation. They represent the principle of reverent freedom in religious thought—that is the only principle with which we can approach to-day, with full honesty of mind and heart, the solemn religious problems raised by our present knowledge. To those who have not lost faith in the vitality of those problems, although they can no longer trust the old solutions bequeathed by the past, your Free Churches stand as a harbour of refuge, and the kindly Unitarian spirit makes those churches to them a natural home. Here, in an atmosphere of genial fellowship and true Christian tolerance, men may pursue the inquiries begun in days of storm and stress, knowing with assurance that they will be judged faithful if only they are true to themselves and to their clearest light. Elsewhere one might have been expected to defend certain foregone conclusions, and to serve, before all things, certain denominational interests; here loyalty to Truth and Freedom is the only accepted form of loyalty.

Here, above the narrow concept of a Church among the Churches, there seems to arise the glorious vision of a brotherhood consciously labouring to lay the foundations of a religion of Humanity in a world progressively tranformed by the Christian principle of love.

From these several testimonies we may gather much instruction and encouragement. Taken together they must help towards a clearer understanding of the ideal of religious fellowship after which our Free Churches must strive, and the spirit and method in which, as Unitarians, we must undertake the teaching of those great truths which are the foundation and the inspiration of our lives. To all liberal religious thinkers we commend the earnest consideration of this book.

PROFESSOR A. B. DAVIDSON'S SERMONS AND ESSAYS*

READERS of the brief notice in last week's INQUIRER of the life and character of Professor Davidson will be prepared to find that a note of special interest distinguishes his writings, however fragmentary they appear in collections like those mentioned below. The sermons preserved in the earlier volume are thirteen in number. They have no necessary sequence or intimate connection with each other, though it is convenient for reference to have them arranged in a Biblical chronological order. The editor informs us that, contrary to the usage of many preachers, if not most, Professor Davidson did not date his manuscripts, and it would take a good deal of ability of the higher critical order to decide which were earlier, which later products. So far as can be judged they represent his thought and feeling at widely different stages of his career, but there is a unity of sentiment as well as of method running through them all.

Each sermon deals with some typical personality. There are three distinctly dealing with the "calling" of men—Abraham, Isaiah, and Jeremiah being thus singled out. Two sermons deal with Jacob; and Moses, Saul and Elijah complete the list of the Old Testament subjects. From the New Testament the types chosen are John the Baptist, Nicodemus, Zacchæus, the Rich Young Ruler, and Thomas. There is something very characteristic in this choice of human lives as the preacher's most fruitful ground. It accords completely with the spirit of his work in all directions. In the volume of "essays" is one on "The Rationale of a Preacher," evidently a college address. In this address he hazards the opinion that "humanity is before Christianity; it is not broader, but it is prior. Christianity," he continues, "does not abrogate human nature, it only consecrates it." "It is the preacher," he maintains, "who, being a Christian, is most a man, who will be the best preacher." Without pretensions to being a great preacher, Professor Davidson evidently felt that his best chance of touching others was in the delineation of the human heart with its littleness and its greatness, its hopes and fears and ceaseless conflict with evil and mystery.

The sermon which by common consent seems to have most deeply affected the hearers was that upon "Jacob at Peniel." Here was a subject specially to his mind. The weak, yet not wholly unworthy patriarch, was just such a man as seemed typical of average humanity, and surely his instinct was right in assuming that even the average man may have hours of vision and night seasons of struggle. The mysterious wrestling alone which is recorded of Jacob was certainly to him a picture of his own experience. All his theologising, which is not much, considering his position as a teacher in a school of theology considered to be of the straitest, addresses itself to the needs of souls thus hard beset; and even in the full career of hostile criticism the reality of his sympathy with men softens his tone, and sternness subsides into pity.

Among the contents of the second volume is a keen and instructive article on "Mohammed and Islam," in the course of which Professor Davidson criticises unsparingly the defects of that faith and smites hard the delinquencies of its founder. As a corrective to certain too-favourable estimates of the Prophet, this essay well deserves to be read. With a skill not easily matched elsewhere the great exponent of Old Testament ideals contrasts the starved humanities of Islam with the warm and generous heart-pourings of Israel's greatest prophets, and in particular he deplores the low standard of the Mohammedan conceptions of manhood. And yet he follows with sympathy, wherever he can, the windings of the great Arab's mind, and maintains against all the worst that can be said, that he "certainly deserved to be called a religious and moral reformer."

It is this discriminating sympathy, this understanding of what a man has in him, that renders Professor Davidson's work specially attractive to us. The collection of essays is a rather miscellaneous one, and at least two of the five which are reprints from the Expositor, while in no way unworthy of their author, do not strike us as highly remarkable. But there is included in this reprinted matter a very fine study of the "Wisdom of the Hebrews," and it need not be said that Professor Davidson's delineations of "Hosea" and "Amos" are among the most vivid pieces in the book. The matter hitherto unprinted includes essays on several psalms, among them a critical study of the second which challenges special attention. Another essay which thoughtful readers would not wish to miss is entitled "Modern Religion and Old Testament Immortality." It is also decidedly interesting to hear what Professor Davidson, himself a leading reviser, has to say about the principles of revision. The editor, apparently unmindful of what his author tells us respecting the slow advance of the 1611 version into favour, speaks of "the fate that has overtaken the Revised Version," and hints that this has occurred through neglect of principles enunciated in the article before us. The case does not strike us in the same way, and however it will ultimately be with the Revised Version, we find that Davidson himself inclined to some of the very class of alterations which are deemed by some to be needless and vexatious.

For instance, he recommended special care of the article, and cites good cases to show the importance of inserting "the" before "Christ," while, on the other hand, he would omit the definite article when the indefinite, or a total omission would be better. He commends such translations as "thou hast words of eternal life" (not "the words," &c.); "and immediately a cock crew" (not "the cock"). Here we come upon things seemingly minute, and certainly depending a good deal upon personal temperament, but they are just the class of things, we believe, that affect the judgment of users of the Bible more than the question of absolute accuracy which, one would think, ought to prevail with all.

But we return to the sermons in order to close with a note more befitting the greatness and spirituality of this good and wise teacher. We are grateful to find many passages which after reading and re-reading retain for us that permanent radiance which is the dower of none but the best literature in this kind. Let the following passages from the sermon on "Saul's Reprobation" illustrate alike the mood of the man and the skill of the preacher:—

> It is not amiss for us just to stand before this spectacle of a great human misery, a perplexed, unhappy life, even where we should have supposed all the elements of happiness were present. Such a sight gives us thoughts of life not without use to us, and makes us wonder at the elements of misery inwrought into it; and life becomes to us something more mysterious, greater, less trivial; and the higher the mind, and the more lofty the part in life, the more and greater seem to be the possibilities of wretchedness. Life seems at first sight like the bright sunlight, one single element of brightness; yet, when in maturer years we analyse it, we discover it to be made up of many varied colours; and, between the colours, there are dark, unresolvable lines, that will yield to no analysis. In human life there are mysterious veins of misery, do what you will.
> Yet we might stand too long, filling our minds with this sight of a vague human misery, so great, as in this man's case, as to seem even beyond human. We must ask the reason of it. And some part of the reason we can see. It arose from the unfitness of Saul for the great place he occupied. . . . He was King in the Kingdom of God; and he failed to comprehend the meaning of that Kingdom. . . .
> We are all called to take some place; and accumulated miseries fall on us, and all about us, when we are not baptised with the true spirit of that place. When one is a mother, for instance, and thinks that most sacred relation has no higher duties than to train her child to look out for a high place in the world, deeming purity, and affection, and the voice of nature, things all very well for ideal compositions such as the Bible, but which one cannot afford to attend to in this life as we have to lead it; to be a father without the qualities needful for a father, the sense of responsibility to God the Father of all, the sobriety needful as an example, the piety needful in one who has to train souls, and who, intrusted with the yet flexible and unformed souls of his children, has virtually, we may say, their everlasting destinies in his hand; . . . to be Christians, without the spirit of Christ, without the serious consistency which such a name as Christian, which such a history as it suggests, makes becoming, and the constant anxiety which we should have to commend Christ, by our demeanour, as the only way of life—since to every one of us Christ has said, "As my Father has sent Me into the world, even so send I you"—to be any of all these things without the spirit becoming them, what disastrous failure must be the consequence, and what pungent misery at the end.

Side by side with this analysis of the causes of spiritual weakness the reader will place another of the source of

ST. FRANCIS DE SALES ON PREACHING.

SOME interviews with distinguished preachers on the subject of preaching were published a short time ago in the Daily News. The readers of THE INQUIRER may be interested in an interview on the same subject with St. Francis de Sales, a distinguished Roman Catholic preacher at the end of the sixteenth and the beginning of the seventeenth centuries. The interview, as it may be called, is taken from the account of his life by his amiable "Boswell," Jean Pierre Camus, Bishop of Belley, in a work entitled "The Spirit of St. Francis de Sales."

This St. Francis, like the greater St. Francis of Assisi, was an affectionate and human-hearted saint, with a large measure of "sanctified common-sense." He was born in 1567, and died in 1622, He was titular Bishop of Geneva, actually of Annecy, in a mountain district of Savoy, twenty-one miles from the capital city of Calvinism.

He was an indefatigable preacher, and preached with acceptance not only to the simple "montagnards" of his diocese, but also to fashionable society in Paris. He refused the offer of being made co-adjutor to the Archbishop of Paris. And, though he did not directly refuse a pension from the King of France, he only accepted it on condition that it should remain in the King's treasury "till he needed it for the service of the Church or the poor, as hitherto he had been abundantly supplied with the necessaries of life." Luxuries he neither had nor desired. His success as a preacher was due rather to love and to spiritual earnestness than to eloquence and oratorical gifts. And it was shown by his winning many converts from Protestantism. It is to be noted with regret that although he was most lovable and gentle, even in his dealings with "Heretics," yet according to Gieseler he also resorted to force when there appeared to be a favourable opportunity, suppressing Protestant worship in his diocese and advising the Duke of Savoy to cause an attack by a fanatical mob upon the city of Geneva. Even saintliness and affectionate gentleness of disposition are not always an efficient antidote to the vows of ecclesiasticism.

Having thus given a brief account of the person interviewed, we may take some selections from his remarks on preaching from the interesting and beautiful account of his life given by his friend the Bishop of Belley.

A sermon of his at Paris on the Last Judgment had resulted in the "conversion" of several Protestants. And he said: "Although my sermon was in no way directed against heresy, it practically told against it. Ever since, I have always maintained that he who preaches with love preaches sufficiently against heresy without introducing one word of controversy."

That principle is frequently though not universally applicable.

St. Francis de Sales insisted strongly upon the necessity of aiming at some particular point of practice or doctrine in each sermon. He used to say: "You can hardly believe how important this is, or how many well-thought-out, ably-written sermons fail to be useful for want of following this rule. . . . Otherwise they may be much admired, and yet bring forth no results."

Another time he said: "You should never go into the pulpit without a definite purpose to build up some special corner in the walls of Jerusalem, to inculcate some particular virtue or to expose some particular vice; for the true end of all preaching is to uproot sin and lead men to righteousness."

"Do you care to know," he said, "how I estimate the excellence of a preacher? If the congregation go away smiting their breasts and saying, 'I will do so and so,' I think well of the sermon; not when they are all crying out, 'What a beautiful sermon, what an eloquent man!'"

St. Francis de Sales tells a good story, a thing he appears to have been very fond of doing, bearing on this matter, though it has a double edge cutting both ways: "A well-known preacher came to me at Annecy, and at my request he preached to my people. His sermon was in so exalted a style, so pompous and so magniloquent, that all the good montagnards were astounded. When the sermon was over, everyone poured forth torrents of admiration. . . . Knowing that in many respects the sermon was far over the heads of its admirers, I asked various people privately what they recollected in detail, and what they had gained from it, but in vain; nobody could answer me. One more honest than the rest said, 'If I could understand and remember it there would have been nothing out of the common way: one admires chiefly because of one's ignorance. This preacher dwelt upon great and sublime matters which are beyond our reach, and so he makes us think very highly of our religion.'"

The Bishop remarked on concluding the story that "this man had certainly gained something by the sermon."

Shakespeare, by the mouth of Mark Antony, reckons "worth" among oratorical gifts. And certainly a sermon has more weight with a congregation if they know that it is practised by the preacher.

St. Francis de Sales is very emphatic on that point. He says that Christ was "thirty years doing and only three teaching." He points out "how far a holy life goes towards winning men to heed the preacher." He makes the comparison of one who says and does not to "a signpost which points out the road along which it never goes itself." Perhaps he was the originator of that witticism; but it may be older.

He "greatly approved of short sermons." "Believe me," he would say, "I speak from long experience. The more you say, the less people will remember; and the less you say, the more they will profit." But his idea of what constituted a short sermon was scarcely up to the modern standard. He often quoted the rule, given in Latin, "A full hour seems too long for an indifferent (inepto) preacher and long enough for a good one (idoneo). Three-quarters of an hour are preferred by good judges to a full hour."

St. Francis de Sales had a curious preference for preaching to small rather than to large congregations. And he has something to say that may encourage some preachers whose preference in the matter is not consulted by the fates.

He says: "My opinion is the result of thirty years' experience. I have always found that there were more results for God's service from my sermons to small congregations than to large ones."

He tells us that when he was sent out to preach before he became a bishop, "on a certain wet Sunday there were but seven people in the church; whereupon someone suggested that it was not worth the trouble to preach. I replied that a large congregation did not rouse me, nor a small one depress me; provided anyone was edified I asked no more. So I went into the pulpit, and I remember well that I preached on devotion to the saints, treating the matter very simply and without any special pathos or earnestness. Nevertheless, a person in the congregation began to weep and sigh and at last to sob loudly. Thinking that he was ill, I paused and offered him any assistance he required. The man answered that he was not ill and begged me to go on. The sermon was short and soon came to an end, when he approached and threw himself at my feet, exclaiming: 'M. le Prévot, you have saved my soul, you have given me new life. Blessed be the hour in which I came to hear you! It will be my blessing to all eternity.'"

Perhaps it ought to be added that the man had only been convinced by the sermon that Catholics were not "guilty of idolatry to the saints," and so was prevented from becoming a Protestant. That, however, would not lessen the effect which the incident produced upon the preacher. And he said to his young friend and biographer: "I could tell you many similar facts which have all tended to make me so greatly prefer small congregations, that when I go into a pulpit I am always glad to see few listeners before me."

This interview with a distinguish d preacher of the past, if it may be so called, may not give to moderns any help in attaining the power of popular oratory, but it has its interest and instructiveness. And it is always useful to be reminded, according to a comparison made by St. Francis de Sales, that sermons, like apple trees, are to be judged not by their blossoms, but by their fruits.

C. D. BADLAND.

THE BRUSSELS LIBERAL PROTESTANT CHURCH.

THE annual meeting of the Liberal Protestant Church of Brussels was held on Sunday, Jan. 18. The attendance was good, and the tone of the proceedings cheerful. The report of the treasurer showed an adverse balance of £15 7s. 4d., which it was decided to add to the outstanding deficiency of £68 15s. 10d., with the hope that a favourable conclusion of the pending lawsuit would soon allow the liquidating of the whole debt. In answer to the recent appeal, £31 was contributed by English friends, to whom and to all foreign benefactors a unanimous vote of thanks was cordially passed. In reviewing the position of the church, the pastor, the Rev. J. Hocart, stated that one member had been lost by death, another had resigned, and two sisters had withdrawn their joint subscription, but without expressing any intention of separating themselves from the church. On the other hand there had been a gain of two new subscribers. The membership seemed to have remained stationary, but this was not an exact representation of the case. There were a number of young people above the age of eighteen whose names were not on the roll as they had not asked to be registered, and respect for individual liberty forbade any inscriptions without a positive request. But the pastor felt sure several of these considered themselves as members, for they had been brought up in the connection and attended worship regularly. If these were counted, the membership would show a marked increase. And, in fact, as a result of these remarks, three young ladies immediately after claimed their inscription as members and subscribers. The pastor gave encouraging news of the meetings at Ghent and of a few friends scattered over the country. He declared his unfaltering belief in the future success of their church, but pointed out that, in order to maintain it as it was, and still more in order to extend its influence, a second pastor would be necessary, as the speaker was feeling the effects of past labours and of advancing years, and was obliged to be sparing of his remaining strength. But, unfortunately, through want of funds, no step could be taken for the present towards securing an assistant. The meeting was closed by a vote expressing gratitude and attachment to the pastor.

OBITUARY.

MR. THOMAS RICHARDS.

DEWSBURY has lost a prominent citizen and the Unitarian Church of that town a valuable member, in the person of Alderman Thomas Richards, whose death occurred on Sunday, Jan. 25. Mr. Richards came to Dewsbury as a boy from Darlington, and for nearly fifty years was connected with the business of a wine and spirit merchant, becoming in time managing director of his firm. He was for a considerable time a member of the Corporation, and as chairman of the Finance Committee rendered specially valuable service. He was chairman of the local Waterworks Board, and of the Technical Schools, a governor of the Wheelwright Grammar School, and a past master of the Lodge of the Dewsbury Freemasons. He was a warm supporter of the Unitarian Church, and a trustee, having joined the congregation before the present building was erected. For many years he was a member of the choir, by the members of which, both old and young, his genial presence will be specially missed.

The funeral service at the cemetery was conducted by the Rev. B. C. Constable, formerly minister at Dewsbury, who gave an address warmly appreciative of the late Alderman's character. The large attendance testified to the respect in which he was held in the town.

THE Ainsworth congregation, having adopted the "Revised Essex Hall Hymnal," have a number of copies of Martineau's "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home," which they will be glad to give to any church or mission where they would be useful, on condition that the carriage is paid. Application may be made to the secretary of the congregation, Mr. J. Tootill, 63, South View, Bury New-road, Ainsworth, near Bolton.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"WHY?" is indeed a useful word, just by itself.

It is not like "Oh!" amongst the first words we use, for we do not say "Why?" until we begin to think.

Have you ever watched a dog trying to catch birds as they fly near the ground? The birds seem almost to enjoy teasing the jumping, barking creature that cannot, as they do, get away from the ground. The dog goes on trying till it is tired, then gives it up, and perhaps lies down panting to rest. But, except in a story, you can scarcely imagine a dog thinking it over, and wondering why it cannot jump like a bird.

A child does ask "Why?" It can puzzle out something of the difference between jumping and flying, and of the difference between arms and wings. Having found out that it can jump but not fly, the child may still ask why it cannot jump any higher from the ground.

And so we go on from one "why" to another until we come to some "why" we cannot answer alone, or cannot answer yet. But still to a great many of our questions we do get answers, either alone, or from others. And we go on, both at home and at school, learning from the answers we receive to our own "whys."

We also learn much through being asked questions and having to give answers. Often a question from another makes us think and understand better, so that our teachers help us by their questions as well as by their answers.

Indeed, questions and answers are so useful at school that some years ago many school books were written in the form of questions and answers. The child learned the answers by heart, and then when the teacher asked the questions from the book, the child repeated the answer from memory.

Now I wonder whether you can tell why that was such dull work?

It was because neither the questions nor the answers were their own. If we think, we want to get answers to our own questions and to give our own answers to the questions we are asked. We do not want to get both question and answer from a book without any thinking at all.

Have you heard of a book called "Animals I Have Known," by E. Seton-Thompson? It has plenty of pictures, and the stories are true.

By silent watching and thinking out "whys" the writer learned to know many wild creatures in their own haunts. He learned to understand something of their different languages, to recognise their tracks, to read whole stories in their foot-prints.

He tells of an old king-crow and his band, of a young rabbit and his mother, of families of partridges and foxes. He tells how the young ones were trained to find food, and to escape danger. The stories are delightful to read in his book, but it must have been still more interesting to read them in real life, to watch the animals, to wonder why they did this and that, and to go on watching and wondering to find out why.

In both town and country there is much to be learned by watching the animals, the birds and insects, the clouds and the rain, the sunshine and the shadows, and by wondering "Why?" and trying to find out the "why" of this and that and the other.

Four little sisters at the sea-side, running barefoot on the sand, were amusing themselves on their return from the shore across the sandhills, by tracing out their own foot-prints.

In one place, across their own track, there was a line of marks which they recognised as the track of a bird, the tiny foot-prints beautifully distinct in twos and twos, as the bird had hopped along.

Crossing this track, they found another line—a double one—two rows, quite close together, of regular marks without any interruption. At this discovery there was a chorus of "Ohs!" and "Whys?" And whilst the others were wondering and guessing, one child quietly followed the track to try and find out the "why" for herself. She soon came running back carefully carrying the answer in her hand. It was a beetle, and being set down on the sand, it at once started off, making a new track just like the first. But this one soon came to an end, for the beetle, frightened at all the "Ohs!" of delight, burrowed right down into the sand to hide. You see that in watching animals we want silent "ohs" and "whys."

It is those who go on and on asking fresh "whys," and finding out fresh answers, who give us new knowledge and make new discoveries.

Isaac Newton was probably not the first to watch an apple fall from the tree, and to wonder why it fell. But he was in the habit of wondering about such things, and of going on wondering, and thinking and asking "Why?" and trying to find out. In this way he learned more about weight and why we cannot jump higher. He discovered wonderful truths about the movement of things falling to the ground, even about the movements of the earth itself, and of the sun and the stars too.

Newton also made discoveries about light and made improvements in telescopes that helped astronomers to discover more stars beyond those known before. For there is always a beyond in knowledge.

We begin with the evening star that appears early, before nursery bed-time.

> Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
> How I wonder what you are!

And we go on finding more and more stars beyond to wonder about.

It is not only the distant things that are beyond our knowledge and understanding the near ones are just as wonderful.

> Many things in life there are > Past our "understanding" far,
> And the humblest flower that grows
> Hides a secret no man knows.

The more we watch and learn "Why?" the more wonderful the world becomes for us.

There is so much to be learned, that any one of us can learn but little of it all. But each one of us can go on asking "Why?" and learning a little more and a little more.

If once we love learning we can never be dull. There can never be any scarcity of knowledge, but always plenty for all. We may eat all our sweets, break our toys or tire of them, spend all our pennies, but we can never come to the end of our "whys." However many answers we find, there are always more questions beyond, and more answers too.

THE WEALTH OF WORSHIP.

THE strength and gladness of common worship in a living Church constitute, as we attempted last week to show, a very practical contribution to the highest welfare of the community, and a contribution in the perfecting of which every member has a share, and ought to feel a direct personal responsibility. We return to the subject here, in order to emphasise this fact still further, and to set in a clearer light the definiteness of the aim and the worthiness of that spiritual ideal, which should kindle every heart, and thus lift the life of our churches to a higher level and give them a more abundant and effectual power for good.

The aim is, in the midst of the insistent material claims of the world and in answer to deeper spiritual needs, to secure in the church a quiet place of prayer, the home of reverence and aspiration and habitual worship. The church is to be the meeting-place of those who have become aware of the deeper significance of life and in close brotherly union desire to be with GOD in true communion of the spirit, bringing the offering of thankfulness and adoration, seeking for clearer vision, the deepening of faith, and fresh inspiration for daily duty. It is to be a place of rest, but also of restoration, where there is helpful ministry for every pathetic need—a searching and reproving spirit, the kindling and awakening word—where those who do not as yet know their own deepest needs may be brought to self-knowledge, and that which shall deliver them from their baser self. While the Church thus ministers, with deepening intensity as more and more humble and faithful souls are drawn to the better life, it sends out its messengers and becomes a centre of beneficent influence in the world, and by the very fact of its existence, and its healing and quickening power, a witness among men to the things of GOD.

To maintain the true life of such a Church is a great service, in which, as we have said, every member has a part. Yet how often those who are nominally members of a Church appear utterly insensible of any such claim upon their loyalty, unaware that any such solemn trust is placed in their hands. Our plea is for a fresh consideration of that claim, both for the work's sake, and because there is thus offered to each one a high purpose through the steadfast fulfilment of which the whole of life is rendered worthier and richer in the treasures which are incorruptible.

The full significance of such high service may not be realised at once, and yet even the lowliest part of faithfulness has its share in the great joy, and by doing the simplest things of what may seem a mere external duty in the right spirit one finds the entrance which leads to the more glorious vision of the sacred shrine within.

All the influences gathered about the church must make for quietness and reverence, earnestness of purpose, and endeavour after the true life with GOD. Thus the builder of the outward structure has his part, whether in the forms of noble Gothic or the simpler and more homely conception of the meeting-house; and then more continuously those who have the ordering of the affairs of the church, in its business management and its social activities and temper. This may seem to have but a very indirect bearing upon the worship of the church, and yet assuredly it is part of the one faithful offering, and it is of the utmost importance that there should be here nothing at variance with the truest spirit of reverence and Christian brotherhood. Every church officer has conspicuous opportunities of service in this direction, where the temper in which things are done becomes a test in him, as in the Church as a whole, of the inward spirit that prevails. In the church, as in the home, temper is a fateful thing, and the need of watchfulness and self-control and the discipline of a loving spirit cannot be too earnestly maintained.

Among the offerings which go to enrich the life of the Church that of music is one of the chief, and one over which the greatest watchfulness is required. In the ministry of the whole people, the united utterance of psalm and hymn, into which the spirit of worship and rejoicing faith has entered, may be of the greatest helpfulness, stirring the deeper life and drawing into a true communion hearts long barren and unvisited by any devout aspiration; and so also the music of the choir may be a true act of worship and of ministry to other souls. But this, no less than other forms of service, must be in self-forgetfulness. Elaborate music rendered in the church for display, for the self-satisfaction of performers and the pride of the congregation, is a dreadful thing. Here, perhaps more than in any other part of our Church life, there is need that we should seek more earnestly and with entire singleness of heart for the true spirit of worship. But where this is achieved, the offering of music brings a very precious gift.

Thus in many ways members have the opportunity of giving, to strengthen and uplift the common life of their Church, all as part of the one central purpose of which none can be heedless without impoverishment and injury to the whole. In the one spirit the life of the Church must be maintained and grow, the spirit of reverence and prayer, and this reaches its greatest height where all are united, whether in silent devotion or in the uttered word of prayer. But how much prayer is there actually in the Church? How much true seeking of the spirit of communion and surrender to the Divine will? Silence may be dead and formal, and not less so the repetition of the words of a liturgy or the utterance of the minister's prayer. Is he praying? Are the people praying? Is this the House of GOD, where the children are united in communion with their FATHER? The outward form is there. How many, with humility and absolute sincerity of purpose, are seeking the true spirit? These are the vital questions, which cannot be neglected, if the Church is to be true to its divine purpose and the people are not to be self-deceived.

Towards the same end the teaching of the Church must also be directed, even with its wider outlook upon the progress of truth and the world's work. The prophetic word may indeed open glorious visions of the truth of GOD, and fire to noble resolution for self-sacrificing service; but vision and resolution alike will be at one with the prayer of consecration, which in the Church is the instant token of their birth. The whole of a true life is, indeed, prayer to the Most High. It is realised and perfected in that spiritual utterance of the worship for which the prayers of the Church, in fellowship human and divine, furnish a great and sacred opportunity.

There is, therefore, for everyone a very definite aim, if he realise what the Church is for, and that he is bound to do his part to make its work vital and effective. And it ought not to be necessary to plead that this service, in the world as it now is, is most urgently needed. Habitual endeavour to be true to the ideal of the Church, and a true helper, carries with it the reward of every kind of faithful effort. He who forms in his own life the habit of worship in spirit and in truth finds that his insight grows clearer and his faith deeper, while there is a constant spring of energy for greater persistence in well-doing; and it is wonderful how much wealth of the inward life is thus garnered for each one and at the same time shared with the brethren. In the fellowship of the Church there comes to be a glad assurance of strength, and there is a veritable fountain of hidden waters springing up unto eternal life.

Where this life with GOD has become a true companionship of spirit, it grows with the experience of every year in knowledge and delight, in humble, reverent, and trustful love; all the deepest human experiences, whether of joy or of sorrow, become part of the one supreme reality, in a faith calm and unconquerable, over which death has no power. And this faith kindled in many hearts, gathered together in the union of the Church, becomes a testimony to the world of the very highest worth, declaring the living truth of GOD, and serving as a constant inspiration of all that is best in our common humanity.

"We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work Thou didst in their days, in the days of old."—Psalm xliv. 1.

"God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto Him."—Luke xx. 38.

THE relation or contrast between these two verses is so obvious as scarcely to need comment. The Psalm is mainly an appeal for God's help in a time of misfortune, and the appeal is based on the goodness of God in past days. Christ, on the other hand, repudiates the appeal to the past on the ground that the direct touch of the Divine Spirit is of much greater importance than anything that men have thought or said or done in days gone by. And so, by putting the two verses together, we get a glimpse of a double relation in which we stand to the past, whether we are thinking of ourselves individually or of the Church to which we belong. On one side our past may be a source of pride and a call to higher and severer duty; on the other side, it is to be ignored, its claims denied, its authority disowned.

Christ's words might well form the motto of every man who seeks to replace a dead creed by a vital faith. It is an inveterate habit of the human mind to look for God in the past, and to overlook the evidence of His energy in the present. The things about us appear so commonplace, so natural, that we fail to associate God with them. We are so conscious of the blemishes, the reserves of present piety, that we deem it a poor thing compared with the past piety from which the mortal trappings have fallen away. The influence of early training disposes us to look for wisdom and truth amid that which is old. And so, whenever a man appears who has been inspired by the quickening touch of the Divine Spirit to lead us upward and forward, we are apt to think that the new things he declares are little short of blasphemy. We distrust the living witness and fall back upon the dead ones. Not only Christ, but also every reformer who preceded or followed him, has been forced—in one way or another—to remind his fellows that God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

Put this truth into other words and it means that the only real and effective religion is that which seeks immediate and personal communion with God. If a priest or a form of words or a ceremony is allowed to intervene between the human spirit and the Divine, God is thereby pushed farther off, and religion sinks to a symbol of what might be, but is not. The hungry soul craving for God is mocked as a hungry man is mocked who dreams of food which he cannot get at.

In Touch with the Living God.

Now it is this instant touch of God's spirit with man's that constitutes religion in all ages, and which unites the devotion of superstition to the worship of refined and thoughtful Theism. The permanent mistake of mankind has been to associate religion with its accidentals rather than with its essentials. Religion is the same in all ages, just as filial affection is the same from the days of Adam until now. The son who loves his father and mother will possibly not express his love after the manner of a son in ancient Greece or Egypt. But it is the same emotion after all, has the same basis and the same sanctions.

With religion also the emotion is one whether felt in the desert of Sinai or in the heart of a city—in the pomp of the Vatican or in the bare silence of a Friends' meeting-house. The feeling of dependence upon God—the desire to know Him—is the one bond of union between men of every age and race. It is the clear testimony of brotherhood, and the assurance of a common Fatherhood. But whilst the feeling of dependence, of trust, of love is ever the same, the manner in which it seeks to express itself will vary according to the amount of knowledge and the kind of knowledge which exists at any given time. The children of Moloch and the children of Israel, the ancient Roman and the modern Briton (assuming them all to be religious), will seek different expressions for their religion. Now the offerings, the ceremonies, the liturgies and the opinions connected with religion represent the culture of the age and not its religion. The mistake so constantly made is in confusing the emotion with the blundering methods by which it seeks to express itself.

Through Changing Forms the One Spirit.

Alongside of religion then there are thoughts about God, speculations as to His method of government, forms of worship, creeds. These are often called religions, though they are but the accidental accompaniments of it. Generally, these accompaniments of religion are the relics of a past age. They represent the best thought and the noblest ideas of bygone days. They show what previous generations conceived God to be, and what they deemed the most acceptable offerings that could be made to Him. They may, or may not, stand for us also as the best presentation of what God is and what He requires from us. But knowledge increases, manners change, human activities take new directions and compel us to move to new points of view. And so, the forms of worship, the thoughts about God, which satisfied and comforted a past generation may seem to us inadequate or even false. What then? God is the God of the living, and if we are to serve Him sincerely and faithfully it must be with the thoughts and methods that are true to our knowledge and feeling, and not merely to the knowledge and feeling of our forerunners. It is in no way dishonouring them to say that we must give up the forms so dear to them, the doctrines they believed, the hymns they sung. If we feel we ought to make an alteration in the accompaniments of religion, and make it, we do but show that we are alive, as our fathers were, to the inspirations of the living God; that we are ready to adapt the presentation of truth to the conditions which are about us; that as new light falls upon our path we are as quick to discern its source as our fathers were to recognise the origin of the light which guided them.

Unity of Religious Life in the Church.

If now we narrow down our view to a single community of worshippers we shall see how the principle I have stated works out as applied to it. Religion being nothing less, and nothing more, than the personal contact of spirit with spirit it follows that for a congregation only the very vaguest statement of doctrinal belief is possible. Much must be left to private interpretation. In every congregation there are diversities of knowledge, of mental gifts, of special apprehension. In some devotional fervour is dominant, in others it is subordinate to intellectual perception. There are those to whom faith is as natural as their physical shape; others who have had a stern battle to fight in order to retain any faith at all; many who worship with a joyous "Lord, whom have we in heaven but Thee, and there is none upon earth that we desire besides Thee"; and some with a yearning, "Oh! that I knew where I might find Him."

What is it that constitutes the unity amid all this diversity? Surely it is that they are all seekers after God, all craving in various ways to acknowledge Him. It is possible, therefore, to describe them all as religious. But if we try to go beyond this simple, personal relation between God and man, we are at once in difficulties. Probably no two individuals would quite agree as to what they thought of God, or how they would explain His energy or His providence. And surely it is enough to say that they are all children of God, and leave all explanations and definitions to individual interpretation. In this way the Agnostic who wishes to believe and the Trinitarian who believes too much may meet in unity of spirit and worship the universal Father. If you attempt even to attach a doctrinal statement as essential to the worship you at once drive them asunder.

I do not wish to dwell upon the error of those who make uniformity of opinion a condition of religious fellowship. But I do wish even the youngest of my people to understand the nature of the heritage we have received. There is absolutely nothing to prevent a sincere Trinitarian from uniting with us in worship of Almighty God—nothing, at any rate, that we have created. We do not ask whether he believes God to be three persons or one. We do not care much whether he holds Christ's death to be an Atonement for the sins of the world or not. Indeed, if he does not volunteer to tell us, we shall never know. But if he comes to us we assume that he believes in God. What he believes about Him matters little.

Why Others Exclude the Unitarian.

Why then are we excluded from fellowship with those who differ from us? Not because we do not recognise the points of agreement, but because opinions are made an essential part of religion. Barriers, defended by all sorts of theological pom-poms, are erected round the altar of God which prevent our approach—barriers (note) of man's construction and which have nothing to do with the altar. I have often heard friends say that they have been to this or that orthodox church and have heard a good Unitarian sermon, whereat they seemed surprised. There is nothing to be surprised at. The affirmations of Unitarianism are the basis and essentials of every religion under the sun which recognises the Fatherhood of God. It is the non-essentials of man's creation which separate us from the other Churches of Christendom. The altar our fathers raised to God stands on the open veldt, free to the four winds of heaven. Whosoever will may come and worship there. If any man comes unworthily and takes the name of God in vain, if any man accompanies sincere worshippers for selfish purposes of his own (as Satan did in the days of Job), that is a matter for his own conscience. Nothing is gained by imposing conditions. Else would the doctrinal Churches exclude all hypocrites and liars from their midst, and they do nothing of the kind. The barriers do not keep out the unworthy. They only shut out the conscientious people who cannot believe that the Father's love is hedged in and made hard to approach by unnecessary difficulties.

* An Address given originally to the congregation of the Birkenhead Unitarian Church.

I am not saying that theology is never needed. But it should be a personal theology kept for private use and never formulated. Systematic theology is very apt to become systematic nonsense. Every man who thinks about religion will find that he has a theology of his own. Around the central fact of the being of God will cluster a mass of ideas—more or less coherent—concerning God's relation to the world and to men. But this personal theology need not be a barrier—as systematic theology usually is—to religious fellowship with those who think differently. And because God is a living God, it will be ever changing, ever replacing old thought with new, ever learning more of Him who reveals Himself slowly through the ages.

Our Fathers' Battle for Freedom.

It was for a religion without barriers that our special ancestors struggled and suffered. The freedom they won we have inherited, and there is just a possibility that we may not prize it as we ought. We are so accustomed to move about freely, to say what we think, to meet where we will, that it is hard for us to realise the condition of things when Dissenting Churches were ranked as public nuisances, and when fines and imprisonment were the rewards of fidelity to conscience. But it is good for us occasionally to picture to ourselves the conditions amid which our fathers lived, against which they struggled, from which they at length emerged triumphant. The freedom we enjoy and of which we are so ready to boast is a gift to us. It has cost us nothing. It was purchased by the blood and pain and tears of those who loved God more than they feared men, and who prized truth more than their own comfort or their lives. Surely the story of the fight for civil and religious liberty is one to make us proud and glad that we are in the line of special descent from those who fought it; a story to stir our blood and make us vow that in our day and according to our opportunities, the principles we have inherited shall not suffer in our hands.

Somebody has said that "the price of liberty is eternal watchfulness." The enemies of liberty never sleep. Themselves the slaves of a dead past, they would force us back into a thraldom from which we have escaped, if they could. It is our duty to see that we are not robbed of any part of the freedom so hardly won. How can we best do it?

Be True to the Great Tradition.

First of all by keeping in mind the history of the last 250 years in which our fathers played so noble a part. Mere gratitude—if nothing higher—should move us to take every care of our freedom, to aim at a higher liberty than has yet been gained, and to show ourselves the determined foes of every movement or proposal to place human opinion between men's souls and God. But there is a nobler motive than gratitude for what we have received, and that is fidelity to God. We all live unto Him. To us, as to our fathers, He will reveal His truth little by little, line upon line, precept upon precept, if only we prepare ourselves to receive it. We are not tied to dead men's thoughts. We do not believe that God will forsake us and leave us desolate if we fail to worship Him after the manner of a bygone age. We can live and move and have our being in Him, supported by present inspiration, and drawing ever fresh supplies of love and thought from the perennial springs of His Spirit. We are simply distrusting God if we hesitate and fear to move when He bids us move; if we resist the Divine prompting to advance and cling to the monuments of His presence which our fathers erected.

The Abiding Faith.

The citizen of the Kingdom of God is like a householder who brings forth out of his treasures things new and old. I have made it clear that in the legacy of our fathers there are things most noble, most precious, things we shall always want. The simple, reverent faith which turns to God with the single word, Father! the bold, unfaltering faith which amid all the changes that pass over human life believes that God and duty abide; the patient, waiting faith when wickedness is rampant and unholy power triumphant—these are old things. They belonged to our fathers. They are ours, the old family jewels which we re-set but never part with—the proofs of our inheritance, the pledges of our relationship to those who first owned them. But the fashion of this world passeth away. New intellectual movements begin, new social conditions arise, human activity is constantly breaking out in new directions. What are we to do? What shall be our attitude towards these fresh conditions and thoughts and movements? Only one answer is possible. Whilst we set our face as a flint against everything that is false or bad, we must welcome new light, new truth from whatever quarter it may come. It may clash with long cherished opinions, with what our fathers have told us. But if it carries conviction to our minds that it is from God, the opinions must go, lest haply we be found to be fighting against God.

The lesson seems to be that we may admire and imitate the deeds of our predecessors, their loyalty, their faithfulness, but we should always be chary of accepting their thoughts. The fires which warmed them are dead. No amount of blowing on the ashes will revive them. But the heavenly source from which the kindling came is free to us. From it we may snatch the brand which will light our fires. And by getting our fire direct from heaven, we shall best imitate our fathers and best embody our love and admiration for them. God is the God of the living. Let us all live unto Him.

JAMES CROSSLEY.

"THE Prayer of Jesus" is the subject of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. The Unitarian attitude towards the supposed tri-personality of God is clearly stated, and it is shown how the conviction of the simple humanity of Jesus has been of even greater practical importance for religion. The matter is brought to its clearest issue when we realise that Jesus prayed. It is thus stated by Mr. Hargrove:—

"He went up the hill to pray, and spent the whole night in prayer to God." Who did? For what did he pray? and to what God? Are we told that it was the Son who, in his human nature, prayed to the Father for himself as man and for his brethren? But if he had in himself all fulness, if he was God, how should he pray to God? The more we think—if, indeed, we dare to think, despite the prohibition of the Churches—the more utterly puzzling does it become. If prayer be communion with God, does it not follow that the whole life of one who is God and man in one person must be prayer. The union is perfect, indissoluble, it is as the union between one of us and his own nature, which cannot be conceived apart: and prayer must then be perfect and uninterrupted. What reason to go apart, to seek solitude, to spend the night? it is as if to write that a man went alone to breathe, that he passed the day in breathing; for if Jesus was God, to pray was more constant to his human nature than to breathe is to us; for Death stops breath, but not death itself, we are told, could sunder that union of God and man in one, in which the mystery of the Incarnation is said to consist.

The prayer of God to God, the communion of God with God, the submission of God to God, these are phrases without intelligible meaning. They make of the life and suffering of Jesus a theological enigma, which can move us only when we forbear to reflect upon it. We cannot imitate where we are bidden to worship, we cannot admire when it is our duty to adore. In the infinite radiance of the Godhead Jesus is lost to us, and with Mary we cry, "They have taken away my Lord."

TRINITY AND UNITY.

EVEN the most orthodox and old-fashioned of the readers of the London Quarterly Review must have been surprised to see some of the pages of its latest number filled with such a compilation of quotations as those which a learned divine has associated under the title of "The Blessed Trinity." It is almost pitiful to think what a helpless thing the doctrine of the Trinity has become in the hands of its defenders. One is not much surprised to see the old texts which have so long done arduous duty placed again in the forefront of the battle. The saying "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness," is insisted on as calmly as if there never had been a question of the authorship or the Divine inspiration of the Book of Genesis; it is insisted on as if the form of the saying had never been accounted for otherwise than by supposing a "Society of the Trinity," the very existence of which was never dreamed of by the prophets, and was, in anticipation and by implication, strenuously by them denied. We understand very well that this interpretation is a comfortable tradition not easily to be sacrificed. What is more astonishing is that the doctrine of the Trinity is defended by philosophical arguments drawn from the loneliness of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe"; and in order to make the case quite clear a number of Cowper's popular but least intelligent lines on that subject are quoted with convincing emphasis.

The suggestion is made that according to Unitarian teaching God must have been at some time pacing up and down through the realms of eternity like Selkirk on his island, intensely melancholy because He could hear the voice of no fellow, nor find any suggestion of old associations. He must have been, nay, He must still be, according to the Wesleyan philosopher and the writers who furnish his argument, like Adam in the second Creation story when he had passed in review all the beasts of the earth and the fowls of the air, and given them scientific names, but found none that he could adopt as a constant and sufficient companion. "Our first father was alone, for there was not another like himself. And so is the Unitarian's God alone; all heaven does not contain his fellow." If this suggestion is sound; if it represents in any degree the difference between Trinitarian and Unitarian worship, it is clear that the former can never again protest against polytheism, however complicated it may be. If the writer will have it that a plural God made mankind in his likeness, a likeness not complete without plurality (such is the doctrine), it must be pointed out that Adam and Eve and their children much more completely represent the human race than Adam and Eve alone; that a small family, or a small tribe do not represent human nature completely; that if the idea is worth anything those only have conserved a rational worship who have worshipped gods and goddesses, a great community, who have recognised that there must be powers in Heaven corresponding to all the varieties of human beings, and occupying themselves with very similar interests. If it be an orthodox and Christian idea to say that the "Society of the Trinity," "Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, eternally different, eternally one," took counsel about the creation of man, those are very near to the kingdom of Heaven who believe that gods and goddesses in great number decided on man's creation, and still keep up their interest in his welfare. Practically the latter doctrine is the same as the former. The expression "eternally one" does not modify the doctrine in the slightest degree. The Boers were "one" in their love of independence and distrust of the British when they took counsel to send in an ultimatum.

The present writer feels that such comparisons are sadly irreverent; but the irreverence is not his. The very people who contend for the unique inspiration of the Hebrew prophets are those who, to bolster a discredited theory of the Trinity, distort casual expressions occurring in a mythical Creation story, and sneer at the Unitarian's worship of a God who has no fellow in Heaven. As if it had not been the distinguishing glory of the great Hebrew prophets that they recognised God as in himself all-sufficient. As if their language on that subject ever varied except that in earlier days they denounced other gods than the One as powerless and worthless, and in later days denied their very existence. Those who surely might have learned from Isaiah that there is no equal to the Holy One, from Jeremiah that He fills heaven and earth, from Old Testament and New that there is one God and none other but He, seem content to fling away these glorious affirmations for the sake of cosmogonies no better than the old wives' fables that some New Testament writer warns us against.

The quasi-philosophic considerations which introduce these preposterous notions are without value. To suppose that any intelligent conception can ever be formed of God as He might be supposed to exist "before all worlds" is to ignore altogether the manifest limits of the human faculties. The notion of God existing alone, existing unworking, uncreating, out of relation to all things visible and invisible, is a notion gratuitous, irrelevant to any thing that man can know or any duty he has to do. It is like the notion of an intelligible universe in the imagined time when there was no intelligence to be cognisant of it. For the sake of exercise in argumentative subtleties such meaningless figments may be permissible. In the sphere of Religion they have no place. We worship God not because of what He might have been in ages when no one lived and nothing existed, but because of what He is, now that we happen to exist. We love Him because He first loved us. And carry our thoughts back through as many ages as we will, we cannot conceive of Him as unloving; to endeavour to imagine a time when He, having no intelligent and affectionate creatures to care for, found means to create diversity in his own Unity, and so feebly to foreshadow the unity of Adam and Eve and Cain (so we must represent it, if a Trinity and not a Duality is the best representation of God), is in our thought to forsake God the Father altogether, and to toy with our own cleverness.

The utter failure of those who would keep alive an old doctrine, long after it has survived its use, to find any analogy for it in the universe as we see it, in the nature of human beings as we know them, in the discoveries of the man of science, or the experiences of ordinary men and women, in the teachings of the most spiritually minded of the prophets, and above all in the teachings of Jesus, must be their excuse for falling back on such argumentative pretences as those which do duty in the London Quarterly. They should be read by every Unitarian for his profit and encouragement.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held at Ullet-road Church Hall on Saturday, January 31, the chair being taken by the President, the Rev. L. de B. KLEIN, D.Sc. Among those present were the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. J. Jupp, E. W. Lummis, H. W. Hawkes, J. Morley Mills, A. E. Parry, and the District Missionary, H. D. Roberts; Mrs. George Holt and Mrs. R. D. Holt, Sir J. T. Brunner, Messrs. W. B. Bowring, P. H. Holt, Henry Jevons, T. R. Cook, A. S. Thew, and many others.

The draft report and balance-sheet had been printed and circulated.

The report spoke of the loss the Association had sustained by the death of William Rathbone, one of the earliest members, who served on the first committee, and to the end took great personal interest in the aims and work of the Association. The report also showed that the work throughout the district was growing, and not only were the congregations at Bootle and Liscard being assisted, but further work was being undertaken. The report from Bootle was most encouraging, the congregation was full of enthusiasm and life, and had nearly paid off the debt on their premises. The report from Liscard was equally hopeful, and the congregation were working unitedly and with a steady purpose to advance the cause they had at heart. Mr. Roberts' report described the work done at Garston, Widnes, St. Helens, and Runcorn. At Garston the Co-operative Hall is taken for all day on Sundays and Tuesday evenings, and the time is very well spent; the only difficulty is when the hall above is let, for then it is almost impossible to have any serious talk; therefore the congregation are working for an iron church. The iron church at Widnes was opened on Feb. 27 after meetings in the town. The attendance has fluctuated, but there is already a real, if small, community of earnest men and women. There is only a Sunday evening service and a course of lectures on Thursday evenings; it is hoped that there will soon be a Sunday-school and regular Thursday evening meetings, but this can only come gradually.

The Transporter Bridge from Runcorn to Widnes will be opened this year, and then those friends who have enjoyed the three series of Runcorn lectures will be able to come more regularly to Widnes, though even now they frequently attend. Last year the attendants at the St. Helens lectures asked that they might have more week evening lectures. During the year these have been so much appreciated that they have asked for a Sunday service once a month in addition to the week-night lectures. The use of Hamilton-road Buildings as a Domestic Mission has proved most satisfactory, and the work done there is excellent. After very great consideration the Committee decided to close the Free Christian Church at Crewe, and the Rev. R. S. Redfern has been appointed minister at Leigh. On inquiry the Committee have failed to discover any real desire for a continuance of the services at Crewe.

The finances of the Association are in a serious condition; there are only eighty subscribers, who contribute in all £182, while in donations £465 has been received to pay off last year's adverse balance, to pay for the iron church at Widnes, and to reduce the balance due to the treasurer.

The Rev. W. J. Jupp, in moving the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, spoke of the very great importance of the work, and insisted on the necessity of the Committee and officers being consistently supported by the large constituency in the Liverpool district. This should be borne out by the increase in subscriptions, both in number and in amount, so that the work of the Association might be carried forward as it ought to be.

The Rev. L. de B. Klein, in seconding, told the meeting from his personal knowledge of the very good work being done by the Association, which was so fully set out in the report, and pleaded for further funds to carry on the work.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in moving the resolution thanking the ministers for their services during the past year, assured them of the sincere sympathy and regard of the Association, and said that a few years ago no one would have thought such excellent things could have resulted from the Bootle and Liscard congregations, and yet to-day they were almost full grown. And new work was begun at Garston, Widnes and St. Helens, which now are as Bootle and Liscard were a few years ago. At each of these new places there was a devoted few who must in time succeed, and the work done at all these places was most encouraging.

Sir J. T. Brunner, in seconding, said how well he knew the Rev. J. Morley Mills and his work at Nantwich and the Rev. H. D. Roberts and his work at Chester, and though he did not know so much of the Rev. A. E. Parry, he was sure they were all doing yeoman service.

The Rev. J. M. Mills, Rev. A. E. Parry and Rev. H. D. Roberts replied.

Mr. W. B. Bowring proposed the Committee for the ensuing year, and the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, in seconding, said there was a great work to be done between Waterloo and Crosby, which might be largely organised from Bootle; and also at Hoylake and West Kirby, where many Unitarians now live.

The Rev. E. W. Lummis proposed, and Mr. T. R. Cook seconded, the vote of thanks to Dr. Klein for his services as President and for presiding, and for the use of the Church Hall on that occasion.

The Rev. Thomas Mitchell, President of the Primitive Methodist Conference, in a lecture on "Our Church To-day," explained that all Methodists were alike in the doctrine they taught, and in the institutions they had. Of his own Church, he remarked that Primitive Methodism had a membership nearly 200,000 strong. It was not so strong as it ought to be, but they were increasing. It came to this, that at the end of ninety years they had four millions' worth of property and a debt of one million. A friend had said it was an awful thing to have such an enormous debt hanging over them, but he reminded him that it was not all on one chapel. They were paying off their trust debt at the rate of £55,000 to £60,000 every year.

Peace in this life springs from acquiescence even in disagreeable things, not in an exemption from suffering.—Fénelon.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The annual meeting of the above College was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Wednesday, Jan. 28, the President, Mr. F. Monks, J.P., in the chair. There were present, among others, the Revs. W. Robinson, D. Agate, W. Harrison, W. E. Atack, N. Green, J. Ruddle, J. A. Pearson, P. Prime; W. C. Hall, W. R. Shanks, A. C. Smith, C. Roper, C. J. Street, E. L. H. Thomas and Principal Gordon, and Messrs. G. Cook, J. R. Beard, George Hadfield, F. W. Monks, Colonel Pilcher, J. Kerfoot, J. H. Brooks, E. Talbot, E. Lawton, Alderman H. Rawson and R. C. Law.

The Secretary read the report, which recorded a year's good work. The students had worked well, and those who had completed their course last June have settled to serious work in the ministry. The total income of the College was less; but owing to an exceptionally small expenditure, there is a balance in hand of £44. A "Harry Rawson" Prize has been founded, to be awarded annually for proficiency in the study of the English language and literature. For this purpose the Committee of the "Harry Rawson Portrait Fund" handed over their surplus after defraying cost of portrait, &c. A great change has been effected in the bye-laws as far as the admission of candidates as students is concerned. In future all candidates for the whole course of four years must pass the Preliminary Examination of the Victoria or some other British University; but the Committee have power to grant to any candidate a probationary year at Owens College for this purpose. Also men studying for their degrees must take classes in both Latin and Greek. It undoubtedly meant more strenuous effort on the part of the student before entering College; but it will, after his entrance, prove a great advantage to him. The Special Aptitude man who enters college for just the two years' theological course will find the conditions of entrance much the same as formerly.

The President, in moving the adoption of the Report, referred to the "Harry Rawson" Prize as a small honour conferred upon a very worthy man. That day the City of Manchester had conferred its greatest honour, the Freedom of the City, upon Alderman Rawson, and not without good reason.

Rev. C. J. Street, in seconding the resolution, said that the Committee felt there should be something like a University hall-mark upon the candidates who applied for admission. If candidates fail in their probationary course the Committee's hands will be clear. The tutors will give oversight to those studying at Owens. The work of Principal and tutor had been well done during the past year; and both the series of special lectures and the lessons in voice production had been of great value. He referred to the death of Mr. Frank Taylor, who had been a true friend and generous supporter of the College.

A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the visitors, the examiners and the honorary medical officers, &c.

It was announced that the President for the ensuing year is Mr. John Ward, the Lord Mayor of Leeds.

Officers and Committee were also appointed, and the President was thanked for the services rendered in the chair that day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"AN OBSTINATE FALLACY."

Sir,—I agree with Mr. J. H. Wicksteed that to base our churches on worship, without any limitation of dogma, implies a certain faith; which, since it is capable of intellectual statement, may, if he so choose, be termed a "dogma." But it is not a limiting dogma, which is what Mr. Rudolf Davis desires. Mr. Davis wishes, as he explains, to save our churches from future vagaries of doctrine by tying them up to present-day Unitarian opinions. He wishes to put us in line with other sects by giving us a differentia similar to theirs.

Now the word Unitarian is used to denote those opinions which Mr. Davis proposes as his church basis. Would it be wise for me to choose so pre-engaged a word to express a meaning with which those opinions have nothing to do? I cannot see the advantage of a merely verbal agreement. E. W. Lummis.

PROPOSED EXCURSION TO HUNGARY.

Sir,—One result of my numerous lectures on Hungary during the present season has been that a great desire to visit that country has arisen in many minds. This has naturally led to the expression of a wish that I would organise an excursion party for that purpose. After mature deliberation, I have decided to make the necessary arrangements to this end, if I hear from a sufficiently large number of gentlemen.

As will be seen by reference to an advertisement in this paper, I desire to know not only how many will be likely to join, but also what time they can devote to the excursion, and which month of the present year will be preferred. When I get these particulars, then a plan can be prepared in accordance with the wishes of the majority.

In addition to revisiting our Unitarian friends in Transylvania, I contemplate visits to several parts where a good idea of the mineral wealth of the country may be gained, as well as of the ample field there is for the profitable employment of British capital in various enterprises. This will involve journeying through some lovely Carpathian scenery, as well as becoming acquainted with many of the less modernised inhabitants.

W. H. Shrubsole.

We have another letter from Mr. Rawlings, in reply to Mr. Robinson on the subject of "Britain for the British." This we must keep until next week. We have also received a number of other letters bearing more or less directly on this subject, but cannot afford space for a general discussion of Socialism.

Whoever fears God, fears to sit at ease.

To do the thing we can, and not presume
To fret because it's little.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

WE are sometimes asked, "What work does the Eastern Union do? The question, however, is never put by members of our smaller congregations, who know that the Executive takes a keen interest in their welfare, and is ever ready to render them what assistance it can. It sometimes becomes an advisory committee to them, and acts in a very helpful way through warning them against plausible but undesirable persons anxious to gain a footing in our ministry. This work, assisted by the ever-ready advice of Mr. Bowie, is necessarily carried on quietly, but it is a great service rendered by smaller Unions to the whole denomination. Then again, the funds at our disposal are very small, amounting to about £30. With this sum we cannot do great things, and consequently have to supply the deficiency through work and the use of our brains. If this sum were not contributed to the Eastern Union the ministers would have no exchanges, for they can ill-afford to pay travelling expenses out of their own pockets. Fortunate is the minister in this district who has a neighbour living within twenty miles! And were it not for the Eastern Union, which provides through its Executive's meetings opportunities for ministerial fellowship, our ministers might run the risk of passing a whole year without seeing anyone of exactly their own cloth. A minister does need the sympathy and help of his brother-minister, for he can supply what no layman, however close a friend, ever could or can. But the members of the Eastern Union Executive will place in the hands of the subscribers in the course of a few days a report of much work done, despite great obstacles. They have made fresh efforts, and are still making them. The need for them has become greater, for some of our smaller congregations are in a somewhat worse plight than they were a year ago. Some of them have difficulty in securing ministers at all. The want of funds, their isolation and a moderate amount of prejudice are all against them. Some of their chapels would probably be among the list of the closed but for the encouragement of our Union.

We have sustained heavy losses through death. Four of our leading laymen, Mr. I. M. Wade, Mr. H. E. Blazeby, Mr. J. Leach and Mr. J. Youngman, and one of our ministers, the Rev. J. C. Knapton, have passed away during the year. It will be long before their places can be so efficiently filled. Besides these, several deaths have occurred among our less influential members, some of them being suddenly removed in the prime of life. Almost our only other losses have been due to removals. Our good friend, the Rev. C. D. Badland, has left Yarmouth for Whitchurch, where our good wishes and thanks for excellent work done in connection with our Union follow him. Mr. Amey has settled at Colyton after having worked faithfully for thirteen years in this district. He will be remembered as the founder of the village congregation at Bedfield, where he has made our Unitarian faith acceptable to men who follow the plough. They were sorry to see their minister depart. The ladies of the Central Postal Mission, with their usual activity, have soon secured a successor in Mr. R. Newell, who will find plenty of work awaiting him even in the quiet and under-populated district of Framlingham. Three of our pulpits are without ministers, Bury St. Edmunds, Hapton, and Yarmouth.

We now come to events of a more pleasant nature. The Eastern Union has placed on record in its report its thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for having promptly acted upon a suggestion made in a Provincial Letter that a district missionary should be sent to help the weaker Unions. A few weeks later the Rev. James Harwood came, and visited almost all our churches. He saw quickly what was needed, and was frank and helpful in his advice. He cleared certain grounds for us, revealed more plainly some of our difficulties, and inspired some of our congregations at a time when they sorely needed it.

During the winter the Union drew up a list of lectures that our ministers were prepared to deliver and sent it to most of the churches. The railway expenses were borne by the Union. Some of the lectures were religious, others literary and historic; others, again, were illustrated by limelight views and dealt with the life and features of countries the lecturers had visited. This plan of week-night lectures we find carried out in a properly organised manner by certain Unions of other denominations, each minister delivering his lecture to several churches. It is a plan that could be carried out with excellent results in districts where the churches are closer together, the Union thus becoming a Union of Literary Societies as well as of Churches. The charges made and the collections taken went to the benefit of the churches where they were delivered and exceeded the expenditure made by the Union.

The congregation at Ipswich is making steady progress. There is a band of enthusiastic and capable workers there, who greatly strengthen the hands of their minister. Mr. Tavener, after having passed through a period of persecution from other Churches, has now been appreciated by the people of Ipswich. During this winter he has delivered a series of lectures in the Town Hall under the auspices of the Town Council.

Norwich is hopeful. The Sunday-schools contain 350 scholars, who are well-behaved; and the Young People's Guild, formed three months ago, has now eighty-eight members. These, with about a dozen exceptions, are between the ages of fourteen and twenty-three. The enthusiasm with which they have taken up the work and the success that has attended it give me confidence in recommending the formation of Guilds in all our churches. Judging from the "Guild Year Book," the church which has the most young people attached to it is Kidderminster, where a Guild has been in existence since 1878, and the young people have not been allowed to drift. Our numbers to-day would be larger than they are if we had not so failed here in the past. The right course to adopt if we desire to rid other Churches of the fond delusion that Unitarianism is declining is to secure the names of the children on our books by baptism or through the Sunday-school; to see that at about the age of fourteen they become members of a Guild; and when they are sixteen to hold half a dozen classes for instructing them in our faith, and then to ask them to be formally welcomed into the church. Such a course is adopted in Norwich; and the minister, after his course of addresses, has received letters from the young people stating that they have resolved to live Christian lives, and expressing their willingness to take part in the annual dedication service, which is the most inspiring of the year for old and young alike. Even if there are only two to be welcomed the service should be held, and the minister, if he has any tact or even human sympathy, can conduct it in such a way that it will not be an ordeal, but an inspiration. In 1879 the Rev. C. J. Perry said in one of his sermons:—

> I should think most ministers of religion would tell you, if you were to ask them, that the service which most deeply affected their lives—the service whose memories were most truly helpful to them—was that in which they were dedicated to the Christian ministry. Certainly that is my own experience. But surely young men and women who are not giving themselves to this special ministry, but are entering other walks of life, where doubtless they will be able to serve God every bit as well, might join in a dedication service. We all need it alike.

How much more powerful our churches would have been to-day if this remark had been noticed at the time and at once put in practice. We preach the sanctity of all callings, but we do not act upon it. It is of far more importance that such a service should be held for our young people than for our ministers. The latter have already solemnly dedicated their lives to God's work, but those who enter trades and professions often sadly need to have a religious direction given to their lives. A formal welcome should therefore be given. It will attach the young to our churches, and they will feel their responsibility towards them even though they cannot at first become subscribing members.

Mr. Scopes, of Ipswich, is President of the Eastern Union this year, and he is determined that something shall be done to encourage the young people during his tenure of office. Fortunately a suggestion came from Mr. Smith, the Secretary of the Ipswich Chapel, which it has now been decided to carry out. A united meeting of Unitarians, old and young, is to be held on Easter Monday in Norwich. The members of the Union's Executive are anxious that even the poorest shall be able to attend, and as the railway expenses are heavy, are appealing for donations to carry out their scheme. They hope to issue tickets at a cost of 3s. 6d. each, which will include all expenses. In the morning a religious service, conducted by one of our prominent ministers, will be held, at which the united choirs will sing anthems. After luncheon parties will visit places of interest in the city or take walks in the country. And in the evening the Octagon Chapel Choir will render Sullivan's oratorio "The Prodigal Son." These gatherings will give our young people their first opportunity of meeting each other, and are certain to bring great good to our cause. The idea is being taken up with enthusiasm by those who have already heard of it, and we trust we shall not have to refuse any late applicant for a ticket through want of funds. These we hope to raise chiefly in our own district, the richer and older helping the poorer and younger. But we shall be glad of assistance from outside also, the treasurer of this fund being Mr. F. H. Smith, St. Brelade's, Gippeswyk-avenue, Ipswich. ALFRED HALL.

"CHILDREN who gather pebbles on the shore!"
Well said: and yet to our expectant gaze
There come anon strange hints of country o'er
The wild of waters lost in distant haze.
And, as Columbus fed his flouted faith
On scraps of carving, unfamiliar wood
And drifted seaweeds; and encountered death
In following over Ocean ideal good
To find—and found—the New World of his creed,
We too have tokens—follow we their lead!

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Appeal.

London: Deptford.—Mr. George Ward, the Church secretary, writes:—May we beg a little space on behalf of our Sunday-school at Deptford? For some time the pastor, the Rev. A. J. Marchant, has struggled with the aid of a few helpers to keep the school going. Lately the secretary, Mr. Weller, Jun., received an appointment that means "a life on the ocean wave," and no one has at present taken his place. We get an afternoon attendance of from sixty to ninety children, and Mr. Marchant feels that, if outside help is not forthcoming, he must regretfully close the school. This action, however necessary, under the present circumstances, would be a blot on London Unitarianism, and we trust that some young people of ability, with the necessary qualification of a love for children, may volunteer to help us in this almost "forlorn hope." Hospitality will be readily given to those helpers desirous of staying (or otherwise) to the evening service.

Acton.—The anniversary services were concluded on Thursday, Jan. 29, when a social tea-meeting was held, followed by a public meeting at eight o'clock. The chair was taken by Mr. Alex. Barnes, who expressed the hope that at no distant date the members would be worshipping in their own building. The Rev. Henry Gow gave an earnest address on "A Free Church." Encouraging speeches were made by the Revs. F. K. Freeston, J. H. Wicksteed, and T. E. M. Edwards. Mr. H. G. Clennell attended on behalf of the London District Unitarian Society. A vote of thanks to the chairman and the singing of the Doxology brought a very pleasant gathering to a close.

Ainsworth.—The annual business meeting was held at the Presbyterian Chapel on Sunday, Jan. 18. After tea, which followed the afternoon service, Alderman Thomas Holt took the chair, and the accounts, which were very satisfactory, were presented. The officers were re-elected, and Mr. Thomas Harwood (Bolton) was unanimously elected a trustee, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Frank Taylor. The minister's report and that of the Sunday-school showed the chapel and school to be in a very healthy condition. Many improvements have been made of late by the Renovation Committee of the chapel, and it is now resolved to erect a tablet in the chapel to the memory of the Whiteheads, who have been long connected with the place, and who were ministers for about three generations.

Burnley.—For several weeks past special Sunday evening lectures have been given in Trafalgar-street Church. The first lecture of the course was given on Sunday evening by the Rev. Robert McGee, of Colne, the subject being "Are Unitarians Evangelical?" There was a large congregation, and the lecture was highly appreciated. The previous lectures have been given by the Revs. Jenkyn Thomas, of Rawtenstall, J. J. Shaw, of Newchurch, and W. H. Burgess, of Accrington. The lectures have created considerable interest, and the congregation are much indebted to the lecturers for the kindly help they have so willingly rendered. On Wednesday week a very pleasant "At Home" was held in the schoolroom, for which the invitations were issued by Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Bibby, of London, and formerly of Burnley. Mr. J. S. Mackie presided over a large company. Mr. Bibby gave an address, and there were two concerts during the evening, at which the amateur band, composed of members of the church, gave selections. The evening was a great success, and Mr. and Mrs. Bibby were cordially thanked.

Byker.—There was a happy gathering last Wednesday week in St. Ann's Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, where a conversazione was held by the members of the Byker Unitarian Church. Upwards of 100 were present. The proceedings were briefly opened by Mr. J. Glendining, after which vocal and instrumental music by a number of friends, and dancing, contributed to the enjoyment of the evening.

Devonport.—As a result of recent effort, the whole of the money required for the purchase of the freehold of the church and for incidental expenses, over £400 in all, has been raised, and the purchase has now been made. A Sale of Work held last November contributed largely to this result, but the congregation wish to thankfully acknowledge the generous help received from many friends at a distance.

Dudley.—A successful social meeting was held in Baylie's schoolroom on Friday week, when the Rev. G. St. Clair presided, and in addition to speeches, an enjoyable programme of music was rendered. Mr. St. Clair's Sunday evening lectures on "The Bible as Unitarians Read It" have drawn many additional hearers to the Old Meeting House.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The third meeting of the session was held at Stratford on Saturday, Jan. 31, when a very excellent and helpful address was given by Mr. Ion Pritchard, entitled "A Plea for an Annual Revision of our Sunday School Methods," in which he pointed out the usefulness of an annual stock-taking at which the lines on which the school had been carried on during the past year could be considered, and new ideas for the better working of the school brought forward. This would be a time when the school literature could be overhauled, and out-of-date books removed and new ones suggested. The arrangement of classes, order of dismissal, &c., could be discussed, and defects remedied. A short conference was held after the paper, in which the Revs. John Ellis, W. H. Rose, and others spoke.

Halstead.—The annual business meeting of the Free Christian (Unitarian) Church was held on Sunday after the service. Services have been held on alternate Sundays throughout the year by ministers provdied by the Provincial Assembly, the church band supplying suitable music. Selections are played from some of the best masters. During the winter months Mrs. Kemp, a member of the congregation, holds a service on the other Sunday nights. The average attendance will compare very favourably with former years, and the members have slightly increased. Fresh hymn-books have been purchased, and for a small congregation a satisfactory balance is in hand. Mr. Dear, of Southend, presided, and represented the Provincial Assembly, giving a short address of good, sound advice.

Heaton Moor.—The Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, preached the anniversary sermons on Sunday, Jan. 25, to good congregations. The annual soirée was held on the following Friday, when a large number of members and friends assembled. The musical programme was excellent. Altogether a very pleasant evening was spent.

Ipswich.—A very enjoyable evening was spent in the schoolroom last Tuesday by the congregation and friends, at the invitation of Mr. and Mrs Hines. In addition to a musical programme a very interesting lecture was given by Mr. Hines on "Humorists and their Humour."

London: Essex Church.—Interesting proceedings are announced for Wednesday next in connection with the inauguration of the London Guilds Union. At 7.30 there will be a service, at which the Rev. Joseph Wood will preach; at 8.30 a business meeting to pass the Constitution; and at nine a conference, at which the Rev. H. Gow will read a paper on "What Young People can do for the Church." All the meetings are open.

London: Forest Gate.—The annual congregational meeting was held on Sunday after evening service. Thirty-two members were present. Under the able ministry of the Rev. H. Woods Perris the progress made during the last three years is maintained, and the attendance, especially at the evening services, steadily increases. The financial aspect is not so bright, but it was resolved that special efforts should be made to wipe off the debt. Mr. S. H. Brown was re-elected hon. treasurer, and Mr. F. Kilburn hon. secretary. The London Unitarian ministers are to hold their monthly meeting at Forest Gate on Monday afternoon next, and in the evening a public meeting will be held, at which addresses will be delivered by the Revs. F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, and H. S. Perris.

London: Kentish Town.—The annual meeting of the congregation of the Free Christian Church was held on Monday, Jan. 25, Mr. Armitage Bakewell in the chair. The reports of the treasurer and secretary were of a hopeful character, showing an increase of seatholders and a considerable increase in the amount of the weekly offerings since the Rev. George Critchley's ministry commenced. There is still much to be desired before the church can attain to its former prosperity, but it is felt by everyone that Mr. Critchley's earnest, eloquent, and thoroughly Christian teaching must in the end make itself felt as a power for good in the neighbourhood, and a source of benefit to the church over which he presides.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission.—The annual business meeting of the congregation was held on Sunday evening last at the close of the service. Mr. A. Thompson took the chair, and the report and balance-sheet were adopted. The election of officers and committee for the coming year took place, and a very successful meeting concluded.

Poole.—On Tuesday evening last a very interesting lantern lecture was given by Miss Spencer (of Southampton), on "Hungary and the Hungarian Unitarians." The lecture was in connection with the recently-formed Guild of the Good Shepherd, and was well attended. The close attention of the audience showed with what interest the lecture was followed, and at the close Mrs. William Carter expressed the very hearty thanks of all present to Miss Spencer for her kindness in visiting Poole.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel (Presentation).—On Thursday week a reception was held by Mrs. Bramley at her residence, "Thorncliffe," in Claremont-crescent, as a farewell to the Rev. J. E. and Mrs. Manning, on their leaving Sheffield. As a token of the esteem of many friends gained by Mr. Manning during his thirteen years' ministry at Upper Chapel, a presentation was made to him of the eleven supplementary volumes of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," and to Mrs. Manning a richly-engraved afternoon tea tray in silver. Sympathetic speeches were made by Mr. W. Watts as chairman and the Rev. W. Blazeby as an old brother-minister, and the presentations were made by Mr. J. K. Lister and Mrs. W. Stevenson respectively. Mr. Manning, in acknowledging the gifts, spoke of the pleasure and satisfaction with which he looked back on his ministry at Sheffield, the regret he felt in parting from friends, and the deep interest he should always feel in the welfare of Upper Chapel. Mrs. Manning also responded, and a vote of thanks was accorded to Mrs. Bramley, moved by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, seconded by the Rev. J. E Jenkins, the assistant minister at Upper Chapel.

Southern Unitarian Association.—The quarterly meeting of the executive of this Association was held at Poole on Thursday, Jan. 29. The President, Mr. J. Cogan Conway, was in the chair, and amongst those present were the Revs. C. C. Coe, E. C. Bennett, and C. E. Pike, Mrs. Osler, Mrs. William Carter, Mr. F. Pinnock (hon. sec.), and other delegates from the various churches in the district. In the evening a public meeting was held under the presidency of Councillor William Carter. The Rev. C. C. Coe, speaking on "Old and New Views of the Bible," pointed out that though in the face of the advance in scientific knowledge and critical research, the old views as to the plenary inspiration of the Bible were no longer tenable, yet the Scriptures remained, from the literary point of view, the noblest treasure in our English tongue, while their living power for religious inspiration was as great as ever. Bright and helpful addresses were also given by the Revs. C. E. Pike and E. C. Bennett, and Mr. W. T. Bushrod.

Swansea.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Jan. 26, when encouraging reports were presented of church, school and postal mission. The chief event of the year had been Professor Carpenter's course of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century." A warm tribute was paid to the zeal and activity of the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, minister of the church.

Whitchurch.—On Thursday evening, Jan. 29, the Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., gave a reading in the schoolroom of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden." The attendance was very good, and the proceeds were in aid of the church funds.

Widnes.—On Jan. 22 the first social meeting of the worshippers in the Victoria-square Free Church took place. Several Liverpool friends came out, and Miss Darbishire and Mr. B. P. Burroughs (hon. secretary of the Liverpool District Missionary Association) sang, accompanied by Mr. F. Robinson. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Burroughs, and by the Revs. J. C. Hirst and H. D. Roberts; and it was resolved to form a roll of sympathisers with the aims of the church. On Sunday, the 25th, several men and women enrolled themselves as avowed members. Last Sunday Mr. Roberts preached to an increased congregation.

York (Resignation).—The Rev. H. Rawlings has resigned his position as minister of St. Saviourgate Chapel, and the resignation will take effect in six months' time.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THERE would appear to be some reasonable prospect of a settlement of the problem of London's educational organisation on better lines than it once was feared. The alternatives are four:—(1) to continue the School Board or some other body elected ad hoc; (2) to relegate to each borough council the direction of the schools within it area; (3) to constitute a sort of "water board," as the phrase goes, not without implied condemnation of the unwieldly and shuffled machinery created chiefly in the interest of the great companies and others in possession; and (4) to give the control substantially into the hands of the London County Council. We are forbidden to hope that the magnificent system built up during thirty years by the School Board will survive the wreck of its no less worthy rivals in the provinces. They have been broken up, and, we suppose, it must follow. But our grief at its going will be considerably abated if the final policy named above is adopted by the framers of the system which is to take its place. There would then be some chance of securing two most desirable results—first, an effective popular control; and secondly, a fair sharing of the burden of support over the whole area of the metropolis.

WE are led to believe that the heads of the Church in London are in favour of trusting the County Council—of course, provided always that the favour shown in last year's Act towards the denominational schools is repeated in this year's statute. Equally, of course, we hope for our part that that favour will be minimised in the interest of education itself. The Guardian last week gave unequivocal support to this scheme, and appealed to the Government to set aside its distrust of the Council, and to empower that body to add to its management of technical education the task of unifying the whole system of elementary and secondary instruction in London. The clergy will naturally stipulate for a majority of managers on the boards of schools "not provided by the authority," but the Guardian considers it as a set-off to this that clerical interference with religious instruction should be limited by the Kenyon-Slaney clause, the principle of which it would accept as settled by last session's debates. We observe that the "Moderates" on the School Board recommend the policy of making the County Council the paramount element in the "authority," and the chief, if not the only, objection to this policy expressed by "Progressives" is that it is doubtful how far a body already charged with very important and totally different duties can be reasonably expected, not only to do in addition the enormous work included in the present School Board administration, but also that involved in taking over the denominational schools. The experiment, however, is worth making. If the Government will but frankly take conference with all sides in this matter a plan may be shaped out which, while not an ideal best, will be a fairly adequate substitute for it.

A VERY important conference of Progressive members of the newly constituted local education authorities was held in London last week. Earl Spencer presided, and while counselling persistent vigilance and a determination to amend the Act of last year in the direction of greater popular control and religious liberty, he recommended strenuous efforts to make the most of the present situation. In this his lordship, in common with other responsible Liberal leaders, runs directly counter to the policy of sullen inactivity which appears to be approved by some sturdy Nonconformists. Our own opinion, and we should say that of most practical men, is that if you want a good thing in place of a bad one, you must work for it, and not sit down while the enemy is busy. If it comes to a question of paying rates to privately or non-popularly managed schools, a man must decide for himself what he will do; but meanwhile much else may be done by properly constituted Education Committees, and it would be folly to leave them to be captured by opponents to popular control. So far as they can we hope our friends in the country will take a prominent share in developing the wholly unknown but not wholly unhopeful resources of the new machinery of education.

THE most noticeable feature in the debate of this conference, however, arose not on the question of action or inaction, concerning which there was fair unanimity, but on a point of policy in dealing with "non-provided" schools. A resolution was submitted recommending that pressure should be brought to bear on the trustees or owners of these schools to hand them over to the local authority. If this were not done, negotiations should proceed on the basis that no increased expenditure on these schools should be sanctioned by the authority, unless (1) the trustees should agree to appoint half the foundation managers from persons elected by the local authority, (2) the managers should agree to appoint the teachers selected by the local authority without reference to sectarian test or qualification, and (3) the teachers should be free from obligation to teach any distinctive sectarian dogma. A brisk debate ensued on the introduction of this proposal, and it was criticised as an attempt to alter the law. It was, however, warmly defended, and ultimately carried by a large majority. Of course, the legal question would at once arise, in such a case as this resolution contemplates, whether the local authority can under the Act withhold increased expenditure in the way indicated; apparently no less a lawyer than Mr. Robson is of opinion that it is within its power to do so.

IN the course of a speech to his constituents at Aberdeen on Monday, Mr. James Bryce, M.P, referred to the question of Native labour in South Africa. It was proposed, he said, that the natives should be forced, by the imposition of a tax, to labour in the mines, and they were told that this was necessary for the development of an industry on which the prosperity of South Africa depended. They were, of course, also told that it was for the good of the natives that they should be obliged to work. This nauseous pretence recalled the argument so often heard in the eighteenth century from those who carried on the infamous slave trade—that it was a good thing for the negroes to be brought from Africa to a country where they would hear the Gospel. They could have no more melancholy proof of the extent to which men's minds were perverted by those sordid and material views which had played so large a part in South African questions of recent years than the odious suggestion that Britain should sanction a system so near to slavery. Only three years ago it was put forward as one of the reasons for the war that it would improve the condition of the Kaffirs, who were alleged to be illtreated by the Boer Government, and now it was proposed to place on these very natives a burden which the Boer Government itself deliberately refused to inflict, though it might thereby have increased the production of mines and its own revenue from taxation.

MANY good speeches were delivered at the big meeting which the Wesleyans held in the Aquarium; none more touching than that by Dr. Guinness Rogers. After speaking earnest and eloquent words of the debt which all the Churches owe to John Wesley, he added:—

Ah, sir, I have been young, and now I am old. But now that the snows of many a winter are upon my brow, now that I look around, and, perhaps with calmer spirit, contemplate some of these questions, I simply say that our churches on all sides have made no greater mistake than to forget altogether the true law of perspective, to make the things great which are miserably little, and to forget that the great things of the Gospel are the only things worth working for, worth living for, worth fighting for, and worth dying for. So, sir, I am here to-night to rejoice very heartily with you in your great movement. It is exactly the kind of thing that is needed to impress London, and London is very dear to all of us who live in it. It gets a strange hold upon our hearts. We weep over it, and we pray over it, and we would work for it. Many who live in the country do not quite understand what the sentiment is. I have a strong passion for Lancashire, but it is altogether a different thing from my love for London. It is something, I think, of the same love which led the Master to weep over Jerusalem. How dearly Hugh Price Hughes loved London. How earnestly he worked for it! What a legacy of inspiration, and of hope, and of example, has he left to you! I beseech you—I do not need, because the excitement and interest of this meeting show that our hearts are all aflame—but I beseech you to be true to this mission.

TUESDAY'S Daily News devoted a column to a report of a sermon by Dr. John Hunter on "Non-Church-going," preached at the King's Weigh House Church last Sunday evening. "Is it a fact," Dr. Hunter asked, "that people do not now attend public worship as they once did?" And the reply was:—

In the absence of reliable statistical information it is impossible to say. Fifty or a hundred years ago newspapers were not eager to count the number of worshippers, and the Churches themselves were not so prone to measure their success by numerical standards. Statistics are useful, but they have their limits, and their value may be easily over-rated. Numbers in matters ecclesiastical or political are by themselves no test of truth or right, no test of moral strength or influence, and no test of the highest and best kind of success. There must be moral quality behind the numbers to give them any worthy significance. A Church numerically small, like the Society of Friends, may be a stronger influence on the side of truth and good than a Church whose statistics of membership are vastly more imposing. And what is true of denominations may be true of single congregations and ministries. It is not always the preachers who attract the largest congregations who are the truest prophets of God and the best ministers of Jesus Christ.

It is not our first duty to fill buildings, but to fill minds and souls, be they many or few, with the light and love of God. It is not difficult to draw crowds if one is not particular as to how it is done. Crowds are not always worshipping congregations. People often go to churches and to religious services in halls on Sunday just as they go to theatres on week-days, and for the same reasons. There is a magnetism in numbers, and numbers are good, other things being equal; but they must not seek to win or bribe people to places of worship with anything which is other and less than truth and God, or make numbers a first or supreme test of influence.

STATISTICS of modern church-going, Dr. Hunter said, might easily give us too pessimistic a view of the situation. There was certainly less formal and conventional church-going than of old, and there were now also many more sources of moral and religious instruction. He welcomed the change from formal, conventional, and compulsory church-going to an attendance more voluntary and personal, and which expresses some degree of honest interest in religion. It is an opportunity which a man with faith in his calling, in his message, and in the worship he leads, rejoices to face. The support which comes from superstition, or from fashion, or small conventional motive, or from superficial or frivolous cravings, is no real and reliable support. The Churches are standing, as they never stood before, upon their own merits. As remedies for non-church-going, he urged the need of a revival of spiritual life, and of intellectual seriousness, a clearer and stronger sense of the necessity of institutional religion and improved church methods. Their real problem was not how to increase church-attendance, but how to make church-attendance profitable and attractive in all honest and best ways. "Their Churches," he believed, "would best meet and adjust themselves to the conditions and needs of modern life by being made to stand for more, not less, as religious institutions, institutions which exist to provide the atmosphere of devout worship and intellectual seriousness, the sense of spiritual relationship, the Divine interpretation of life, to help men to win and keep their souls, to find God, to touch the healing hand of Christ, and to realise the communion of the Holy Spirit."

WHAT kind of reading is done by those who use the free libraries? Statistics of some of the lending libraries in the Manchester district have just been given in the Manchester Guardian. A typical library, that of Gorton, lent in all 2,806 books during December, of which no less than 2,602 were classed as Fiction. The great majority of borrowers are women, and there are very few of them members of the working classes. It is suggested by the Editor of the Guardian that the only conditions under which working men are likely to do serious reading, or women either, are the provision of reading-rooms in which some amount of comfort and the necessary quiet are possible, the accessibility of the books in open cases without the usual formalities, and the presence of someone well acquainted with the books who will readily advise the intending readers what works are at hand dealing satisfactorily with the desired subject within their powers of comprehension. It is suggested that it would be better to spend more money in making the books available, though it should mean reduction in the number of volumes added, seeing that so many of them are merely stored away out of sight and out of use.

THE suggestion made in the Manchester Guardian touches the fringe of a very great problem. The working classes, the great majority of the people in our manufacturing towns, have no opportunities of quiet, whether they desire them or not, in their own homes. So meagre is the accommodation of an ordinary workman's home, with its living-room used for all the purposes of a household, that serious reading or thought are impossible for any but the mind trained to concentration, such as is seldom found even among students. As a mitigation, the provision of more reading-rooms where books are readily to hand in the midst of the houses where the people live is certainly desirable; while the problem itself is part of that wide and pressing problem, the housing question. People who read sterling standard works of literature in these days of cheap and good reprints are more likely to buy than to borrow. That they should do this and read them at home is best, and it is usually the man who does this who finds his way to the Public Library to secure the loan of works of permanent value which he is not able to buy for himself.

THROUGH the death of "Edna Lyall" (Miss Ada Ellen Bayly), which occurred on Sunday night at Eastbourne, we lose one who by her novels touched many generous sympathies, and made a powerful appeal for a truer humanity and a larger charity in English religious life. It was "Donovan" and "We Two," the latter in the first instance, which secured for her a widespread popularity, at the time when the controversy as to Bradlaugh's right to take his seat in Parliament was at its height. Herself of a truly religious nature, Miss Bayly pictured in her stories the fortunes of men driven into unbelief, and touched the right note in her attitude towards them and sincere orthodox believers alike. Her popularity was well maintained by her later novels, historical and romantic. The slighter "Autobiography of a Slander" (1887) taught a very salutary lesson. In the "Hinderers" (1902) she made a protest against the popular attitude towards the South African war. Miss Bayly was a staunch Liberal, and for many years was one of the secretaries of the Eastbourne Women's Liberal Association; but she lived a retired life, latterly in the home of her elder sister, the wife of an Eastbourne clergyman. She was daughter of the late Robert Bayly, barrister, of the Inner Temple, and was born at Brighton.

SPEAKING of Cowper in his lecture at University College on Thursday week, Mr. Stopford Brooke said that he would always keep his place in English poetry. He made a new departure in several ways, and was a landmark in the history. His treatment of theological and religious subjects in poetry was something new. Even in his Olney hymns the melody of the best was perfect. His sympathy for the animals which live with man found exquisite expression. Best of all were his lyrics of personal affection, in their simplicity and depth of feeling, such as the lines to Mary Unwin; and the more terrible lyrics of acute personal suffering, when as a "Castaway" he was alone with himself and his fate. The lines on his mother's picture stand almost alone in the poetry of the affections.

IN Cowper's "Task" the love of Nature for her own sake is found almost for the first time. The verse, Mr. Brooke said, keeps a quiet level, without the force of great poetry, but sincere and gentle like the character of the man himself. It slips along, like the soft swirling of the river flowing by, like Nature's movements on a quiet day. The three books on Winter in the "Task" are the best, the easiest in verse and most charming in description. As an example of the poetry that brings us very near to Wordsworth, Mr. Brooke read the following passage from "The Winter Walk at Noon":—

The night was winter in his roughest mood,
The morning sharp and clear. But now at noon,
Upon the southern side of the slant hills,
And where the woods fence off the northern blast,
The season smiles, resigning all its rage,
And has the warmth of May. The vault is blue
Without a cloud, and white without a speck
The dazzling splendour of the scene below.
Again the harmony comes o'er the vale,
And through the trees I view the embattled tower
Whence all the music. I again perceive
The soothing influence of the wafted strains,
And settle in soft musings as I tread
The walk, still verdant, under oaks and elms,
Whose outspread branches overarch the glade.
The roof, though moveable through all its length
As the wind sways it, has yet well sufficed,
And intercepting in their silent fall
The frequent flakes, has kept a path for me.
No noise is here, or none that hinders thought.
The redbreast warbles still, but is content
With slender notes, and more than half suppressed:
Pleased with his solitude, and flitting light
From spray to spray, where'er he rests he shakes
From many a twig the pendant drops of ice,
That tinkle in the withered leaves below.
Stillness, accompanied with sounds so soft,
Charms more than silence. Meditation here
May think down hours to moments. Here the heart
May give a useful lesson to the head,
And learning wiser grow without his books.

That, Mr. Brooke said, was poetry on the frontier of a new world. All Cowper's soul, all the best of him was in it. He had a genuine feeling for Nature, and for the universal in human nature. He recognised that there lives and works "A soul in all things, and that soul is God."

THE following is from the Free Methodist:—"Can a man be a Christian on £1 a week?" was the advertised topic at a special "People's Service" held at one of our chapels last Sunday. A more doubtful point is whether a man can "be a Christian on £100 a week." But, according to the teaching of St. Francis of Assisi, which is being revived in a very singular way just now by M. Paul Sabatier, the man with 15s. a week is in a better position than either, and the man with nothing (and with contentment) is the best Christian of all!

CHANNING HOUSE SCHOOL.—The school has just been "recognised" by the Board of Education for the purpose of Registration of Teachers under the terms of the new Act, regulations 3 and 4. The school was inspected by one of H.M.'s Chief Inspectors with a view to obtaining this "recognition," which has now been duly completed.

LITERATURE.

APOSTOLIC OPTIMISM.*

IT would be impossible to read any one of these sermons without perceiving that the author has the qualities which combine to give a man "pulpit power." His acquaintance with Holy Writ is both wide and deep. He has great facility in getting at the heart of a Scriptural saying; he also has great skill in selecting such a saying just for the passing effect without getting at the heart of it at all. And to this very day, notwithstanding all the work of all the critics, that preacher has an immense advantage in his work who knows how to use his Bible; who never fails to find a suitable illustration, or a striking simile, or a suggestive sequence in the volume which even yet appeals to an English audience as no other book or collection of books can do.

Yet for effective pulpit utterance other talents are needed than those of apt quotation and skilled exposition. One has heard the dullest, dreariest, most incredible discourses from a man who possessed both these gifts. The man was a doctrinaire, one whose notions had nothing to do with living, working, suffering human beings, but only with texts and interpretations. No such man speaks to us here. It is a man concerned with the spiritual life of men: one who wishes to impart to the languid the energy of Grace; who would have the spiritually apathetic to feel the Power of the Cross. These phrases, like so many in the book, are old time-sanctioned phrases; like some worldly people we have met they have lived so long in Christian surroundings, among churches, hymns, sermons, prayers, that their piety has been taken for granted. Now they have been seized and examined and compelled to disclose their hidden life.

They have had to throw off whatever was but a poor and paltry pretence, and to justify their existence by fulfilling the functions that Heaven assigned them.

If a single often misused word would describe these discourses, one might say they are mystical interpretations of the New Testament and of human life. Most of the old doctrines are either taught or implied, but they are read with a difference. They are not part of a doctrinal system; they are made to express the experiences of life. We cling to the cross not to save our poor little souls from future torments, but to gain even now, even here, some sense of the mysterious vicariousness of suffering, and some reverence before the mysterious and only half-revealed holiness of God. We go to Christ and rest, not from the burden imposed by imaginary sins and imaginary terrors, but from our own selfishness, from the dreariness of an unsympathetic life. Doubtless all men cannot receive the Gospel in this form. The very names of the old incredible doctrines repel them, the very pass-words of the sons of Zion suggest superstition to them. I have met a man feeling quite weary of the Bible, but full of eager interest if one mentioned the Koran. Such will let this book alone. But those who are open to wholesome spiritual instruction, who are glad to be aroused to fresh effort, and cheered with new hope, and have at need the faculty to translate an old Provincialism into a broader dialect will give the book a welcome. If the author does not always act up to his own ideal; if we cannot say of him as he says of the Messiah, there is "nothing glaring, nothing over-emphasised, nothing over-done . . . nothing of the screech, smiting the senses with startling impact; nothing of the loud shock, nothing sensational"; we may that these characteristics do not predominate. If the language sometimes seems larger, it is a fault excusable in one who, believing in Christ, is using his utmost persuasive word to commend Christ to other men.

MILLENNIAL DREAMS*

"THIS book," Mr. St. Clair says in a brief Preface, "is mainly an historical compilation. . . . I have used freely the chronicles and authors whose records and writings are referred to in the course of the volume, and have not given much space to comment." What we find is not, in fact, a critical history of the doctrine of the Second Coming or the Millennium, but a gathering together in a certain chronological order of a large amount of curious lore—gossip, one might call it—ancient and modern, about the strange imaginings of people looking forward to the end of all things, or the supposed advent of the Christ, or some "Non-Christian Messiah."

Thus, many strange expectations of the ancient world are described, and such books as "Daniel" and "Enoch" are dwelt upon at some length. Several pages are devoted to a note on Robert Elsmere's wrestlings with the problems of Daniel. There are curious passages on the early imagery of Christ as "the Lamb" and "the Fish," while various forms of early Christian expectation are chronicled. Coming to later times, after the excitement of the year 1000 A.D., we are told of the Flagellants, the Anabaptists, and the Fifth Monarchy men, and then of Swedenborg and Edward Irving.

Among the books to which Mr. St. Clair frequently refers are Mr. Grattan Guinness's "The Approaching End of the Age," Higginson's "Ecce Messias," and Presbyter John Lundy's "Monumental Christianity." Standard historians such as Gibbon, Mosheim, and Hagenbach, and of later scholars, Renan, Kalisch, and Charles are among Mr. St. Clair's sources.

The chapter on "False Christs" tells of John Smith, Mrs. Girling, and others, and in a final paragraph of the Doukhobors in Canada who, "having set free their cattle and abandoned their homes, started on a long march to Winnipeg, where they expected 'to meet Christ!'" In telling this story Mr. St. Clair does but repeat the current reports of the newspapers of last autumn, but Mr. Tchertkoff has since published a statement based upon more intimate knowledge of the people themselves, affirming that this idea that the Doukhobors set out to meet Christ at his second coming was entirely mistaken.

"The misunderstanding," says Mr. Tchertkoff, "is easily explained by the fact that this people have historically developed for themselves on spiritual matters, forms of expression so symbolical that even Russians unfamiliar with this peculiarity of theirs or bereft of the religious experience necessary for the understanding of spiritual strivings—are themselves often misled by the quaint terminology of the Doukhobors. No wonder then that local Canadian interpreters could not help making a muddle of the whole thing."

The true reasons for this strange pilgrimage, in which only a section of the Doukhobors took part, seems to have been the desire to escape certain difficulties as to land-tenure, and the Government, and the hope of reaching a milder climate.

Having brought his story to a conclusion with a chapter on "The Expected Conflagration" at the end of the world, Mr. St. Clair adds a final chapter on "The Scientific Prospect," which introduces a sharp contrast to the strange medley of expectations of all ages previously described. There are, we suppose, still large numbers of people who take these things quite seriously, and among them Mr. St. Clair may find many readers; but we frankly confess that we are not much impressed even by scientific speculations as to the ultimate end of this earth, and are content with more immediate prospects of life and duty. Mr. St. Clair also concludes that whatever the final end, there is at present no immediate sign of it; "for the increasing vigour, and growing intelligence, and multiplying labours of the race, are like those of a young man rejoicing in his strength."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Nineteenth Century and After there are three articles, very different in character, and dealing with entirely different subject, which yet go straight home to matters of vital interest to our social well-being. And in the first place we will put Mrs. Barnett's article on "The Beginning of Toynbee Hall—a Reminiscence." Vividly the story is told of how Mr. and Mrs. Barnett early in 1873 came to their parish in Whitechapel and what they found there, of the significance of their close ties with Oxford and the great Master, and of the outcome of Mr. Barnett's quiet influence there as "unpaid professor of social philosophy." In March, 1883, Arnold Toynbee died, and a year later Toynbee Hall was established in Whitechapel. As to its character as a Settlement of University men living and working among the people of the East End, Mrs. Barnett quotes some words from this year's report. There Toynbee Hall is described as

> An association of persons, with different opinions and different tastes; its unity is that of variety; its methods are spiritual rather than material; it aims at permeation rather than at conversion; and its trust is in friends linked to friends rather than in organisation.

Its aim Mrs. Barnett describes in these closing words: "to raise the ideals of human life, and to strengthen faith in God Almighty, whose Christian name is Love."

Another article wise in its discernment and its practical suggestions is Mr. Hutchinson's "Working Man's View of Trade Unions;" and of all good women who are concerned in household duties we ask the consideration of Mrs. Frederic Harrison's article, "Mistress and Maid." A better method as to "characters" than our haphazard procedure is thus described:—

> In other countries they have a more businesslike and satisfactory system. The young man or woman intending service buys a book—let us call it a "service book" in which his name, birthplace, parentage, are entered. There may then very likely come a recommendation from the schoolmaster, and so he or she gets his first situation. At every change the character is written in the book and visaed by the Consul, who affixes a stamp. It is thus possible to see the "ensemble" of some years of service, and if the record is good it ensures work to every industrious man or woman, the characters are more serious and more carefully set down than is commonly the case with us, and the system prevents hasty statements, as "Frau Buchholtz" has told us in her inimitable way. The writer has now one such book before her, and is greatly struck with the simplicity of the plan and the value to employer and employed of such careful testimony. The system is in vogue in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and probably in many other countries.

In the Contemporary Dr. Edwin Abbott makes a cogent reply to Professor Jannaris on the subject of "The Encyclopædia Biblica and the Gospels"; there is a striking piece of imaginative writing in Mr. Hilliers' "Sunday in the Country," while the number opens with an article by Dr. Macnamara, on "The Government and the London Education Problem." The greatness and complexity of the problem is forcibly stated, the "mad scheme" of autonomy for the Borough Councils is exposed, and other alternatives considered, and an urgent plea made for concentration of the Progressive forces and an immediate awakening of London from apathy on this vital question. Mr. Maccullah's article on "The South African Natives" should also be noted, with his suggestion of a new Native reserve, north of the Zambesi.

In the Fortnightly there is an article by Mr. Cloudesley Brereton, "The Education Bill for London: a Forecast," of which the central idea may be gathered from the following quotation from the concluding paragraph:—

> To constitute the School Board or an analogous body the new authority seems scarcely within the range of practical politics. To make a joint Board, packed with vestrymen, the educational authority for London is to parochialise the heart of the Empire. Without popular control, with little or no experience of education and its administration, such a close corporation appears destined in advance to sink even lower in the long run than its prototype, the Metropolitan Board of Works. Even if it escapes the fate of becoming a Tammany, its utter inexperience seems to doom it indefinitely to an inevitable spell of blundering, inefficiency, and wastefulness. We believe the Government will be better advised. In making the County Council the authority for the metropolis it will be placing the coping-stone on to the great edifice of national education which the Act of 1902 has called into existence.

The suggestion that the educational system of London should be dismembered, and separately apportioned to its twenty-nine boroughs, Mr. Brereton regards as too preposterous to be seriously considered.

The World's Work has full-page portraits of President Roosevelt, Lord Curzon, the new Archbishop and Mr. Herbert Spencer, with a very interesting personal sketch of the last-named. Among the Editor's notes on the "March of Events" there is a passage on "Mr. Chamberlain's Diplomacy," of which the following is the conclusion:—

> On the whole we may say that up to the time of our writing the Colonial Secretary has used his opportunity well. He has grasped, not only the central points—that was to be expected—but also the opposite points of view, and has displayed a certain imaginative sympathy very rare in a nature like his. And, though not altogether free from the hackneyed formulæ of South African politics, he has as a rule attained to the persuasiveness that comes from obvious good will, and a determination to insist upon the best side of things.

Among the fully illustrated articles will be found one on "Manchester: its Canal, Cotton and Culture," and another on "Science in British Hospitals," with one specially attractive picture of the "Lilian Ward" for children, at St. Thomas's. In the article on "Arts and Crafts of To-day" there is a picture of the beautiful door of the Ullet-road Church, in copper repousseé, by Mr. R. Ll. B. Rathbone.

The Monthly Review has an illustrated article on "The Villa d'Este, Tivoli," and another on "Athene on Greek Coins."

SYSTEMATIC MORAL TEACHING.

IN reporting last week the annual meeting of the Moral Instruction League, we noted the issue of a graduated Syllabus of Moral Instruction for Elementary Schools, to the preparation of which great care has been devoted.

We are glad to reprint it here, and may add that suggestions for amending the syllabus will be welcomed by Mr. Harrold Johnson, Secretary of the League, at 19, Buckingham-street, Strand, W.C. There also specimen lessons of moral instruction are being given by capable teachers to a class of children on the first and third Monday of each month (up to May), at seven o'clock. The lesson is followed by discussion, and all are cordially invited.

This Syllabus is, of course, the barest skeleton, but the League has in view further publications of Notes on Moral Lessons, Specimen Lessons, Illustrative Matter, &c. In the preparation of the Syllabus the average ages of the scholars for the various standards have been assumed to be: Standards I., 7-8 years; II., 8 9 years; III., 9-10 years; IV., 10-11 years; V., 11-12; VI., 12-13 years; VII., 13-14 years.

AN OBSTINATE FALLACY.

SIR,—Granting Mr. Lummis's data I cordially endorse his conclusions. That is to say, if (as I am happy to be far from believing) Mr. Rudolf Davis or any considerable or influential party still existing amongst us "wishes to save our churches from future vagaries of doctrine by tying them up to present-day Unitarianism," then I frankly admit that the last thing we should do is to use a name which might identify us with such a position.

But if, on the other hand, we have practically unanimously moved on to the position always implied in every Unitarian movement, and now consciously avowed by us, that our ultimate faith is in "private judgment," or, as I prefer to call it, the divine within us, then why refuse to use a name already attached to us because we have changed its meaning—a fate common to all names? By so doing we lose not only a valuable historical asset, but a singularly significant and educational name—as Mr. Lummis himself would be first to claim — a name, indeed, first applied to describe, if I may say so, the doctrinal caterpillar, but which only reveals its full meaning when applied to the free-winged butterfly.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

THE twentieth annual meeting of contributors to the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends was held at Dr. Williams' Library, Gordon-square, on Wednesday afternoon, Feb. 11. The chair was taken by Mr. WILLIAM LONG, J.P., in the absence of the President, Mr. Harry Rawson, who had been at the morning meeting of management, but was obliged to return to Manchester. There were also present the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and J. E. Carpenter, Messrs. Edwin Clephan, Charles Harding, John Harrison, J. Cogan Conway, Edgar Chatfeild Clarke (treasurer), and Messrs. A. W. Worthington and Frank Preston (hon. secretaries). Apologies for absence had been received from the Revs. C. C. Coe and T. Thomas, Messrs. D. Martineau, P. J. Worsley, and Edwin Ellis.

Mr. WORTHINGTON read the annual report as follows:—

REPORT.

In presenting their twentieth annual report to the contributors the Board of Managers think that a brief account of the proceedings of the Fund since its establishment may prove interesting and possibly lead to its increase at the hands of liberal friends who may approve its operations.

The Fund was formally established on April 25, 1883. It was initiated by a paper read by your President, followed by a discussion, at the National Conference held at Liverpool in the preceding year. The first annual general meeting was held on Feb. 6, 1884, when it was reported that donations to the amount of £13,129 had been received, of which £10,017 19s. 6d. had been invested; and that an annual subscription list of £985 6s. had been promised, of which, however, a considerable proportion consisted of large sums, promised for a term of five years, and really to be regarded as donations. The managers considered that their grants should be made to congregations, by way of addition to the amount promised as stipend to their ministers; and that the grant in aid of each minister assisted should not be less than £20. At the first meeting a sum of £335 was divided among twenty congregations, whose services were conducted by fourteen ministers, some ministers having charge of two congregations. As the first year's report did not cover a complete year it may be well, for the purposes of comparison, to add the corresponding figures for the second year. Up to Dec. 31, 1884, the sum of £14,533 12s. had been invested; additional donations to the amount of £857 2s. 2d. had been received, and the annual subscription list reached £1,061 18s.; while grants of £767 10s. were made to forty congregations, under the charge of thirty-five ministers. With these figures may be compared those given in the present Report, which show invested funds to the amount of £23,459 11s. 3d., and an annual subscription which, now that the original five years' contributions have been completed, still reaches £390 13s. 6d.; while the managers were enabled to distribute £1,351 5s. among sixty-one congregations, served by fifty-six ministers.

This increase in the funds, and in the consequent grants of the Board, is the more gratifying because there is reason to hope that these grants have often stimulated, rather than checked, the liberality of the congregations themselves towards their ministers. Occasionally the managers have made a small increase in their grant conditional upon a corresponding effort on the part of the congregation; and, in almost every case, this condition has been complied with and the increased grant obtained.

Notwithstanding this increased income the managers still feel that their grants have hitherto been insufficient to meet the bare requirements of congregational needs. In 1902 the stipends of twenty-two ministers, exclusive of your grants, did not exceed £100 a year. In endeavouring to meet this difficulty the grants for the past year were made with some approach to manifest requirements, with the result that they exceeded those of the previous year by £98 15s. 5d., and absorbed about £147 1s. 10d. more than the year's income provided. But such a course cannot, in the nature of things, be repeated, and the managers appeal to the liberality of its friends to prevent the necessity of being called upon either to reduce the grants in the coming year or to draw upon their invested funds in order to maintain them at their present amount.

When the Fund originated it was intended to cover Great Britain and Ireland. It appeared that the Augmentation Fund exercised a similar function for all English counties north of the Trent. Negotiations were entered into with its managers, and they generously consented to increase their area by adding to it all counties touched by the southern bank of the Trent. Subsequently the ample funds provided for the benefit of Scottish congregations, by the bequest of Mr. McQuaker, relieved this Fund from the necessity of making grants in aid of needy congregations in Scotland. Thus the present field worked by the Sustentation Fund is limited to the southern half of England, to Wales and Ireland. Ireland, indeed, has its own Sustentation Fund, founded at the time when the Irish Church was disestablished, and the Regium Donum, previously distributed among the Presbyterian congregations, was partially capitalised in order to maintain the help it had hitherto afforded, and at present about a dozen congregations receive £60 each annually from this Irish Sustentation Fund, towards which they have subscribed at the rate of 4s. per sitting annually since the year 1872. But circumstances prevented many of the congregations from availing themselves of this advantage, and a sum of about £40 annually is collected in the Presbytery of Antrim for the benefit of two of these needy congregations; but a number of others have, from time to time, appealed for aid from your Fund. For many years your managers have made grants in what appeared to be deserving cases to an amount which has gradually increased to £160 in the last year. The Fund has, nevertheless, received but little support from Ireland, and the managers feel that they are entitled to claim assistance from the Irish congregations, and especially from their wealthier members. They hope that this claim will be recognised, and that the Fund may be supported by donations and increased subscriptions from that country.

There is little special to report with regard to the proceedings of the past year. The grants have been increased in number, and in several cases in amount. One congregation met the managers by raising locally the amount suggested as the condition of an increased grant, though another has, unfortunately, not yet been able to claim the addition. Several applications have been referred to the Augmentation Fund, as the congregations applying were situated in its area. A few applications have been delayed till further information was obtained. The acknowledgments received from congregations and ministers for the aid granted continue numerous, and are, in many cases, very gratifying. The list of congregations benefited is here added as follows:—

Some change has taken place in the list of officers during the past year. Mr. Rawson, the senior Secretary of the Fund since its formation, has taken his fitting place as its President. He has been succeeded in his secretarial duties by Mr. Frank Preston, a member of a family well known and appreciated among us. One of the retiring managers, Mr. George Brown, has expressed his desire not to be re-elected, and Mr. Cogan Conway has allowed himself to be nominated for election as his successor. We cannot mention Mr. Cogan Conway's name without expressing our deep sense of the debt due to him, and our own former President, Rev. J. E. Carpenter, for the indefatigable labours by which, with the aid of another member of our Board, Mr. David Martineau, they have established the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund on a wisely-planned and substantial foundation.

The Treasurer reports that the appointment of new Trustees has been completed, and that the investments have been transferred into their names. He was able, by some care and trouble, to accomplish this work at a very moderate cost.

We have only to add a tribute of respect to the memory of several deceased contributors. Among these, we may first mention the name of the Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., B.D., who was created an honorary contributor, as having handed over the bequest of a relative to the Fund. He was minister of one of the aided churches, and his early death has been a source of much regret and general sympathy. The obituary list includes the name of another honoured minister, the Rev. G. Vance Smith, B.A., Ph.D., D.D., who closed a long career of usefulness and distinction at the age of eighty-five, on Feb. 28, 1902; and also the names of Lady Bowring, of Exeter; Miss Emma Evers, of Stourbridge; Mrs. William Hollins, of London; and of four earnest and excellent laymen—Mr. William Rathbone, of Liverpool; Mr. F. S. Schwann, of Wimbledon; Mr. Frank Taylor, of Bolton; and Mr. Geo. L. Bristow, of London.

MR. E. CHATFEILD CLARKE, as treasurer, presented the accounts. The list of investments showed a total of £23,459 11s. 3d., as to which, according to current prices, there was an appreciation in value amounting altogether to £1,072 9s. 11d. Particulars of the accounts are included in the report. On a total of £1,579 0s. 3d., the balance of £316 12s. 2d. at the beginning of the year was reduced to £181 9s. 3d.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, apologised for the absence of the President, who had been with them for the work of the morning. As to the report, they had indeed a little overstepped their income, but they believed in spending all they had for the purposes of the Fund, and he was sure their supporters would be satisfied. At the same time, if they were to continue the work at its present level, they must have increased support.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, and unanimously carried.

On the motion of the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, seconded by Mr. JOHN HARRISON, the retiring managers, Messrs. E. Clephan, Charles Harding, William Long, David Martineau and Frank Preston were re-elected.

Mr. J. Cogan Conway was then elected a manager, in place of Mr. G. Brown, to whom thanks were tendered for his past services.

To Mr. Harry Rawson the thanks of the contributors were tendered for his services as President, and he was re-elected. The treasurer, Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, and the secretaries, Messrs. A. W. Worthington and Frank Preston were also re-elected, with warm acknowledgments of the value of their services to the Fund. Thanks were also accorded to Mr. E. W. Marshall, the hon. auditor, and to the trustees of Dr. Williams' Library, and to the chairman for his services, and the meeting terminated.

THE two companion volumes, "John Ploughman's Talk" and "John Ploughman's Pictures," homely discourses by the late C. H. Spurgeon, have been sold to the extent of 600,000 copies.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I WONDER whether any of you, in reading the Children's Column last week, or in thinking about it, have already discovered that whilst "Why?" is a good and "useful word just by itself," leading on to more and more knowledge, there are times when it is not good to say "Why?"

We may use it well and at right times, but if we use it wrongly or at wrong times, we misuse or abuse a good word.

First we should keep our "whys" for suitable times. Dinner-time, when dinner is ready and we are not, is scarcely the time to try to find out why we can wash our hands so much better in hot water than in cold, with soap than without. Bed-time, when we are told to be quick, is not just the time for star-gazing. It is easy to see that we should not wonder "Why?" when we ought to be doing something else.

And, of course, we must not be asking questions at all times, expecting others to be always ready to answer us. We must not be troublesome to others by asking too many questions.

Perhaps those who are tiresome through too frequent a use of "Why?" are just lazy or impatient and ask questions which, with a little effort and patience, they might answer for themselves. They think just enough to say "Why?" but not enough to try and find out the answer alone.

And if they are too lazy to really mean "Why?" to think "Why?" for themselves, they will probably be too lazy to remember the answers they receive from others.

To use "Why?" in this lazy or impatient way is to misuse it.

If we are asked to give up something we like—a game, or an interesting book—in order to do something else, perhaps an errand or some little service for somebody, the "why" in "Why need I?" is not a thinking "why" that really wants to find out. It is not truly a "why" at all, it is more like an "oh!" of impatience, of unreadiness, and might be spelt "Oh, bother!" That sort of "why," like the thoughtless lazy "why," is an abuse, not a use, of a good word.

A "why" often stands in the way of prompt obedience.

In the partridge story of Seton-Thompson, three of the brood come to an untimely end because when a new danger is near, these young ones wait to see the reason of their mother's cry "come." The obedient ones soon learn "why" through the untimely fate of their disobedient brothers.

For obedience is often the best way of finding out "why."

The strongest of the brood of little partridges was also the most obedient. His mother's warning "vrrr" (danger) did not always keep the others from a risky path or a doubtful food, but he never failed to obey her soft "kreet" (come). Having learnt through prompt obedience the why of all his mother's commands he became a very wise and experienced partridge. So he escaped dangers, and lived the longest of all the brood. When he was grown up his poor mate was shot whilst trying to lead a man with a gun away from her brood of young ones. Their father, thus left alone, brought up the baby partridges, and he had learned so well from his mother that he was able to teach his own young ones to obey and learn "why."

You know that for a soldier obedience is always the first duty, and perhaps you remember Tennyson's lines about the famous Light Brigade, when a command is given, and it is "Theirs not to reason why," but to obey.

Most children like to play at soldiers. Prompt obedience is a part of the game that children may well carry out of their "pretend" into their other lives. When duty calls it is "Theirs not to reason why" until the duty is fulfilled.

And then with obedience to duty in the first place there is still plenty of room for "whys" of the right sort in soldiers' lives and in ours too.

In the beautiful story of "The Settlers at Home," Miss Martineau tells us about a great flood long ago in the English Fen country, and about one of the Dutch families then settled there. The land round the Wash is very low and marshy, and it had been drained and made fit for use by these settlers from Holland, who had made embankments to keep back the sea and to keep the rivers from overflowing. In the time of the war between King and Parliament long ago, the flood-gates were opened, and the waters suddenly rushed over the land, spoiling the fields, gardens, and houses, and drowning many of the inhabitants.

Two children were busy in their garden, when the great flood came rushing along. Their father, on the steps of his mill, saw it coming, and shouted loudly to them to run up a little hill close to the garden. The girl obeyed at once without asking "Why?" She rushed up the hill, as if for her life; and only when she had reached the top did she turn to see why they had to run, and found that it was indeed for her life. The hill was like an island, the garden was now covered by a rushing river between the hill and the house, and the low country around was like one large sea.

The boy, who was older, was nearly caught. He was used to being obedient, but he did not see why he should not first save his cap which the wind had just blown away. How careful he was of other people's things, and of other people, too, in that time of danger and privation, and how they all helped one another, you can read in the book itself.

LILIAN HALL.

THE President and Treasurer of the London Provincial Assembly have issued an appeal on behalf of the little church at Walthamstow, which had its origin in the zeal of the late Rev. Robert Spears, and has not prospered as was hoped. Up to April of the present year a guarantee of £100 secured the services for twelve months of the Rev. W. H. Rose, and the signs of revival are such that the officers of the assembly are anxious to maintain the effort, and therefore ask for another £100 at least to cover the expenses up to April, 1904. Towards this amount Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, to whom the church already owes so much, has promised £25. Further subscriptions are invited, to be sent to the treasurer, Mr. John Harrison, 62, Christchurch-road, Tulse Hill Park, S.W.

THE TRUE WORSHIPPERS.

AFTER the chastening of a great war we had looked for far other fruit. The Christian World has once again opened its columns to a correspondence on "Our empty churches." Neither chastening nor orthodoxy will draw, and we may add, nor religion reduced to its greatest common measure. So, while the dog-days are still distant, the unmuzzled correspondents cast in their contributions of explanations, not of their superfluity, but all that they have, in their penury. The same archfoes are still leading on as the first great cause: the dull preachers and the poor pastors. Their stock of sermons falls dead, and no increase doth their dull husbandry improve: neither their frequent nor infrequent visits are imputed to them for righteousness. There is something pathetic in the spectacle of absentee church-goers hunting for reasons to explain their most cherished "ism," absenteeism. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat and yearns for the sermon that is an opiate, a soporific, or a stimulant. And the great popular preachers who supply these wares are not for all markets. The dull preachers are the edifying men; they are the builders, yes, the bricklayers; they are in the overwhelming majority. They know that they are not here to be either drugs, galvanic batteries, or "popular attractions." They are not Dominicans either in esse or in posse. The only Dominicans we have known have either founded a Gallican Church, espoused Unitarianism, or become Professors of Undenominational Colleges. And this may partly account for the scarcity of Dominicans. SAVONAROLA was accounted a dull preacher, we believe, until people scented the fagots and beheld a prospect of an auto da fé. The reasons for popularity, as for unpopularity, are many.

There is little to be gained, it is to be feared, from these stimulating correspondents threshing their vacant grain, which, no doubt like all other inanities, is well meant. They are for ever faint, or rather feeble, yet pursuing, lachrymose yet fulminant optimists, and will be while the world lasts total absentees, or, since a dull narcotic may act as an occasional stimulant, semi or semi-demi-absentees. The dullest man that ever lived and opened his mouth in parables or in anything else, is a more helpful brother than the man in the pew who cannot "abide him." He is trying! What are we here for but to be tried? And is it more trying than to know that the pews are filled with Christians whose chief virtue is impatience, or with those "who are with us in the spirit"? A Jewish preacher lately drew a distinction between Christian and Jewish ethics, saying that whereas the Jewish rule was, "Do good and you will feel good," the Christian rule was, "Feel good and you will do good." Can it be that he too has been reading the correspondents' columns, and trying to build up a system of Christianity out of a dry fragment of a bone of our bone, as Professor OWEN built up a megatherium out of a fragment of its bone? If that megatherium should awake in the resurrection would it be satisfied with its likeness? No, let "our churches" be empty rather than that it be said of any who profess and call themselves Christians that they cannot do good until their preachers and pastors make them "feel good." Ah! the strange development of modern Church life! The strange devices Churches are driven to to raise funds! And all to create machinery to make us "feel good"! Philanthropic bazaars, garden parties, concerts, however helpful temporarily, are after all but curious symptoms of the state of the Churches, revealing, not indeed exactly, that they are dead, but sleeping.

The fundamental mission of Christianity, it seems to us, was not to bring men to join in worship, but to seek and to save the lost, to aid the poor, the sinful, the neglected, the ignorant. Whatever the causes of poverty and its allies may be (and it seems increasingly certain that however equal and just the conditions and chances for men to work in may be, poverty there still would be from endless causes that have no political or economical origin whatever)—this was not the concern of Christians to know, but only out of their infinite resources—for love never faileth—to aid those living in poverty, neglect, and ignorance. It is possible so to transform the inner life as to make almost any conditions of life not only tolerable, but even sweet and holy. The evidence of early Christianity shows that the saintliest and sweetest lives often and generally flourished under the most depressing circumstances. When ministers of churches are no longer pestered by the gadflies of controversy and by the sapient inanities of their "candid friends," and become again more distinctly the medium for the bona fide Christian charity of the Churches,' and as Churches put themselves more and more in contact with agencies requiring help, we shall be returning to the truer origin of Christian Church life. The Early Christians did not meet so much to gain strength but to give strength, to be influences of help to all needing help. The modern Church system in which it seems necessary to have attractions to draw people to worship, and the minister is expected to pay pastoral calls as part of his duty (the maximum number to the absentees graduating down through the semi and semi-demi-absentees), and as part of the process of keeping congregations together, seems to us a fearful topsy-turvydom. The centre of worship is at home or in solitude: then with the divine inspiration so gained we should each come to radiate that inspiration in common worship. The word "Church" would come to its own: an assembly "for the Master," it says in tarnished Greek—to carry out his work in this world of much misery, suffering, and sorrow. It is our faith that the modern Church life with its woful system of attractions is doomed sooner or later to fail, that men will meet more and more in strong groups to consider the sufferings and ignorance and poverty of the world earnestly, prayerfully, and to devise means of genuine Christian help.

As crystal in solution will flow around any bit of thread or straw, and become transformed thereupon into a solid thing and a beautiful thing, so men bent on true Christ-like life will flow around any dull but genuine edifier, any "poor stick" of a minister would do, and they would become united, pure, solid, transparent, honourable, loving, lovable, and lovely, and the "poor stick" would be hid in the crystalline glory of his Church, as of old, and he will thank GOD for it in secret. Let the brother of low degree rejoice when he is so exalted.

CLERICAL VERACITY.

WE quoted last week from the sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG in Hope-street Church, on the third anniversary of Dr. MARTINEAU'S death, and published in the current number of Sermons for the Day. Speaking from that pulpit, consecrated by the closing years of Dr. MARTINEAU'S ministry in Liverpool, Mr. ARMSTRONG dwelt upon the great services he had rendered to philosophy and religion, and in conclusion laid special stress on the inestimable worth of the example he had set of uncompromising veracity in religious life and utterance, for which he held a position of perfect freedom, untrammelled by any doctrinal subscription, to be essential.

The statement of this principle, which involves that of an Open Trust as the foundation of healthy Church life, and Mr. ARMSTRONG'S vigorous endorsement of it, the Liverpool Daily

Post has taken up as a challenge in the field of ethical polemics. In a leading article in last Saturday's issue the position of the Broad Churchman is defended, and indeed gloried in, apparently without a single qualm, and MARTINEAU'S view of what is essential to religious veracity is characterised as "either fantastic or pusillanimous."

To all who are inclined to accept such a view we commend the study of MARTINEAU'S essay on the "Life and Letters of Dr. Arnold," which will be found in the Prospective Review, of February, 1845, and in the first volume of his collected Essays, Reviews, and Addresses, and especially the passages from pp. 50 to 61 of this latter volume. There MARTINEAU deals with ARNOLD'S attitude towards clerical subscription. One passage we will quote. Having referred to ARNOLD'S declaration that he did not believe the damnatory clauses in the Athanasian Creed, but yet read the creed, and was prepared to repeat his subscription to the article about it, MARTINEAU says :—

It is to be presumed that, in reading the creed, Dr. Arnold did not omit the "damnatory clauses." Then he publicly pronounced a most solemn anathema of which he did not believe a word! He asserted a thing to be "above all things necessary to salvation," which he did not suppose to be necessary at all! He warned many a hearer, that "without doubt he should perish everlastingly," apprehending all the while no danger whatsoever! Nothing surely but the terrible paralysis of custom could deaden a man's sense of the guilt of so great a mockery. Were he to hurry through his task lest he should be struck dumb in the midst, we should scarcely think it an unnatural superstition. Apart from all question as to the engagements made at his ordination, it is a shocking Jesuitry to maintain that a clergyman—instructor of the people's conscience and messenger of their prayers—need not assent to the promise or the curse he utters in the hour of worship, and may innocently invite his hearers to stand up with him before God, and take lying judgments upon their lips.

Now Sir EDWARD RUSSELL, who is Editor of the Liverpool Daily Post, has much less respect for the Athanasian Creed than Dr. ARNOLD had. In a book of his, "An Editor's Sermons," there is a chapter on Trinity Sunday, which, if we mistake not, once appeared as an article in the Liverpool Daily Post. There we read of the "prosaic, analytical impertinence" of the Athanasian Creed, and again :—

The right way to regard the Trinity is not the ridiculous mechanical—not even chemical—combinations of the "Athanasian" Creed (a mere relic of primitive sectarian brawlings and phenomenal imaginative metaphysics, but a devout perception of what the doctrine in its breadth and depth can do for the religious nature.

Yet apparently Sir EDWARD RUSSELL regards it as fantastic for anyone to object that a clergyman has no right to retain his position as religious teacher in a Church, pledged to the acceptance of such a creed, which he no longer believes to be true.

Indeed, the Daily Post article makes light of the advantage Dr. MARTINEAU possessed in his free pulpit, because he did not deviate far "from the Unitarian beaten track," while many Trinitarian preachers have gone much further from their orthodoxy, "regardless of their trust-deeds or signed confessions of faith," setting this down apparently to their credit. For while, in the Broad Churchman's view, a Church is perfectly justified in setting up doctrinal limitations, a clergyman is no less justified, so far as he dare avow it, in diverging in his public teaching from the creed to which he has pledged himself to conform. And in this we are assured there is no lowering of the standard of veracity, and no danger of any unworthy compromise. Thus it is of no consequence that a clergyman has signed the articles, and the Presbyterian minister has solemnly affirmed his acceptance of the Westminster Confession of Faith, which is the recognised doctrinal standard of his Church, although it contains doctrines which he does not in fact believe, if only in his preaching he makes it quite clear what he does believe. With these confident words the Daily Post article concludes :—

The noble history of the English Church illustrates in the most splendid manner how, without any drawbacks, and though ostensibly under the strictest limitations, daring free thought among the clergy may exemplify the widest range of honest opinion. And all this liberty being perfectly recognised, and, indeed, warranted by decisions of royal ecclesiastical jurisprudence, there is no insincerity whatever either in it or in the working of it. Up to now the operation of the Scottish spiritual courts has made equally for freedom, and the Scottish ministry has equally avoided insincerity.

But is there really no drawback, and no shadow of insincerity in that public profession of a creed, in the solemn act of worship, after which the clergyman boldly avows a different faith? The Athanasian Creed is doubtless the extreme case, but in the daily worship of the Church of England clergy and people together avow their belief in the Virgin birth, the descent into hell, and the resurrection of the body, in which many of them, we should be inclined to say the great majority, certainly do not believe. Shall we be told that it is of no consequence, that these also are "relics" of a bygone age, which people are not expected really to believe, and that the preacher in the pulpit has the courage of his opinions? But what standard of veracity does this imply? Does it really satisfy the common sense of business men, to which the Daily Post appeals?

The Broad Church position has led the conscience of very noble men into what to plain outsiders must seem strange vagaries. In this very article we are assured that the only common-sense method for a man, whether layman or divine, is "to have a firm resolution never to be unveracious, and to trust himself to speak out the truth, however inconvenient to himself or to others, whenever his conscience requires that he should do so." But what is that clerical conscience doing with the requirements of veracity, which allows a man to disregard the pledges, which are the condition of his holding office in his Church, and worse still, leaves him without intolerable shame to stand up before GOD and man, in the most sacred act of worship, solemnly to declare "I believe" what he does not believe? And what is the layman's conscience doing, that is content to leave things so, without protest and without effort for reform, in a Church which claims to represent what is noblest and highest in our national life?

MARTINEAU'S way, we confess, appears to us the better; but of this, and of the full significance of the Open Trust in our Church life, of which the Liverpool Daily Post thinks so poorly and shows so imperfect an apprehension, we must take another opportunity to speak.

THE "NON CON CLUB."

"MAN," says Addison, in the ninth number of the Spectator, "is said to be a sociable animal, and, as an instance of it, we may observe that we take all occasions and pretences of forming ourselves into those little nocturnal assemblies which are commonly known by the name of clubs."

Nor have we altered in this respect since the days of Queen Anne. Clubs come and go, but still we dine and still we debate, and, perhaps, while new clubs are being formed, it may not be inopportune to recall some memories of an old one, which by this time, perhaps, is almost forgotten. There are probably very few now living who have attended the meetings of the Non Con Club, which was founded in 1817, and finally dissolved in 1852.

Its object is thus set forth in the old minute-book :—

To promote the great principles of Truth and Liberty as avowed and acted upon by the enlightened and liberal Nonconformists or Protestant Dissenters from the Church of England.

Its founder was the Rev. Robert Aspland; for thirty-five years its meetings were regularly held once a quarter, and its muster-roll contains the names of men whose memories we shall always honour. The fellowship, limited to twenty, began with twelve members—Robert Aspland, Edgar Taylor, W. Johnson Fox, I. N. Talfourd, Christopher Richmond (secretary), Dr. Morell, Dr. Bowring, Samuel Parkes, John Taylor, George Smallfield, Richard Taylor, and Dr. Rees. In later years we see, among many others, the names of Southwood Smith, Edwin Wilkins Field, Algernon Sydney Aspland, the Rev. Edward Tagart, Henry Crabb Robinson, the Rev. Thomas Madge, James Stansfeld, Dr. Thomas Sadler, and William Arthur Case.

The procedure of the Club may be gathered from a few of the Rules.

Rule 2. The Club shall meet four times a year, in the months of January, March, June, and November.

Rule 3. That dinner shall be on the table at five o'clock precisely.

Rule 4. The following standing toasts to be given by the Chairman:—The Memory of the Two Thousand—John Milton—Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over.

Rule 7. The subscription of Town Members to be £1 per annum, and every member present to pay seven shillings towards the dinner bill. Honorary members, when present, to pay ten shillings and sixpence each.

Rule 14. The meetings in November, January and March to be held in London, and the meeting in June somewhere in the country.

The earlier minute-books are probably lost; the records in the present writer's possession date from 1828 onward, and are almost entirely written by the hand of A. S. Aspland. In that year, then, the Club meetings were held at the Horn Tavern in Doctors' Commons (we have forsaken taverns for restaurants in these luxurious days), and in 1832 the headquarters were moved to the London Coffee Tavern, Ludgate-hill, a house which for some time was managed by the father of John Leech, the artist. Nine years later, the "Crown and Anchor" in the Strand was the rendezvous, and there the Club remained for eight years, moving in 1848 to the Freemasons' Tavern, where the final meeting was held. But for the June dinners, when festivity was the order of the day, and business was laid aside, the Non Cons went further afield, to such rural retreats as the Star and Garter at Richmond, the Mermaid at Hackney, or the India Dock Tavern, Blackwall. Members gathered in full force on these occasions, and guests were made welcome, so that the table was often laid for upwards of forty diners; while in order to guard against any unseemly protraction of the sitting (or perhaps to allow time for a little extra merriment) dinner was ordered for four, instead of five o'clock. The tables cleared, followed speeches, many and eloquent; quite a grove of sentiments wreathed the wine cups, and songs were sung and applauded, too, for the Non Cons had an honest love of harmony, which it is to be hoped their descendants have not altogether lost. The principal singers appear to have been recruited from the Taylor family, and the favourite song, in good keeping with the principles of the Club, was "Fall Tyrants, Fall." But on one glorious occasion, a new member, Mr. Edward Taylor, delighted the company with an original ditty of his own composition, which was ordered to be entered upon the minutes. Here are a few of the verses:—

Let others the deeds of proud warriors rehearse,
The carnage they've made, and the battles they've won,
Of heroes more noble, more peaceful we sing,
Though each was at best but a simple Non Con.

Their watchword was Freedom—fair Truth was their guide,
For Liberty's cause and their own was but one,
Shall patriots like these be forgotten? Ah no—
Then pass round the glass to each honest Non Con.

'Mongst our worthies, of whom a long list I could give,
One MILTON there was—and his name, I think, John,
Lived in Cripplegate Ward, and wrote "Paradise Lost,"
What was he, my good friends, but a sturdy Non Con?

And PRIESTLEY, who courted each science in turn,
'Twas gas or 'twas Greek, as the fancy was on,
Though philosophy showered her gifts at his feet—
After all, he was but a poor preaching Non Con.

A capital song, if rather lengthy; several verses are here omitted, including one which contains some rather pointed remarks addressed to "Archbishops and Bishops and Prebends so fat," which, perhaps, savour a little of intolerance.

Dulce est desipere in loco; the June dinner was evidently a very jolly affair. But heartily as the Non Con Club could give itself up to merriment on occasion, its members were equally strenuous in forwarding the objects for which they were banded together. One of the earliest entries in the minutes for 1828 records the election of a committee to forward Catholic Emancipation, and the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. The two latter enactments were abolished very shortly afterwards, and within a year Catholic Emancipation had come. It was at the June Meeting of 1829 that "the new era of religious liberty introduced by the Act removing the stigma of exclusion from Roman Catholics was hailed by the company, and several toasts and sentiments given from the chair in accordance with the prevailing feeling."

The "Unitarian Marriage Bill" occupied the Club's attention for some time in the latter part of 1829, and we hear of it again later. But that, and the question of expunging from the Prayer-book the Gunpowder Plot, Martyrdom and Restoration services, together with a petition from the Club in favour of the revision of the laws relating to stamps on literary publications, were all overshadowed by the great agitation for Parliamentary Reform.

The passing of Earl Grey's Reform Bill was celebrated by the Club in January, 1833; but the minutes for this meeting are particularly noteworthy as containing a fine eulogy on the late secretary, Christopher Richmond, who had died a short time before.

He was always ready (wrote Mr. Aspland), notwithstanding an habitual retiringness, the result of modesty, to give his professional services in aid of any of the public measures contemplated or assisted by the Club. Cheerfully did he co-operate, as far as his labour could be useful, with the legal advisers of our Roman Catholic brethren, in facilitating the measure of their emancipation. . . .

While, therefore, we lament the loss of such a friend and coadjutor, we take leave of him with satisfaction in his character and unfeigned respect for his memory; resolving to persevere in the same course which has justly entitled him to this inadequate, but sincere eulogium on his unspotted and honoured name.

Mr. Richmond's office was filled by Algernon Sydney Aspland, who continued to act as secretary and treasurer till the dissolution of the Club, twenty years later.

ROBIN ROSCOE.

THE REVOLT FROM ROME.

UNDER this startling title notices have appeared from time to time in various papers, and some interest has been excited among the general public. We do not think that anything of real importance has happened in this country, or is in the least likely to happen. In the first place the so-called movement has apparently one and only one representative among the Anglo-Roman clergy—viz., the Rev. Richard O'Halloran, of Ealing. True, another priest, Father Beale, associated himself for a very brief space with the revolt, but he soon thought better of it and has returned to his old allegiance. In the second place, Father O'Halloran, so far as we are aware, is absolutely unknown to fame; he has written nothing; he has made no mark as a preacher; he never would, in the natural course of things, have come to the front. Father Beale has no better claim to distinction, and no layman of mark has lifted a finger to defend either of these ecclesiastics. Last of all, and worst of all, Father O'Halloran has put his case before the public in a letter to the Cardinal Prefect of Propaganda printed in last week's London papers. It is the work of an Irishman, not of an ecclesiastical lawyer. It is, indeed, hard to conceive a more futile plea than that which Father O'Halloran advances, with pompous references to canons which have no possible connection with his case. Of the personal attacks on Cardinal Vaughan we say nothing, except that even if they are true, they are not to the point. We should not lose time in discussing this trumpery case, were it not that some of our readers may be glad to learn a little about the constitution of the Anglo-Roman Church. And for this purpose Father O'Halloran's quarrel with his bishop will be a convenient text.

Till 1850 English Romanists were governed by Vicars Apostolic. The English sees from a Roman point of view had been vacant since the death of the last bishop who refused to accept the Reformation settlement. All power had therefore lapsed to the Pope, and accordingly he put the English Roman Catholics under a succession of Archpriests. Then came two bishops who took their title from the See of Chalcedon, and a third who was nominal bishop of Adrumetum. These men acted in succession as Vicars Apostolic of England. In the reign of James II. four Vicars Apostolic were appointed, one for each of the four districts into which England was then divided, and in 1840 the number of these districts was doubled. Now these Vicars Apostolic had no ordinary jurisdiction. They were mere delegates of the Pope, possessing just so much power as he chose to give, and removable at his mere good pleasure. Still less, of course, were the priests under them, parish priests holding their benefices as freeholds. England was regarded as a missionary country. The Vicars Apostolic were bishops in order, and could therefore confirm and ordain. But they had no sees, except nominal ones. The canon law was in great measure inapplicable, and we may compare England, as it then appeared to Roman eyes, with a crown colony, which is further governed by martial law.

In 1850 the hierarchy was restored—i.e., bishops were appointed with English sees and ordinary jurisdiction. Like all other Roman bishops they were subject to the Pope, but he could not remove them except for grave reasons. Here, however, the change stopped. Dr. Coffin, who died some eighteen years ago, used to say, "I am the only parish priest in my diocese," and this was simply an accurate statement of the fact. Priests who in popular language govern parishes, strictly speaking do nothing of the sort, because no parishes have been instituted. They are mere delegates of their bishop. The bishop appoints: the priests have no power to absolve save in virtue of faculties granted by the bishop and renewed from time to time, nor can they lawfully administer any other sacrament or preach except by the bishop's delegated authority. True, the bishop selects a few priests to whom he gives the title of missionary rectors, and who cannot be moved from their sphere of labour without canonical reason. Otherwise the bishop is absolute. The bishop has also a perfect right to deprive a secular priest of his mission and hand it over to religious. This has been constantly done. Every priest who is ordained knows quite well that he accepts work on these conditions. No doubt the bishop to whose diocese he belongs is bound to provide him with labour and the means of livelihood; but it is for the bishop, and the bishop alone, to say what and where that work is to be.

We cannot see, therefore, that Father O'Halloran has any semblance of a case. It is quite another question whether this state of things is good. We believe that it is good neither for the bishop nor the clergy. The system makes the bishop an autocrat. He is not likely to hear the truth, and the clergy are not protected as they may fairly desire to be. There are signs of the discontent which the system causes and of a desire for reform. The Catholic Times, a very orthodox and popular journal, has given a qualified and cautious opinion in favour of reform. There is another evil connected with the present plan which deserves notice. It substitutes government by caprice for subjection to uniform law. Some bishops are so kindly or so timid that they shrink from interference even in cases which urgently demand it. Others are such martinets that their clergy are never left in peace. It is only fair to say that the present writer's experience leads him to believe that bishops are generally prudent and kind. Certainly he himself, during twenty-two years spent in the Roman Church, never found the considerate and paternal kindness of his superiors fail him. He thinks of them now with affectionate respect.

Another want is beginning to be felt: there is a desire that the laity should have some part in the financial administration of their various churches. Fifteen years ago (and we are not aware of any change) all money received for seat-rents, Christmas and Easter offerings, collections at Sunday mass (except, of course, on the rare occasion of collection for some special purpose) belonged absolutely to the priest. From these receipts he had to defray the expenses of the ceremonial, to keep the church and his parsonage in good repair, to pay taxes, &c. But he had to produce no balance-sheet. In many dioceses the episcopal visitation took place very seldom, and the present writer can testify that for ten years during which a mission was in his sole care, the bishop held no single visitation. Even the accounts of money collected for a new church, amounting to about £3,000, were never audited. In one case at least serious difficulty arose on a priest's death because he had in perfectly good faith banked a large sum collected for church-building in his own name. The fact is that despite the credit which the Roman Church enjoys for organisation, in England at least this organisation is conspicuously absent. In one respect a change is at hand, though it has come not from within but from without. Henceforth the new Education Act will make it impossible for any priest to be the sole manager of his elementary school.

LONDON GUILDS' UNION.

THE inauguration of the London Guilds' Union took place on Wednesday evening at Essex Church, when the five London guilds already associated with the National Conference Guilds' Union, viz., Mansford-street, Stepney, Highgate, Stratford, and Essex Church, were well represented, the attendance numbering about 120, chiefly of young people.

Service was held in the church at half-past seven, conducted by the Rev. Gordon Cooper, the "Fourth Service" being used, and a stirring address was given by the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference Guilds' Union, from the words, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ." The address was a plea for heroism, even amid the commonest and most depressing conditions of everyday life. Referring to what he regarded as the depressing teaching of George Eliot's "Middlemarch" and its insistence on the crushing effect of "the meanness of opportunity" in modern life, Mr. Wood protested that the Christ-like character could triumph even over the meanest circumstances, and they constantly saw in every-day life how that could be done. Heroism, he said, was not the doing of conspicuous and brilliant things, it was the doing of things, whether small or great, in which there was the denial of self, and the willingness to serve and take upon oneself the lowliest tasks.

"Forward be our watchward" was the concluding hymn.

At the conclusion of the service the company adjourned to the schoolroom below, where refreshments were provided, and at nine o'clock the business meeting was held. The Rev. F. K. FREESTON took the chair, supported by the Revs. Joseph Wood, J. Ellis, and T. E. M. Edwards.

The CHAIRMAN reported greetings, on behalf of their guilds, from the Revs. J. J. Wright, E. D. Priestley Evans, and H. S. Solly, and a message from Mr. T. J. Hardy, who had just established a guild at Richmond, and regretted that he was unable to be present. He then offered the warm thanks of the members to Mr. Wood for his sermon.

The Rev. J. ELLIS read the draft of rules for the London Guilds' Union, and moved their adoption. This was seconded by Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON, and unanimously agreed to.

The second rule states the objects of the Union as follows:—

The objects of this Union shall be:—1. To promote the formation of guilds in connection with the London churches on the roll of the National Conference, which seek to (a) foster the religious life and (b) inspire personal service.

2. To unite such guilds into a local union for closer fellowship and co-operation.

3. To carry out this object by means of united services, conferences, social meetings, or any other methods which may suggest themselves.

The annual meeting is to held in October, and united meetings in January, April, and July.

The eighth rule reads:—

The duties of the Committee shall be to advise the local guilds in any difficulty, to manage the funds of the Union, to make known the guild idea, to arrange services, conferences, and social meetings, to prepare the business of the annual meeting, and generally to promote the objects of the Union.

Mr. H. J. NOEL proposed and Mr. C. A. GINEVER seconded the appointment of the officers as follows:—President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston; Vice-President, Mr. A. Thompson; Treasurer, Mr. Edgar Noel; Secretary, the Rev. J. Ellis.

At the conclusion of the business, an address was given by the Rev. Henry Gow, on "What Young People Can Do for the Church," followed by a number of short speeches from members, and a delightful and most encouraging meeting was brought to a close.

MR. GOW'S ADDRESS.

One reason, he said, why the minister was eager to welcome the young people was that they were critical idealists, often perhaps more critical than idealists, and yet criticism in them rested on a great idealism. They had high ideals of worship and of life, and could not be content with the common-place, middle-aged performances they saw around them. They believed that great and noble things could be accomplished, and had not yet realised the difficulties. That was a great help for the work of life, and ministers rejoiced to have such young idealists around them, always eager to advance. They were peculiarly susceptible to an heroic appeal. Not a call to an easy simply pleasant life, but to a difficult heroic life was what they wanted. The great strength of the High Church ideal at the present time was in the severe demands it made, with the glamour of the Cross about it. And they, for their part, must make it felt that religion meant a great deal of sacrifice, and was worth it. The call was not to a comfortable religion, but to a hard, heroic task, and to that the young people would respond.

As to the ways in which the Young People could help the Church, he named first Belief in the Worship of the Church. They could make efforts for that, there was even room for a little heroism in it. There were too many "Weather-and-comfort-permitting" people. They must be worshipful in spirit, and not lightly break a custom and tradition of the utmost value to the world and to themselves. And if, as was often the case, it was right for hard-worked people to use the Sunday to get out into the country, he would yet plead with them, at least somewhere, whether in a little country church or Bethel, to secure the quiet hour for worship.

Then they could help the Church, by being friendly and refusing to believe in the atmosphere of coldness said to be in some of the Churches. He believed that unforced self-forgetful, cheery kindliness always met with its reward and welcome.

And they must find work, whether in

Sunday-school, mission, or club. They should offer suggestions for work, but at the same time always offer help.

Lastly, he insisted that they must care also for the intellectual side of things, and think their own thoughts on the great questions of God and the soul, of life and death. The minister was not in the pulpit to think for them. They who were in contact with the actual experience of a working life must take their part in the thinking out of true thought of God and life and the soul, which should appeal to the world and all the Churches, and take up into itself all that was best in the past, the noblest thought and feeling of all sects and all classes. They must have a share in working out the theology of the future.

UNITARIANISM AND PUBLIC WEAL.

IN the Provincial Letter which I wrote for THE INQUIRER a few weeks ago I made some reference to the work which Unitarians were doing in a variety of public ways, and the lack of recognition which we as Unitarians gave to the fact. We are sadly wanting in esprit de corps, and are not sufficiently stirred by the examples of honourable service which are set us by members of our own household of faith. We in this Manchester district at any rate feel that something must be done to rectify this, and to let our young men and women know how devoted so many of our fellow-members are to the advancement of all that pertains to the public welfare. In your last issue, for instance, there was a notice of the great honour recently conferred upon Alderman Rawson by the City of Manchester. There is no greater honour in its power to bestow than the Honorary Freedom of the City. Mr. Rawson was born in Manchester more than eighty years ago, and has lived all his life in that city; and has so lived and worked that he has won highest honour in it. There is scarcely any branch of public activity in which he has not at some time or other been engaged, and his work has always been of a most unselfish and painstaking kind. I had the pleasure of being present at the impressive ceremony at the Town Hall when the Honorary Freedom of the City of Manchester was conferred upon Mr. Crossley and Mr. Rawson, men esteemed and revered by all who know them. I felt proud of Mr. Rawson as a fellow-citizen, but prouder of him as a fellow-Unitarian, because I believe it is a man's religion that determines his worth either in private or public. The City of Manchester has only conferred this honour as yet upon twelve people. Four out of the twelve are Unitarians, and a fifth has deliberately put it on record that the public service he has been able to render to the community was inspired by the Unitarian influences under which he was reared in his youth. Are these facts mere coincidences? Are they not rather what you would expect where other conditions are favourable? We are a small community even here in Manchester, and yet out of its twelve most honoured citizens (nay, only eleven, for one upon whom the honour was conferred was not a citizen, but a great explorer) four are Unitarians! This same afternoon the annual meeting of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was held in the Memorial Hall, and Mr. F. Monks, who was in the chair, referred to the ceremony previously held in the Town Hall, and expressed a wish that it were possible to induce Mr. Rawson to write a book setting forth the eminent and faithful public service which so many of our household of faith have rendered in all parts of the country. It would be such an incentive to our young men, to themselves aim at noble service for the genuine benefit of mankind, that its value could not be estimated.

I have often been surprised at the ignorance displayed by many Manchester Unitarians as to the public work being done by members of our district churches. One often hears of what was done in the old days, when, of course, there were giants. I was talking to a friend only the other day about this matter, and he said that he remembered the time when on Sundays he was accustomed to see worshipping in Cross-street Chapel at the morning service the two members of Parliament for the city, the Mayor of the city, and a number of other public men. It was in those days, too, that the Unitarian collection for the Hospital Sunday Fund was larger than any other. In those days there was a denominational pride—of which there is a healthy as well as an unhealthy kind — and men and women seemed intent upon carrying the spirit of their religion into their everyday life, and as fellow-Unitarians they stimulated and encouraged one another not only by their precept and example, but also by their comradeship. They took a pride in each other's public work. When honour was conferred upon one they felt that it reflected upon all. Things are not quite so much like that nowadays, and no doubt there are many reasons for the fact, but it is being felt that the change is for the worse. We still talk about those old times, so much so that our critics say we are content to live on the glory of our ancestry, and forget the obligations and possibilities of the present day. This is an exaggeration, but there is some truth in it. Indeed, far more than there ought to be. The influence of Unitarians upon their respective communities has been out of all proportion to their numbers, and probably is still, only, somehow, we are not helped to realise the fact as we might be.

When one talks about Unitarians combinedly showing their recognition of the special public service of one of their number, one is met with the retort—"O, your object is to glorify a sect." The result is that our manhood does not feel the incentive of religious effort that it ought to, and our young people are not stirred by the spirit of emulation as they might be. This state of affairs tells upon our corporate Church life detrimentally in more ways than one. Those who know most about our congregations say that the absence of men from the services is becoming more and more conspicuous. The cause is not far to seek. Men are asking nowadays, "What are the Churches doing towards ameliorating the conditions of social life?" They fail to see the nexus between the Church and the world. It may be largely their own fault; but they surely could not say so if their attention were persistently drawn to the uplifting, reforming work which their co-religionists have done and are still doing, civically and nationally; and this forced recognition would without doubt act as an incentive, and would result in a large increase in the number of public-spirited Unitarians.

Anyhow, this may or may not be so; but it is no use having a theory unless you test it, and we are going to test it here in Manchester. Perhaps we are mistaken —we are going to find out if possible. We have faith in the efficacy of our religion to save society, if only it gets a fair chance, and can be properly understood. It made Jesus the man that he was, and its possibilities are not less but greater to-day. And so the Manchester District Association is organising a "Mass Meeting for Men" in the Memorial Hall on Friday evening, March 13, when the subject for discussion will be twofold—namely, "Organisation and Co-operation in Church Life" (to be opened by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.), and "The Relation of that Life to Civic and Social Uprightness" (to be opened by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A.). Already a full dozen J.P.'s, Aldermen and Councillors (Town and County) have expressed sympathy with the objects of the meeting, and promised if possible to attend and take part in it. We feel that our church life must stand for something more practical than mere dreams of the New Jerusalem in the minds of men and women who are hard beset with the chequered experiences of life. Of course we know that their misgivings of its indifference or its impotence are sad delusions; but we want to have it out with as many as we can get together, and, if possible, show them their mistake and remove their difficulties, and enlist them once again in enthusiastic religious comradeship. It is lamentably sad to compare what is being done in our churches with what might be done if only we could get our men into harness, and inspire them with the importance and extent of the opportunities which present themselves. If example be better than precept, if there be any good in emulation, if association with public men who are putting their religion into practice is capable of inspiring others, then why should we not work for all it is worth such a scheme as I have sketched in this article?

CHARLES ROPER.

EXCURSION TO HUNGARY.

SIR,—Since I sent the letter which you were good enough to publish last week I have received a communication from his Excellency Gabor de Daniel, Vice-President of the House of Deputies, in which he informs me that the people of Hungary will be delighted to receive another party of English excursionists, and that the Carpathian Society will have much pleasure in doing their very best to make the tour agreeable.

He also says that the Government has promised permission for the party to visit any of the State gold-mines which they may desire to inspect, and that he is looking forward to the pleasure of assisting once more to welcome my friends and myself.

I shall be glad to receive, as soon as possible, answers to the questions stated last week. W. H. SHRUBSOLE.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

THERE is nothing very startling to record in connection with the twenty-eight congregations included in this district. Changes have taken place amongst the workers, but the work has gone on much the same, in a spirit of dogged perseverance. On the whole the congregations seem to be in a hopeful mood, though none have an easy task. I was struck by a sentence in the Provincial Letter from the Eastern counties, in THE INQUIRER of the 7th inst., in which the writer remarks on the isolation of the ministers of the several congregations. Such isolation exists in this district, though to a less degree. Preston and Lancaster are too far off for the ministers there to find it easy to meet their brethren further south. And several of the congregations are doing outpost duty with but little opportunity of support from their friends in other towns. It is only in the south of the district that the sense of companionship in a common work is quickened by the nearness of Manchester, Bolton, and Bury. For the most part, our congregations have to go their own way and depend on their own resources, and generally they do it very well.

In reckoning up the ministerial changes that have taken place since I last reported on this district, I am not sure whether in my previous letter I mentioned the removal of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin from Leigh to Sheffield. Mr. Dolphin came to Leigh at a most critical time in the history of that congregation, when a storm of exceptional severity had shaken it to its foundations. He came in as peacemaker, to build and to plant; and it is not too much to say that the future existence, let alone the welfare, of the Leigh church depended on him. As the result of his ministry, the congregation is now harmonious and prosperous, and stronger than it has ever been before. We are sorry to lose Mr. Dolphin from this district, and we can only congratulate the Sheffield congregation upon their acquisition. His place is taken by the Rev. R. S. Redfern, formerly of Crewe, who has already made a good beginning at Leigh, and there seems every prospect that the congregation there will thrive under his leadership.

At the other end of the district we have lost the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, from Padiham. That is a serious loss, for Mr. Wicksteed's ability and character gave him a commanding position as the head of an influential congregation. He will be much missed, and while we know he will do excellent work in London we are very sorry he has felt it his duty to leave us. For the present the Padiham pulpit is vacant, and the friends there will be fortunate if they get a man to fill it as well as he did.

But if we have to record losses we can also record gains. The place long filled by the Rev. Thomas Leyland at Colne is now occupied by the Rev. Robert McGee, who was till recently minister of an Independent church in Darwen. Already the congregation at Colne, which had to some extent suffered through the unavoidable disorganisation caused by the illness and retirement of Mr. Leyland, has recovered its tone, and is hard at work again. We hope that Mr. McGee will find amongst the members of our churches, not only in Colne but elsewhere, a welcome and a sympathy which will make it less hard to have severed his old connection.

The name of Rawtenstall has appeared before now in THE INQUIRER, and will, perhaps, be remembered with feelings not altogether kind by some of your readers. It is pleasant to be able to report that the unsatisfactory state of things, which lasted some four years, is now at an end. The vacant pulpit, previously occupied by a kind of permanent supply, has now been filled by the appointment of the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, formerly of Pendleton. Rawtenstall is one of the churches assisted by the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, and, in view of recent history, I think it well to state that the new appointment was made with the full approval of the Mission Committee, and to express the hope that those who have thought a little hardly of Rawtenstall will "remember not past years."

Burnley is still without a minister; but is certainly neither dead nor asleep. The Calendar for February contains a preliminary announcement of a scheme which may have important results, and of which we shall hope to hear more shortly. "The idea is to form a circuit in our immediate district, with fewer ministers than churches, thus at once reducing the financial strain, increasing our efficiency for practical work, and offering increased facilities for the development of lay-preaching." I have no details of the scheme before me, but the idea is well worth reporting, and if it is to be worked into practical shape there are those in Burnley who are well able to do it.

I have, I think, mentioned before now the congregation at Halliwell-road, Bolton. It was founded as a mission from Bank-street Chapel, and is still connected therewith. It has grown wonderfully in its very few years of existence, and seems to have a prospect of vigorous life before it. It is in future to be known as the Halliwell-road Free Church, and it has been affiliated to the N. and E.L. Mission. These are steps on the way towards independence, and steps which have been carefully considered. The mission makes no annual grant to the Halliwell-road Church, but has extended to it the right to share in certain benefits offered to the seven assisted churches in its district.

The question of giving those assisted churches a lift on the way towards independence, and at the same time to set the resources of the Mission free for new work, has taken up a great deal of the time and thought of the Committee for a year past. They have worked out a scheme for accomplishing both those objects, and will shortly make it public. At present I will only say that the original idea of it was suggested by their former chairman, the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, and is not the least of the benefits which he bestowed on the churches in this district.

I do not think of anything else noteworthy in the work of these churches, unless it be that two of them, those at Ainsworth and Stand, have adopted the Revised Essex Hall Hymnal, in place of what is commonly called the Old Martineau, and are much pleased with the new book. That is a small matter; but it has just this much of general interest, that other churches may find, as these two have already found, a marked increase of heartiness and freshness in the service, by adopting this hymn-book, which is proving itself to be a very good one.

I do not act on the suggestion made to me to report on the state of things created by the new Education Act in this district, as I have not the expert knowledge necessary for an adequate treatment of the subject. Much is being done; and I hope that someone qualified, as I am not, to deal with it will present the subject to the readers of THE INQUIRER.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Chorley.—The Rev. A. Doel has just finished a course of open lectures on "The Christianity of Jesus as shown in his Life and Teachings," which have been greatly appreciated.

Liverpool: Hamilton road.—At the monthly fellowship meeting held after evening service on Sunday, 8th inst., Mr. White, the treasurer, who was supported by Mr. J. D. Thomas, in a few well-chosen remarks, on behalf of the members, presented to the Rev. J. L. and Mrs. Haigh a silver tea service as a token of good will on the occasion of their marriage. Mr. and Mrs. Haigh suitably replied. Musical items were rendered by the Misses Larkin and Scott, Messrs. A. B. White and Ward, and were much appreciated by the large number present

Liverpool: Hope-street (Appointment).—The Rev. H. D. Roberts, missionary minister for the Liverpool District Missionary Association, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Hope-street Church congregation to become associated with the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the ministry of the church as second minister.

London: Forest Gate.—On Monday afternoon the monthly Conference of the London Ministers was held, by special invitation, at the Unitarian Hall, Upton-lane, and in the evening a public meeting was held, and prepared addresses given to an audience of about eighty persons, more than half of them being men, whose attention was most marked throughout. The Rev. F. K. Freeston spoke on "Religious Liberalism: its Method and Aim." He gave a careful analysis of the claims of the dogmatic and traditional Churches on the one hand, compared with those of the progressive fellowships on the other, and went on to vindicate our movement against gainsayers who sneer at its supposed lack of strong conviction. The Rev. Henry Gow followed with an exposition of "Some Results of Free Religious Inquiry," in the course of which he discriminated between the negative and corrosive style of so-called "free-thought" speculation and the reverent research of our time, so fraught with intellectual and moral good—not to the individual student alone, but also to the common life. Democracy meant that, spite of liability to error, especially in the unripe stages of self-government, the popular heart was sounder than the dictates of class-interest and privilege were likely to be; and so in religion, trust in man as divinely constituted ensured a higher type of virtue and piety than submission to theological tyranny and priestly tutelage. The third address, by the Rev. H. S. Perris, on "Church Life and Work, in view of Twentieth Century Needs," opened with an interesting historical retrospect; the imposing religious displays of 500 years ago, and the unbroken unity and practically unanimous assent to Catholic doctrine and practice, being contrasted with the variety of modern thought and life, as manifested in this world of London. The speech was a sustained plea for reality and earnestness in a time of easy indifference to spiritual claims, partly attributable to the unyielding methods and unfruitful rivalries of the sects, but also largely due to half-thinking and a plentiful lack of seriousness in these gain-pursuing and pleasure-loving days. The Rev. H. W. Perris, who presided, spoke very hopefully of the congregational progress. Opening and closing hymns were heartily sung, and the anthem, "God is a Spirit," was finely rendered by four of the members.

London: Islington.—At the annual meeting of members of Unity Church, the following resolution was carried unanimously:—"The members of Unity Church having heard the letters addressed by Dr. Hicks to the treasurer, feel with profound regret that they have no alternative but to accept his resignation of the pulpit. They cannot, however, take this step, so full of important issues to them, without expressing their deep sense of the value of Dr. Hicks's pulpit services and the high spiritual and educational value of his ministry. They congratulate him upon the success of the Hibbert Journal, and trust that he will soon obtain an appointment which will enlist his full sympathies."

London: Peckham.—On Saturday last a concert, under the direction of Miss Carter, was given in the schoolroom of the Avondale-road Church in aid of its funds. There was a large and appreciative audience, and a substantial addition was made to the church funds. Among others who kindly rendered assistance were Mme. E. Hastings Warren (at one time organist at Peckham), who received most hearty tokens of recognition, and Messrs. Hugh and Ivor James and S. T. Lock (members of the Wandsworth Church), whose valuable services at Peckham on former occasions were evidently not forgotten. On Wednesday the Sunday scholars' annual tea and prize distribution took place, when there was a large gathering, and in the course of the evening some of the children performed the musical play of Dick Whittington and his Cat. The prizes were distributed by the minister.

Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.—The sixth visit of the Governing Body was paid in response to an invitation received from the Pendleton congregation on Saturday last. At 3.30 service began, conducted by the Rev. E. Atack; the Rev. Charles Roper preached. The day was not a favourable one, but over 120 people assembled for worship, and the service was characterised by earnestness and sympathy. The evening meeting was held in the schoolroom, and the number attending was increased to 160. Musical items were provided by the capable choir and were much enjoyed. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. P. M. Higginson (who presided), the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, and Mr. J. Wigley, who each received the careful attention of all present. The visit to Pendleton was the best attended of all, and there is reason to believe that this piece of work inaugurated by the Governing Body is being productive of good.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Feb. 9. After tea Mr. H. Etchells, the warden, took the chair, supported by the Rev. W. Reynolds, the secretary, Mr. E. Jones, and the assistant treasurer, Mr. H. Eardley, about fifty members being present. The reports were satisfactory, the accounts showing a small balance on the right side for the third year in succession. Mr. Reynolds spoke of their causes for discouragement and the brighter side of their work. Mr. R. C. Law, who represented the District Association, assured them the Association knew of their great difficulties and brave good fight, and felt the greatest sympathy for them and readiness to help. The reports, he considered, were highly creditable to all and were very encouraging, and Mr. Reynolds should not lose heart at last year's fluctuation in attendances, but rejoice in the better prospects of the present year. The Warden then, on behalf of the congregation, presented a handsome illuminated address to Mr. Turner, signed by minister, warden, treasurers, and secretary, in testimony of his over sixteen years' kind and efficient services as secretary, and wishing him many happy and useful years in his retirement to his native town of Macclesfield. Messrs. Higham and Hill joined in testimony, and after a vote of thanks to the warden, hymn and benediction brought the meeting to a close.

Northampton.—The Rev. Arthur Harvie entered on his ministry at Kettering-road Free Church on Sunday week, and, with his wife, received a cordial welcome on the following Thursday evening. The Upper Schoolroom had been prettily decorated, and there was a capital attendance. Councillor J. Jackson presided, and dwelt on the nature of the relations between pastor and congregation, the importance of those relations, and the necessity of their being cordial and sincere. He also urged that they should show tolerance, that they should not expect the minister to manage all the organisations, and that they should not grumble at sermons preached twice, and hoped that the ministry would be a mutually happy one. Mr. J. Sale, hon. secretary of the church, then offered the official welcome. He mentioned with regret the serious illness of Mr. Freckelton, spoke appreciatively of the congregation and his fellow-officials, and was sure Mr. Harvie would find a quiet but earnest enthusiasm, and that theirs was a free church in every respect. Mrs. Swan spoke on behalf of the ladies, and Mr. G. Mead on behalf of the Sunday-school. The Rev. A. Harvie made a suitable response, expressing thanks for the kindness shown so far, and appreciation of the honour done him in choosing him as their minister. He hoped to take his part as a citizen of the town. They had every reason to be proud of the church, the congregation, the school, and the choir. Mrs. Harvie also acknowledged the welcome extended to her.

Parkstone.—The past quarter's figures show a substantial increase in the numbers attending the Emerson Hall services. Last Sunday the usual "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon" meeting was held, and at the evening service a good congregation was addressed by Mr. Bushrod upon the subject of "Sin, and its Remedy."

Rotherham.—At the meeting of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union on Feb. 4, a lecture was given by the Rev. B. C. Constable on "Extinct Monsters," illustrated by lantern pictures. Councillor J. Cox presided, and the lecture was much appreciated.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A congregational social evening was held in Channing Hall on Monday, Feb. 9. During the evening two short musical programmes were rendered, and an interval of about half an hour was taken for refreshments and conversation. As it was also the first meeting in connection with the church since the advent of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin to the town as minister of Upperthorpe, a few minutes were spent in extending a hearty welcome to him. The Rev. J. E. Jenkins, the present acting minister, who was in the chair, and Mr. E. S. Robinson, on behalf of the congregation, offered the welcome, and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin responded. The meeting was very well attended and greatly enjoyed.

Sidmouth.—On Thursday week the third of a series of social evenings in connection with the Old Meeting congregation was held in the schoolroom. The Rev. H. M. Dare, formerly minister of the congregation, presided over an attendance that numbered about eighty. Mrs. Buckley Fisher gave a most interesting address under the title "Out in the Fields," dealing principally with bird, insect, and reptile life. A number of the elder scholars attending the Sunday-school were present, and were greatly interested. At the close a vote of thanks was accorded Mrs. Buckley Fisher, proposed by Mr. D. B. Squire, and seconded by the Rev. W. Agar. Some vocal and instrumental music followed, the singing of the National Anthem bringing a most successful and pleasant evening to a close.

St. Helens.—Arrangements had been made to hold the first of a series of Sunday evening services in the Imperial Buildings, St Helens; but the minister of the Liverpool District Missionary Association found on his arrival that only on sufferance, although it had been advertised, was that first service allowed, and music was strictly prohibited. So thirty-five men and women read the hymns. However, the five Monday lectures on "Evolution and Religion" were permitted, and fifty people attended the first on Monday last.

Widnes.—Last week's news should have read that Mrs. Roberts, not Mr. Roberts, preached to an increased congregation.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE National Conference of our churches is to hold its triennial meeting at Liverpool in April, and a preliminary programme has already been issued, while it will be seen from the letter of Mr. Charles Fenton, the acting hon. secretary of the Conference, that the churches have been asked to appoint delegates. It is, of course, understood that the meetings of the Conference are perfectly open, and that many others besides the officially appointed delegates will attend and share in the pleasure and inspiration these great meetings always afford.

A PECULIAR interest attaches to this year's meeting in Liverpool, because it was in that city, twenty-one years ago, that the Conference assembled for the first time. A reference to the subject will also be found in Mr. Hawkes's Provincial Letter this week. The Conference opens on Tuesday, April 21, and closes on Friday, the 24th. On Tuesday afternoon is the reception of members and foreign delegates in St. George's Hall, when the President's address will be given by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who is also to preach at the evening service in the Philharmonic Hall. On Wednesday morning, after a communion service in Hope-street Church, a paper is to be read by Dr. John Hunter, on "A Plea for a Worshipful Church." In the afternoon there will be papers by the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Mr. James Graham, of Glasgow, on "The Pastoral Ideal," and in the evening a conversazione in the Walker Art Gallery.

THURSDAY will be a day of special practical interests, for in the morning the Rev. Joseph Wood is to read a paper on "Church Needs and Conference Ideals," and in the afternoon comes the business meeting. Friday morning is to be devoted to "Our Obligations in Social Work," with a paper by the Rev. C. J. Street, and and at noon the Rev. W. J. Jupp is to follow with a paper on "The doctrine of forgiveness and the law of reconciliation: a study of human experience in the life of the spirit." On this and Dr. Hunter's paper there is to be no discussion. These are some of the chief features of the programme, which promises a week of deep and keen interests and great delight.

PARLIAMENT re-assembled on Tuesday, and was opened by the King in person. The Speech from the Throne contained nothing of exciting interest, but it was satisfactory to be assured from this and other sources that the negotiations as to the Venezuelan trouble had so far been brought to a satisfactory conclusion that the blockade was raised, and further that the question of the Alaskan border had been finally referred to arbitration.

AN Education Bill for London was of course promised. In the subsequent debate in the House of Lords Earl Spencer, while saying that the Act of last year having been passed into law should be loyally worked, re-affirmed his strong objection to the Act, and his determination to use every legitimate means to secure its modification. As to the London Bill Liberals would certainly maintain the principles they had advocated last year. In the Commons also Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman said there would again be battle on behalf of democratic government and intellectual and spiritual freedom. The School Board for London, one of the finest, most effective and most successful machines ever created by the popular voice, was to be destroyed, but he was not without hope that the County Council, the only competent body to take up its duties, would be charged with them, in addition to those which it already so efficiently undertakes.

REFERRING to the question of Native Labour in South Africa, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman said one thing was abundantly clear, they could be no party to any compulsory labour, and he quoted Lord Milner's despatch of Dec. 6, 1901, disclaiming once for all, on behalf of the administration, any desire or intention to compel natives to enter into the service of white employers by any means whatever. In a note last week we quoted a strong speech of Mr. James Bryce, M.P., on this subject. In our present issue will be found a letter from Mr. B. Dowson, of Nottingham, who has recently been in South Africa, putting the matter in a different light.

THERE was no reference in the Speech from the Throne to the Housing Question, but on Wednesday Mr. Macnamara moved an amendment to the Address, calling for immediate action on the part of the Government. Quoting a reference of the Colonial Secretary's in South Africa to the privileges and glories of the Empire, he pointed to the sharp contrast in the fact that close around the very walls of Parliament were tens of thousands for whom those glories did not exist. The House, he said, sat in an Imperial fool's paradise, lulled by the dumb patience of these people. It was time they should be heard. The appeal was strongly enforced from both sides of the House, and the amendment was only lost by a majority of 39, Mr. Walter Long having promised a small measure touching certain points in the problem.

THE founder of the Bourneville model village, Mr. Cadbury, has presented to the Trust a further estate of 120 acres adjoining the land already held by them. The holding of the trustees is now 480 acres. The gift was made known by Mr. Cadbury at the recent annual gathering of the villagers, when he commented upon the increased size of the meeting and other evidences of growth. He referred to the village as a housing experiment rather than a mere attempt to provide a model village; and stated that when he reflected on the multitude of people in Birmingham (whose centre is but five miles distant) who were badly housed, he was impressed with the smallness of it as a contribution to the general question. Its value in regard to actual housing must for many years be necessarily small, but as an object-lesson he hoped that it might serve to point the way. One of the things from which he hoped much was the growth in the village of a healthy and vigorous race of children. The secretary's report showed that the completion of the parks was receiving attention, and the accounts showed a balance in hand of £12.

SIR JOHN GORST gave an address in Manchester last week on "Social Reform." It was his own special desire that his remarks should be considered distinct from party politics, and the meeting was under the auspices of the Citizens' Association and the Sanitary Association, societies which are identified with no political party, and are certainly in no way committed to Sir John Gorst's political position. He urged that there ought to be no party divisions about social questions, but that in every party earnest consideration should be given to proposals of social reform. Doubtless many other leaders of public opinion desire the same thing, and it is at the present time a main object with those who are in the van of the movement for municipal improvement in our large towns to lift local elections out of the ruts of official partisanship and to get them decided on questions of local government and not on questions of imperial politics with which the Councillors when elected have nothing to do in the Council Chamber.

THE account given by Sir John Gorst of the state of the Government Departments and the possibilities of legislation presented little hope of any speedy remedy for existing evils by Act of Parliament. He, however, wisely urged that existing powers held by the municipalities for housing, dealing with unsanitary areas, provision of open spaces, baths, washhouses, &c., should be used to the full; and pointed out that very few cities and towns appeared to realise how much it was now possible for them to do under existing laws. When these were used to the best advantage for the benefit of the community, the demand for further legislation would be one that could not be withstood by any Government. A reference to the recent Education Act as a beneficent extension of local government was the one point in the speech which was received with considerable derision by an audience composed of many of the most public-spirited citizens of Manchester.

REFERRING to our notes of last week on the coming Education Bill for London, a correspondent expresses emphatic dissent from our position that the experiment of the County Council as education authority, notwithstanding the great burden of work already laid upon the Council, is worth trying:—"There is too much talk now," he writes, "of the question of the alternatives to the School Board, whereas it behoves us as Nonconformists to be up and doing to prevent as far as we are able the proposed destruction. Do not let us take this question quietly. Let us, like other bodies, arrange for a large meeting to protest against the proposed destruction of the School Board, as it is only by meetings and protests that we shall be able to influence the course of the Bill. Unless we do this the supporters of the Bill will say that Londoners are not averse to the abolition of their Board."

AT the usual Progress Meeting held on Sunday evening at the Wilberforce Hall, Holdenhurst-road, Bournemouth, Miss Tagart and Miss Florence Hill spoke on "The Progress of Rational Religion" as a cause which was being furthered by the "Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union," of which Miss Tagart is president and Miss Florence Hill hon. secretary. Mr. V. Tchertkoff occupied the chair for the purpose of introducing to the audience these friends of his who, as he said, had come down to Bournemouth for a short rest from their assiduous labour, but who had nevertheless so kindly consented to give at this meeting a little information about the work they are engaged in. The hall, as on the preceding Sunday, was full, some of the audience having to stand. The communications made by the speakers appeared to be of intense interest to the majority of those present. The discussion that followed was of a most serious and searching character. The proceedings concluded with a heartfelt expression of thanks to the two visitors from London who had spoken. Long after the formal meeting was closed many of the audience continued discussing in groups the questions and problems which had been raised during the evening.

IN the Church of England during the last few weeks interest has been divided between St. Michael's, Shoreditch, and Keble College, Oxford. The vicar of St. Michael's, the Rev. H. M. M. Evans, refused to obey the directions of the Bishop of London by abandoning extra-liturgical services, and chose rather to resign his living. Before doing so he took legal advice, and found, as he informed a representative of the Daily Chronicle, that "he hadn't a leg to stand on." The one practice which he found himself unable to surrender was that of the Invocation of Saints, which, said Mr. Evans, "is allowed by the whole Catholic Church; but it is clear that it is not legally allowable in the Established Church of England. It is the old conflict between the claims of God and Cæsar: Theologically I hold to the truth and practice of the Catholic Church, legally I render to Cæsar that which belongs to him, the living in a State Church."

ON Saturday night, a fortnight ago, the following notice was left in every house in the parish:—"St. Mary's, Moorfields, Eldon-street, E.C., Sunday, Feb. 8, 1903, Low Mass with English hymns at 8 and 11.15 A.M. All who have been attending St. Michael's, Shoreditch, are earnestly invited to attend the services of the Catholic Church provided for them. Musical service and Benediction in the evening at 7; sermon by the Rev. Father Chase, formerly vicar of All Saints, Plymouth." The phrase "provided for them" in this business-like circular was literally accurate, since an unfinished church was hastily prepared and specially opened, and a dispensation to use English hymns obtained, for the direct purpose of capturing the congregation of St. Michael's. The result was an apparent but momentary success. The Sunday morning service was well attended, and practically the whole Sunday-school of St. Michael's was marched thither by the teachers. But as soon as the reports of those who had visited St. Michael's were heard, and the rumour that an extreme Protestant had been sent there was exploded, they all returned! Last Sunday the services conducted by Mr. Cazaret, whom the Bishop had licensed to the charge of the parish, were only to be distinguished from those of Mr. Evans by the change of voice and the absence of certain valuable ornaments which the former vicar took away with him.

THE attack, to which the Times opened its columns, on the patronage of Keble College was directed chiefly against one member of the Council—Dr. Talbot, Bishop of Rochester. The assailants allege that livings in the gift of the College are seldom bestowed on Keble men, and always on High Churchmen. On this Dr. Lock, the warden, replies that the advowsons are not committed to the care of the College in order to advance its own interests, but specifically to provide a "continuity of tradition" in the type of service established in the parishes concerned. The Council of Keble College, in fact, claims to be a sort of Simeon Trust for the High Church party. In the midst of the strife the Times suddenly discovered that Dr. Talbot had already been offered the See of Winchester, and had declined it. The onslaught upon Keble was thus shown to be both futile and superfluous, and we may presume that, for the present, we shall hear no more of it.

OUR friends of the Congregational Union are greatly disturbed over the appointment of their new secretary. Is he to be a superior clerk or an unmitred bishop? The weight of opinion tends to the latter but for the fact that, like Browning's "Life in the City," "Bless you, it's dear!" What is wanted for the office, we are told, is hard and sagacious statesmanship, administrative ability, business capacity, an eloquent preacher, an attractive platform speaker, a man of tact and courage, one who has everybody's confidence, a leader whom the churches will gladly follow, a confidant both of ministers and congregations, a man of first-rate powers, a strong man who will champion a bold and forward policy—and all for £500 a year! What is wanted, in fact, is a man equal in force of intellect and power of organisation to a Cabinet Minister, and at about one-tenth the cost! Really if our friends want a statesman, and on that point we are not inclined to disagree, they must manfully pay the price. Which things we should hardly notice in these columns but for their close application to our own affairs. The National Conference Committee will, at the triennial meeting in April, strongly recommend the appointment of a paid secretary. Should the motion be carried we trust the churches will rise to the occasion and appoint one of their best men. Our churches also require to "step out of the narrow and parochial view of their responsibilities,' which too much prevails, and to adopt a bold and forward policy. We also, as well as our Congregational friends, are faced by many and grave problems. If the Conference can find a secretary who will inspire the sense of fellowship and mutual co-operation at present so lacking among us no price will be too much for such services.

THE Wesleyans are setting to work with their "million." A few days ago a meeting was held to consider applications in regard to Home Mission Work. £20,000 was allotted to the London Mission; £5,000 to the Mission in Manchester; £10,000 to temperance work; £3,000 to the Wesleyan Deaconess Institute; £20,000 had been previously set aside for soldiers' and sailors' homes. About £40,000 will be devoted to ordinary Methodist circuit work. No wonder that a reporter avers that the committee were almost dazed with their own figures when they found they had such sums at their disposal. The story of a million, how it came, what it did, where it went, will make an interesting chapter in some future history of Methodism. It may be still more interesting to watch the paragraphs of that chapter gradually built up by the workers who are now making history.

THIRTY-ONE years ago Mr. Stopford Brooke gave the three lectures on Burns, which conclude his volume on "Theology in the English Poets." On Thursday week, in the present course at University College, Burns was again his subject, the popularity of which was proved by an unusually full attendance, every seat in the Botanical theatre being occupied. It was wise, Mr. Brooke said, to skip almost everything that Burns wrote in English (a few things like "Mary in heaven" were excepted), for when he put on the conventional English dress, his singing robes fell off him, even the subtle melody of his verse, like the melody of Nature herself, deserted him. An absolute naturalness was his greatest power. He sang as a bird sings on the bough, to him everything became matter of song. His verse was perfect within its range, but it was not the range of the greatest poets. He leapt at once to his perfection. His best pieces were nearly all written in the first six months of his poetic career. They gushed out, like a fountain, clear and full from the living rock.

THE poetic ancestry of Burns, Mr. Brooke said, was all in Scotland. Four centuries of Lowland poetry came in him to its perfection; the difference between the work of his predecessors and that of Burns was the difference between the chattering of sparrows and the song of the nightingale. His song was pure Scotland, for he had not read the great Elizabethans; it rose fresh from the natural earth, out of the heart of the people who till the earth. Perfect simplicity and naturalness was his ideal.

Gie me ae spark of Nature's fire,
That's a' the learning I desire;
Then though I drudge thro' dirt and mire,
At plough or cart;
My Muse, though hamely in attire,
May touch the heart.

The exquisite music of the verse, and the great power of tenderness in Burns, Mr. Brooke illustrated by reading several pieces, and spoke also of his terrible power of satire, and the place of Nature in his verse, as the setting of human life. If anything could redeem his coarseness it was its perfect frankness and sincerity. Of the faults of his character there had been no more unsparing critic than Burns himself. No tenderer or humbler verses had ever been written of him than Wordsworth's, who was almost a Puritan in his morality. Burns, Mr. Brooke said in conclusion, lives not only by his style, but because the spirit of his style was love.

Deep in the general heart of men
His power survives.

An attack of influenza unfortunately prevented Mr. Brooke from lecturing this week on Wordsworth. There remain two lectures to complete the course.

HEALTHY and beautiful surroundings; an organisation which encourages good fellowship and stimulates growth both intellectual and physical: these are the conditions which Mr. C. R. Ashbee and his fellow-directors consider not only conducive, but necessary, to the revival of the almost defunct traditions of sound and honest craftsmanship, of work which shall give delight equally to the producer and the purchaser; and of the highest ideals of citizenship.

WITH this conviction the Guild of Handicraft has moved from the Mile End-road, which has been the centre of its labours almost since it was founded, fifteen years ago; and has found a new home in the picturesque market town of Chipping Campden, which lies in a hollow of the Cotswold Hills on the borders of Gloucestershire. The experiment is an interesting one, and it cannot be doubted that a life in an upland town, built when the best traditions were current in architecture and the crafts generally, and set in the midst of beautiful country, must tend to higher ideals of life and work. In a sleepy country town it is, of course, necessary that the leisure time of the workers should be thought of; and, though it is not a year since the guild came to the village, there is already a club-house and a sports club, besides technical classes, in which subjects are taught bearing upon the various branches of "Arts and Crafts" which are carried on.

A FEELING has long been abroad, and is now taking practical form in various quarters, that life in great cities is not only injurious to the physical and moral growth of the race, but also that it is unnecessary. For individuals it is comparatively easy to leave the populous centres, and retire to healthier and more inspiring surroundings; but it is no easy matter to move a whole factory of workers, even if it numbers but sixty or seventy hands, as in the case of the Guild of Handicraft. The difficulties are many, the question of housing the works being, perhaps, the greatest. In Campden, as in many other towns once the centre of an important trade, many old and disused buildings were available for the new industry. An old silk mill was soon converted into a busy factory where the metal work, cabinet-making and wood-carving, jewellery, printing, &c., are now carried on, and the empty dwellings were soon filled by the workmen and their families. There is a railway station a mile from the village, which affords easy access to London. It is encouraging to hear of attempts like this to follow the teaching of such writers as Ruskin and Morris, and especially to know that the effort is crowned with real success as in the case of the Guild of Handicraft.

PROFESSOR WEISS, of Owens College, Manchester, and Mrs. Weiss, last summer paid a visit to the Doukhobor Settlements in Canada, and on Wednesday week Mrs. Weiss gave a lecture in the school-room of the Upper Brook-street Free Church, of which an interesting report appeared in the Manchester Guardian of Feb. 12. The lecture was warmly appreciative of the character of the Doukhobors, among whom Professor and Mrs. Weiss lived for a short time. Having traced the history of the Doukhobors, and told of their settlement in Canada, Mrs. Weiss described their domestic life. We quote the conclusion of the Guardian report:—

They were a strong and industrious people, and during the three or four years that they had been in Canada had done wonders in making their land productive. Their houses were spotlessly clean, and as for their honesty, the Scotch settler with whom the visitors stayed said that he would leave his house full of gold and the door open without fearing to be robbed. Weekly baths were compulsory among them, so there could be no truth in the charge that they were a dirty people. They were, however, obstinate and difficult to deal with, and the persecutions they had suffered under the Russian Government had made them needlessly suspicious of all Governments. They had been treated with invariable kindness and sympathy by the Government of Canada. They held firmly to their principle of community in property, and the great difficulty of the Government had been to induce them to hold the land individually. As to the disturbances, Mr. Weiss pointed out that these had been confined to one colony alone, which included only one seventh of the 7,000 Doukhobors in Canada. These extremists carried the principle of not using animals to the furthest limit. They turned their cattle loose, and burned or cast away their beautiful fur coats. A powerful leader of the Doukhobors was now on his way to the colony, and it was hoped that his influence would have a calming effect on the wilder spirits and induce them to settle down quietly. "Anyone," concluded Mrs. Weiss, "who has seen them, and has seen what good, honest people they are, must hope that this difficulty will be settled, and that the Doukhobors will become permanent Canadian settlers, for which they are very well fitted.

We propose next week to reprint some passages from a leaflet recently issued by Mr. V. Tchertkoff, of the Free Age Press, Christchurch, Hants, on last year's developments among the Canadian Doukhobors.

THE Health Committee of the Bradford Corporation have addressed a letter to every minister of the city asking them, on sanitary grounds, to discourage the custom, common in the North of England, which requires the minister to conduct a service in a house where there is to be a funeral before the coffin is closed. Many ministers must have felt that in complying with the custom they were sanctioning a very undesirable practice; armed with this official request they will be able gently but firmly to decline to do what ought not to be done.

MEMORIAL HALL, MANCHESTER.—The annual meeting of the trustees was held on Friday, Feb. 13, the chairman, Mr. Harry Rawson, presiding. It appeared that besides providing, without charge, the accommodation required by the tutors and students of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, gratuitous use of rooms had been granted on 167 occasions to a number of institutions such as the District Unitarian and the Sunday School Associations, the Missionary Conference, &c., &c. Some extensive sanitary re-arrangements had involved an exceptionally large expenditure. A grant of £10 was made to the congregation at Flagg. At the conclusion of the business the trustees dined together at the Reform Club, under the presidency of Mr. H. P. Greg, J.P. The following gentlemen were present as guests:—The Revs. Alex. Gordon, J. E. Manning, C. T. Poynting, Chas. Roper, E. W. Lummis, C. J. Street, H. J. Rossington, W. L. Schroeder, and Travers Herford; Messrs. F. Monks (Warrington), John Harwood (Bolton), S. B. Worthington, J. H. Brooks, Councillor Marsden, and Edwin W. Marshall.

Correspondents are requested to note that news for insertion the same week should reach the Office by Wednesday if possible, and the earlier the better. Thursday morning is the latest time for receiving news, and it should then be very brief, or it will probably have to wait a week.

LITERATURE.

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY.*

THE publication of the first volume of the "Cambridge Modern History" is an event of great interest to historical students in this country. We hope that it may prove of not less importance to the growth of popular culture. A survey of the field of history in countries other than our own has hardly entered into the English ideal of education. It has been due in large measure to our insular habit of mind, but partly also to the lack of books. Monographs dealing with dramatic episodes, like the struggle between the Low Countries and Spain or the French Revolution, are fairly plentiful; but there have been few serious attempts to present a connected view of the political and social development of Europe as a whole. For this we have had to turn hitherto with gratitude to the Germans or to the elaborate Histoire Générale of Lavisse and Rambaud. This reproach is now happily on its way to be removed, at least so far as the four centuries embraced under the term "Modern History" are concerned."

The plan of the History is itself a proof of the rapid growth of historical studies in recent years. No one mind can master the whole field. Work like that of Gibbon, with its unity of style and intellectual atmosphere, has been replaced by a series of elaborate essays written by specialists. Literature has yielded to science. But this plan of joint authorship has many advantages, not the least of them being that we are presented with a variety of judgments, as different series of events are brought under review. In this way we learn, almost by instinct, to allow for the angle from which truth falls upon the mind, and are encouraged in habits of historical thinking, which, as Lord Acton has reminded us, is of even greater importance than historical learning.

The volume before us contains nineteen chapters, and the mere enumeration of subjects and authors is enough to make the most rash reviewer pause. To quote the preface, it is not merely intended "to describe and discuss the Renaissance as a movement of European History. It is also designed as an introductory volume whose business it is, as it were, to bring upon the stage the nations, forces and interests which will bear the chief parts in the action." In other words, it looks backwards as well as forwards, and shows not merely the contrast between the modern world and the Middle Ages, but also the organic connection between the two.

And yet it is the extraordinary rapidity with which the whole mediæval conception of life disappeared which is the most striking feature of the period. In politics and commerce, in religion and general culture all things became new with a rush of movement which can only be compared with the startling growth of scientific interest in our own day. Mr. Payne's opening essay on the Age of Discovery, and the masterly account of the Classical Renaissance by Sir Richard Jebb are equally eloquent of the fact, in widely separated departments of life. The latter is certainly one of the most attractive sections of the whole volume. We are glad to see that Sir Richard Jebb deals a final blow to the obstinate fallacy that the revival of Greek studies was due to the capture of Constantinople. Manuel Chrysoloras was professor of Greek at Florence from 1397 to 1400; and there was a steady flow of Greek teachers to Italy during the fifty years preceding 1453. His criticism of Erasmus is also worthy of special notice. It brings out what is really salient in his influence in a few sentences. In contrast to Petrarch and the other Italian humanists he cared for the new learning not so much as a means of self-culture but for moral ends. "In all his work his aim was educational. He was an ardent and indefatigable student. But through all his labours there ran the purpose of a practical moralist, who hoped to leave human society better than he found it."

Another chapter to which many readers will turn with special pleasure is Mr. Armstrong's study of Savonarola and the Florence of his day. It is much more than an accurate summary of historical events. It has the Florentine atmosphere, and it is full of shrewd observations upon human life. He tries to be just to the city as well as to Savonarola, and he is careful to tell us that it contained much unnoticed simplicity of life. "The vices of Florence were those of a rich commercial city, extravagance in clothes and furniture, in funerals and weddings." It is, perhaps, also with more than a side-glance at ourselves that he describes how "weary men repaired to the Cathedral, not to worship, but to be soothed by the music of Orcagna, the greatest executant of his day." Mr. Armstrong has a gift for epigram, but in this he is often singularly happy, and we are tempted to quote many sentences like the following—"the tribute which solitude exacts from those who court her is an abnormal consciousness of self." In his hands we feel that history has not ceased to be literature.

We have mentioned already the opening which the plan of the History allows for different points of view. In one case, however, it seems to lead almost to contradiction. To some extent Chapter XVIII. on "Catholic Europe," by Dr. William Barry, and Chapter XIX. on "The Eve of the Reformation," by Mr. Lea, overlap, and they present an extraordinary contrast in treatment. Dr. Barry says everything that can be said on behalf of the religious life of the Church, and much of it is a fair answer to ordinary Protestant polemic; but it leaves us almost at a loss to account for the Reformation at all. Mr. Lea, on the other hand, with the severity of erudition which we know so well, accumulates the materials for a crushing indictment of the whole Papal system. It is characteristic that Dr. Barry speaks of the efforts which were made to modify the independence of the supreme Pontiff at Constance and Basel as representing "a view unknown to earlier ages and impossible to carry out in practice," while to Mr. Lea their success would have rendered the Church "a constitutional monarchy in place of a despotism." Both writers are agreed that the failure of the reforming Councils did a great deal to strengthen Papal absolutism. But our point is this, that reading both chapters in close connection the impression is made that on the whole they are not equally detached and impartial. Dr. Barry felt evidently that he had a cause to defend in face of obstinate popular prejudices; but Mr. Lea is certainly less open to a suspicion of heightening the colours and pleading a case.

The difficulty of being severely just in historical questions, which are still hotly debated by religious partisans, is very great; and it will be indeed a triumph if the succeeding volume on the Reformation escapes this pitfall and succeeds in being neither Catholic nor Protestant. "I exhort you," said Lord Acton in memorable words, "never to debase the moral currency or to lower the standard of rectitude, but to try others by the final maxim that governs your own lives, and to suffer no man and no cause to escape the undying penalty which history has the power to inflict on wrong." That the Cambridge History, in its first volume, has been so successful in maintaining this difficult standard of rectitude is of good augury for a too rare freedom from controversial bias, especially when it is concerned with Religion, that "first of human concerns," which few men are yet able to approach, even in the quiet perspective of history, with equal mind and just judgment.

A closing word may be added upon a somewhat technical point without drawing this notice out to too great length. One hundred pages are given to bibliography at the end of the volume, but there is little attempt at completeness and uniformity. In some cases the lists of books given are very full and will be of real service to the student, but elsewhere they are rather meagre and ill-arranged, if any serious use is to be made of them. The bibliography appended to Sir Richard Jebb's chapter on the Classical Renaissance is a case in point. We cannot find any reference to special works on Erasmus, to editions of the Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum, to the late Chancellor Christie's monograph on Etienne Dolet, or to such a well-known and standard book as Seebohm's Oxford Reformers. It is true that some of these are referred to elsewhere, but this does not make good the deficiency without some system of cross-reference. From the point of view of the serious student this question of bibliography is one of great importance, and we think that the general editors would do well in future volumes to exercise more supervision and to aim at a uniform standard of completeness.

THE SPARK IN THE CLOD.*

THE second title, "A Study in Evolution," hardly describes the work. It is not a study in Evolution, a specimen in detail of Nature's method of evolving; it is rather one more statement of the doctrine of Evolution, with special reference to its bearing on Religious, Biblical and Theological beliefs. Here are seven essays, each averaging about twenty or twenty-four pages, all intelligibly written, so that an unscientific man can follow the argument, the whole forming a volume about the size of one of the Eversley volumes, but with fewer pages. Granted that such work as these lectures undertake needs yet to be done, one will have a difficulty to find a volume in which it is done so well within so moderate a space.

But reading the book sets a man wondering how long this particular style of essay will be needed. When will Evolution be able, if one may put it so, to take its own existence for granted? A man of peace is apt to wish that Evolution may be able to come into the lecture-room as quietly and respectably as Chemistry or Astronomy, or even the Higher Criticism. For when either one of these decorous teachers steps into the class-room we see no sign of a recent struggle with Theologians and Bibliolaters; each one takes his own allowed place and goes on with his own work. It is true that some of the old school Theologians never think it right to begin the duties of the day till they have administered a sharp reproof to the German critics; but these latter do not mind: they go on for the most part as unconcernedly as if they had heard no ill word, and did not know that anyone slammed the door. But Evolution is still struggling with Genesis; still occupied in putting to rights ancient myths and modern interpretations; still fighting with ancient dogmas, and trying to allay modern anxieties. What sort of a being Evolution will prove to be when she has done squabbling with real and imaginary foes is a question that is more interesting than any of these little battles which ought by this time to have brought the war to an end. It surely will not be always necessary in explaining the evolution of man to begin by examining "the Genesis story." A man who should write a primer of astronomy, though his ultimate aim should be as purely religious as the nineteenth Psalm, would not in these days begin by examining the astronomical ideas found in the Old Testament. A Biblical phrase would light up the Heaven of his thought here and there perhaps; but he would on the whole take himself seriously. Astronomy would point its own moral. The Psalms and Job and the Genesis story would point theirs in their own way at their own time. The Bible would not choke the astronomer, the astronomer would not fight the Bible. It will have to be that way with the evolutionist. Bible story and scientific theory will have to live together in the same country. They must each allow the other room to exist, and they must let bygones be bygones.

It is impossible for the most candid writer to keep drawing contrasts between a belief that he would discredit, and another that he wishes to commend without some amount of exaggeration. Thus in the thoughtful chapter on The Problem of Pain and Evil it is surely an exaggeration to say of the story of Adam's sin:—"The story represents everything as arbitrary. Nothing is under law; there is no attention paid to the nature of things; there is no relation of cause and effect; there is no moral order and no justice." Against these statements one has only to set down the undoubted fact that the story of the sin of Adam and Eve still furnishes illustration of human conduct in many a homily and many a page of meditative reasoning written by people who do not dream of taking the story as anything more than a parable. Mr. Sunderland would hardly have made the criticism I have quoted if he had been dealing with the Genesis legends as literature. But the desire to furnish a contrast has led to a hard, inhuman interpretation of a very human story.

On the other hand, the capacity of the new theory as an explanation of all things in heaven and earth seems exaggerated too. We find expressions like this: "We must go deeper down." . . . "In other words, we must go to Evolution." "We are sometimes asked, will not men eventually outgrow religion? The best answer to this question is Evolution." Will not the unthinking reader be tempted to consider himself in the possession of a password that opens all doors into past history, and discloses what is worth knowing of present-day mystery? If he had been given some other almost equivalent word and had been told to go more deeply down into the problem of growth; and to consider the question of the permanence of religion in the light of past development, he might have perceived that he was not furnished with an answer to all riddles, but rather put in the way of investigating them. These remarks are made in no quibbling spirit. Some such warning is needed to the young people who may be fortunate enough to read this well-written and, on the whole, very admirable and helpful book.

J. R.

THE TORREY-ALEXANDER MISSION.

WHATEVER view we may take of the value to the religious life of the nation of the Torrey-Alexander Mission, considered simply as a phenomenon it must be of interest to all thoughtful persons. That the diffusion of knowledge which has characterised the last fifty years should still leave it possible for a man to command the attention of considerable numbers of more or less educated people for a scheme of teaching which includes a dogmatic assertion of the plenary inspiration of the Bible is in itself a fact which should help us to take stock of the actual condition of popular appreciation of the great questions which have been at issue so long beneath the eyes of the public. On the whole we must admit to being fairly satisfied with the conditions revealed by this test.

Had we not become reconciled to the thought that the majority of the world are always "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken," we could not but experience some very desperate degree of disappointment that half a century of education should still have left them professing and protesting the same ignorances which the great teachers of an already bygone generation had spent themselves in combating. Knowing the constitution of humanity to be what it is, we find a symptom of real health in a conservatism which, unshaken by any effort of personal thought, has defied the influences of a merely extraneous thought, and refused to be swept away in the stream of any mere "school."

For of the two evils, a flippancy which is too easily overbalanced into the tide of a new "movement," and a stolidity to which new "movements" may "pipe" and "weep" equally in vain, there is more of promise and good hope in the latter.

Stolidity is of two kinds. When it does not evidence indifference it evidences a sort of faith. The stolid person differs from the opposite type in the possession of a degree of conscious or sub-conscious persuasion that the questions at stake do not really touch the roots of religious life and godly conduct. But the other type of stolidity is characterised only by apathy, than which no more deadly foe to all possibilities of worthy living is to be encountered.

Apathy and Fanaticism; the one so cold-blooded as not to be moved to any ends good or bad,—the other so hot-blooded as to be content with movement alone, and by no means to be persuaded to consider ends. Of these Apathy is the worse. For Fanaticism at least has the primary condition of energy.

Now, Fanaticism on the platform and Apathy in the pew present a combination not by any means lacking in hopeful potentialities. If the singing of Mr. Alexander and the rhetoric of Dr. Torrey can awaken a few indifferent persons to a sense of how very much more there is in heaven and earth than is dreamt of in the philosophy of indifference the first condition will have been secured for genuine progress. A hole must be dug before a foundation can be laid.

"Awake thou that sleepest" is a cry which goes before the promise, "and Christ shall give thee light." There is always much resulting from a successful evangelical mission which can only be called un-intelligently emotional. But under stress of the new-found emotional fervour, intelligence itself is very apt to wake up; and when it has done so it cannot rest in mere emotionalism; and then begins that search for "reasons" about which we only ask that it may be earnest and purposeful, and sooner or later advance must be made towards a truer appreciation of the relations of life and doctrine; an advance that must lead to a point where truth to a man's own highest susceptibilities is attained. And a truth beyond this is ever, and must ever be, beyond human attainment or human duty. There is not one gospel for the scholar, another for the unlearned and ignorant. Loyalty to his own best possibilities is equally the measure for each. "If ye were blind," said Jesus, "ye would have no sin; but now ye say we see, your sin remaineth."

It is not inability to see what others profess to see, but a pretence to a clearer vision than we have that evidences the "lie in the soul" which vitiates and demoralises the energies of many a life not without evidences of grace and laudable endeavour.

The most learned have no privileges in respect of religion over the most ignorant. What a man is, not what he knows or does or thinks or believes or fancies, determines his rank in the Kingdom of Heaven.

"Be ye wise, for I am wise: be ye all-powerful, for I am all-powerful; be ye omniscient, for I am omniscient"—this is not the prophetic challenge on God's behalf to a race which, had it been so, might well have turned to self-mockery and pessimism. The challenge is, "Be ye holy, for I am holy."

To be holy is to have a single eye for truth up to the fullest extent of one's power and opportunity for apprehending it. There is no room for the scoff at scholarship which our Evangelical opponents never weary of levelling for the amusement of audiences too readily pleased to be persuaded of the superior "spirituality" of ignorance. Loyalty to truth means for the scholar, to get as near truth as scholarship may enable; for the ignorant, to get as near truth as in ignorance one can.

There is merit in a superior faithfulness to his ideal in an ignorant man; no merit in the lower standard of the ideal itself. And, in experience, the higher ideal and the greater faithfulness more usually are found together. For the earnestness of purpose which has attained to the vision of the high ideal energises also in relentless effort to be true to that ideal when seen. But the ignorant and indifferent have seldom an ideal in view that appeals to them as worthy any consistent effort.

We anticipate real benefit from the Torrey-Alexander Mission. Partly on lines already indicated. Partly in a more generalised re-action.

After all, the Kingdom of Heaven is not in word, but in power. This talk of a power that is never in evidence must sooner or later disgust, and people of serious temperament will begin to look for the source of the power which, in so dark a world, is everywhere recognisably at work in relieving the darkness. They will not find it in creeds, and dogmas, and theories of inspiration and Messianic hopes. They will find it where it ever is, and only is; in a God who asks no more of those who would be His servants in a world of pain and wrong than that they shall consistently endeavour to do justice, love mercy, and walk humbly with Himself.

Meanwhile, for those who have an eye upon the signs of the times there is encouragement in such a fact as the recent juxtaposition in the Daily News of two paragraphs, in the first of which some reference was made to Dr. Torrey's successful meetings, and in the next a hearty commendation was given of Professor Carpenter's Bible lectures at Kensington Town Hall.

The unconscious humour of the mere juxtaposition and the impartiality of the journalistic attitude may have escaped some readers of the column. But the occurrence, and character, and position of those two paragraphs mean more for the interpretation of the religious life of the present day and its forecast than we could begin to elucidate at the close of the present article. PRIMUM VER.

How the woods thrill! For the boughs, this morn, —Stripped by the insolent Frost in slavery—
Sparkle and tingle with hope new-born.
O the tenderness, O the bravery!
Down by the root, in their mouldering screen,
Dreamily stir
Those balls of fur
That soon shall be flashes of gold through the green.
Where is the lark? 'Tis he should sing:
"Nought's irretrievable:
Spring has come back, the unbelievable,
Wept for, welcome Spring."

OBITUARY.

THE REV. T. W. FRECKELTON.

THE death of the Rev. Thomas Wesley Freckelton, which occurred on the 11th inst., took from us a man of singular gifts and individuality. It would not be in accordance with his temperament, it would be, indeed, against his expressed wish, if in epitomising his career we should use terms which, while being simply adequate, might seem to a stranger to be laudatory. But something more than a dry record of dates is due, not "to his memory"—that ghost of contemporary fame—nor to the feelings of those who loved and admired him, for rightly to admire is ever to be amply paid; but the debt is owing to that strenuous humanity of which he was a type and which, in unnumbered lives to-day, needs all the inspiration to be drawn from a life like his.

He was born at Nottingham in December, 1827. His parents were poor cotton mill people, and he himself was a factory "hand" long before his ninth birthday. That was a black period in the history of English industry, and the little boy, sensitive in every fibre, as was the man to his sorrow long afterwards, was all but crushed by that cruel system of twelve to fourteen hours' labour each day, coupled with brutal treatment from the taskmasters.

The humble home, however, sheltered him with its simple religious life. His parents, disciples of the great reformer whose name they gave their boy, sowed diligently the seeds of a piety that proved fruitful. The family became attached to a little Baptist chapel, where, in spite of its harsh Calvinistic theology, there was refuge and comfort for them; and in its Sunday-school he became a teacher. In his 'teens he came under the influence of Mr. Syme, a broad-minded Baptist preacher in Nottingham. Intellectual impulses, as well as spiritual zeal, were quickened in him, and he would fain become a preacher too.

But his father died, and the widowed mother needed her son's support, and his great ambition had to walk in lowly ways as many another's has done. He studied by night, and worked by day; and Sunday saw him amid a band of earnest young evangelists preaching in the streets and among the villages around Nottingham. At last the thought struck him that the United States might open some educational door for him which he could not find in England. He was a little over twenty when he emigrated in a vessel which spent three months on the voyage. It was a desperate adventure, and the first chapter in the story was unpromising, save for the call it made on his force of character. The despotic captain, glad of anyone who could evoke the semblance of order from the chaos of that foul ship, made him "chief constable," young as he was, with very good results. He arrived in port at last, and obtained work in the States; but trusted ministers advised against going to any available college there, the education given being so thin and poor. Yet all was not in vain. He read much, and met Theodore Parker, whose theology, indeed, he could not yet accept, but whose public spirit kindled his enthusiasm. Those were the days of the "fugitive slave" agitation, and young Freckelton had his share in the exciting events of the time.

Returning, however, as advised, he continued studying privately for some time; and at last in 1852 he entered the Baptist College, Leicester. It is evident that a mental yeast was fermenting in that institution at the time. There are still three Unitarian ministers who were trained there in that decade—John Page Hopps, Thomas Read Elliott, and William Shakespeare. Mr. Freckelton paid the penalty of an inquiring mind. He had read Martineau's "Endeavours," Channing's works, Theodore Parker's "Discourse," and notably, Bailey's "Festus." Heresy in the college being more than suspected, search visits were made in the students' rooms, in the occupants' absence. There were the tell-tale books on the shelves; and Freckelton had to leave without the benefit of his fourth year.

Undaunted, he began his ministerial work, in 1855, at Longton, and very soon the one "big man" of the chapel found him far too free-thoughted. The young minister, therefore, as quickly left the chapel; but the bulk of the congregation, poor workpeople mostly, followed him. They could not find money to build a new chapel, so they hired a disused and battered old theatre, to which, however, the Wedgwoods were not ashamed to go to hear this latest free-thinking Baptist. Those were the days when another quondam Baptist, George Dawson, was in the plenitude of his powers at Birmingham. He and Freckelton became fast friends thenceforth.

In 1861 the young preacher took the deciding step, and accepted the charge of our congregation at Bradford (Yorks). Five years later saw him at Plymouth, and in 1875 he became minister at Unity Church, Islington. By this time his ripened intellect bore the rich fruit of his constant studies in many fields—science, philosophy, literature, as well as Biblical questions. From his college days, when he received elocutionary instruction from Sheridan Knowles, he had developed the art of public reading; and although his physical powers were never great, his preaching often impressed competent judges as truly prophetic in elevation of feeling and vigour of utterance. His few printed sermons give sufficient evidence of his keen intellectual vision and boldness of thought; and his life-long interest in devotional poetry reveals the tenderer side of his nature. One of his children's hymns, "The Children's Good-night," was highly praised by George Dawson. Another hymn of his is to be found in the first edition of the "Essex Hall Hymnal," a collection to which he gave much labour, and which, we believe, was due to his initiation. Another volume of hymns and devotional pieces resulted from his printing occasional special hymn-papers for use at Unity Church. It was published in 1884 under the title, "Hymn Book for Popular Services."

More noteworthy still is the book entitled "Positive Aspects of Unitarian Christianity," for which Dr. Martineau wrote a preface, and which contains ten lectures delivered in 1881 by men of the first rank amongst us in their day, including Dr. Crosskey, Charles Wicksteed, Charles Beard, Dr. Vance Smith, William Binns, Henry Iorson, and Mr. Freckelton himself, as well as others happily still surviving. This valuable and permanent addition to our literature was due largely, if not wholly, to Mr. Freckel-ton's suggestion as a member of the executive of the B. and F. U. A. His own contribution was on "The Religious Life." Another movement in which he took a very active share was a series of "People's Services," held in theatres and public halls in London. He had great success in popular address, and a speech delivered by him to a mass meeting held at Leeds at the time of the meeting of the National Conference there is still freshly remembered by many. He contributed the first of the series of theological essays entitled "Religion and Modern Thought," and another memorable utterance which has been preserved was his sermon delivered before the South-Eastern Provincial Association, 1898, ordered to be printed.

After resigning the pulpit at Islington Mr. Freckelton gave (1891-93) excellent service as Missionary Agent for the Provincial Assembly, his reports of churches visited being invaluable in the early years of its history. In 1894 he took charge of the congregation at Northampton, and it was hoped that the fine new church erected there by Sir Philip and Lady Manfield would be the scene of many years of his ripest service. Owing, however, to a most regrettable misunderstanding he felt bound, for conscience sake, to resign this charge, and though he often preached again, both there and elsewhere, that was his last stated ministry. Ever industrious and impatient of enforced idleness, he studied and wrote on, and he leaves a manuscript "Life of Jesus," into which he put the results of wide reading and deep thought. The end found him at work. He was writing a sermon on Sunday, the 1st inst., when an attack of the heart seized him. He rallied sufficiently to send loving messages to his intimate friends, but with merciful swiftness and absence of severe pain he sank quietly to rest.

Mr. Freckelton was twice married; he leaves a son surviving from the four children of the first marriage, and the three children, a son and two daughters, of the second. Last February his second wife, a gentle, indefatigable woman died. With characteristic fortitude he conducted her funeral service himself. His own funeral took place on Monday, at Northampton Cemetery, the same extremely simple order of service as he compiled for his wife's funeral being read by the Rev. Arthur Harvie. There was a large gathering representative of the church and of the general public.

A man of strenuous devotion and fearless mind, impulsive and yet constant, a shrewd critic and a tender-hearted friend, he used his talents, which were many, to the full. He had his disappointments; but surely a life like his is an achievement in itself, and there are "no shadows yonder." W. G. TARRANT.

THE Wesleyans have drawn up a scheme in regard to army chaplains which, according to the report in the Methodist Times, has been approved by the War Office; if the scheme is sanctioned by the Conference, Wesleyan army chaplains will have temporary commissions, and yet will still be under the disciplinary control of the Conference.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHILDREN have so much to think about in these days, with their school, their games and play, their toys, their companions, and such a number of possessions and treasures, that they have not many thoughts to spare for much else. But there are some thoughts which I often think should find more room in their minds than they do.

I have seen many children at their games or at their meals, and whatever they want must be attended to at once. Whether their mother is talking to a visitor, or busy over her books or accounts, or cutting out clothes for the children, or serving out their meals to them, there is a clamour and an outcry. "Mother, give me that;" "Mother, I want some more;" "Mother, lend me your knife;" "Mother, may I have this?" and never a moment can they wait; they clamour more and more.

There was a thought that should have been there which was absent. What was it?

It was a thought for mother, and not only for themselves.

When Gerald's mother said to him, as he was leaving the room, "Don't go into Arthur's room, Gerald," he answered, "Oh yes, mother, I want to go." Arthur was not well; and his mother said again, "No, Gerald, I don't wish you to go"; and he stood holding the door, and said, "Why, Mother?" "Because I don't wish it, dear." "But why, mother: why don't you wish it?" And he continued to say "Why" to everything his mother said, and stood kicking the door with his foot, and looking cross and discontented.

There again there was a thought missing. What was it?

It was respect for his mother's wishes, even though she could not tell him her reasons.

And children have no right to ask from their parents all the reasons for what they wish. Their parents are much older and wiser than the children, and know a great many things and have a great many reasons which the children cannot know; and it is their part to trust them, and not worry them with trying to get to the bottom of everything. Parents are very unwilling to refuse their children anything if they can help it, and I am afraid that the children get rather selfish, and do not consider their parents enough. Even mother gets tired and needs to be let alone, and have a little peace; and when she has friends with her the children should learn not to go on asking for things, and interrupting the elder people's talk, and being in the way. They need self-control and unselfishness.

You can hardly guess how any little thoughtfulnesses and unselfishnesses touch your mother's heart, or how much happier they make her. If you did not wait to be asked to do things for her, but thought of them yourself, it would be delightful to her. If you saw her going to fetch something, and said to her, "Let me go, mother," and then ran at once without waiting, it would be only right and what you ought to do; and mother would be so pleased—much more pleased to see you kind and thoughtful than to be saved going herself. There are countless things all through the day that a loving and watchful child will find to do to help and please others. Some children's father or mother has been taken from them, and what would the children not give then to be able to do the least thing for them? The thoughtfulness and unselfish kindness must not be all left to the parents; the children should share it, and try to be kind and thoughtful to others also.

A very little boy, one day when his mother was out for a long time in the cold and wet, fetched her shoes from her bedroom and put them on the hearth before the fire to warm for her when she came home. When she came back the poor shoes were all burnt to a cinder, because he had been so anxious that they should be nice and warm that he had put them too near the fire. Poor little fellow, he was so sorry and disappointed that he began to cry, but his mother only laughed and was so merry over the poor shoes that he was soon laughing too; and she thanked him for taking such care of her.

There was one little girl who was so anxious to help everyone, and was always doing so many things for everyone else, that her brothers and sisters complained that they never got a chance, because Molly was always first. I am afraid very few of us are like that! Very often if mother says "Clara, run upstairs and fetch me that frock that needs mending," Clara says, "Yes, mother, directly; just let me finish this first." But Clara should go at once. If Molly were there Clara would have no chance—for the frock would be fetched before Clara was ready.

There were some children who were very fond of drawing; and on Sunday evenings, when their mother went to church with their father (who was a minister) and the children stayed at home, they used every Sunday to do a little drawing; perhaps it was what they called a "play drawing," which was one done from fancy without any copy; or they copied something out of an illustrated book—the Bible, Shakespeare, an A.B.C. book, or wherever they thought the pictures pretty. Often the drawings were very funny indeed; and sometimes it was a scramble to get them finished before bed-time; but when bed-time came the children ran to their mother's room and pinned the drawings on to her pincushion, with an inscription, "For dear mamma," and then off they went to bed, and listened eagerly for her and father to come home, and heard her go into her room, and they imagined to themselves the surprise with which she would find the usual little drawings there. Then she used to come and say good-night to the children, and thank them lovingly for their drawings, and learn all that they had done while she was away. She always loved to have the little drawings; and long years afterwards, when the children had long been grown up, and the dear mother had passed away to the hidden life in heaven, some of these little drawings were found pasted into her diary and lovingly treasured all the rest of her life. It was not because they were pretty or good, but because they spoke of love and thoughtfulness, and made her happy.

"Look not each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others," as St. Paul said, hundreds of years ago; and have we not learnt it yet?

AN OPEN TRUST.

IN reply to the friendly criticisms of the Liverpool Daily Post on the subject of doctrinal subscription or non-subscription as the true basis of Church life, the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG addressed a letter to that journal, which appeared in Monday's issue, with a brief article by the Editor in further comment. The chief passages of Mr. ARMSTRONG'S letter we shall reproduce here, but first have something to add to what we wrote last week on the position taken up by the Daily Post in the leading article of Feb. 7.

An Open Trust, it was there maintained, is of no special advantage as regards the progress of liberal religious thought: the Broad Churchman in his nominally creed-bound Church has as much liberty as the Unitarian is his Free Church. At the same time, there is great advantage in a standard of dogmatic orthodoxy, from which a clergyman may depart (so it was added on Monday) only so far "as public opinion permits."

In support of this view it was pointed out that the liberty allowed by an Open Trust "does not lead to any conspicuous departure from the accustomed tenets of the Unitarians," that DR. MARTINEAU "never went as far from his orthodoxy—that is to say, from the Unitarian beaten track—as many Trinitarian preachers have gone from their orthodoxy—their beaten track—regardless of their trust-deeds or signed confessions of faith," and that, in one specific instance, the congregation of Hope-street Church was rather frightened by the heresies of Mr. GELDART, one of the successors to MARTINEAU'S free pulpit, while at the same time a neighbouring Broad Church clergyman was propounding even more extreme views to his congregation—of course, regardless of the doctrinal standards of his Church.

The argument implied in this statement does not show a clear perception of the meaning of an Open Trust, nor does this subsequent sentence in the same article, adduced in support of the defensive advantages of a creed :—

Earnest religionists are not likely to run the risk of committing themselves to the uncontrolled speculations of ministers expressly liberated from the restraints of a common understanding between them and their Church.

There is a common understanding between minister and people united in the service and worship of a Free Church. The understanding is, not that they have a standard of orthodoxy to maintain, but that as one people they are united in a common religious life, for worship of the living GOD, in bonds of sympathy and a general agreement on the great questions of the religious life. A people of one mind will not desire for their minister a man of a mind diametrically opposed to their highest thought of GOD, but minister and people alike by their fundamental principle are open to all the light of truth, and the charge laid upon the minister is simply that he shall speak the whole truth as it is made clear to him. If there should come to be so great a divergence between his teaching and the prevailing thought of the people that the bond of living sympathy in worship is severed, the connection must naturally cease, for the purpose of the union can no longer be fulfilled. What is secured by the principle of the Open Trust is that there is freedom for the natural movements of thought, it is recognised that the unfolding of truth in religious life is progressive, and the best conditions for perfect sincerity are secured. The minister declares the new truth that has possessed his soul, not in spite of the doctrinal pledges which he has given and the standards of his Church, but in fulfilment of his recognised calling as a teacher of spiritual religion and a free servant of Truth. There can be no cry of heresy in such a Church, if the members are true to its undogmatic principle. If "uncontrolled speculations" should destroy the harmony of religious life, which must unite a worshipping assembly as one people, and the minister can no longer minister, the connection made by an honourable understanding as honourably ceases—but it is a matter of experience that in the fellowship of our Free Churches the living union of sympathy in worship is able to include a considerable diversity of doctrinal belief, of which no one form claiming to be orthodox can stigmatise the rest as heresy.

As a matter of fact, Dr. MARTINEAU was regarded with suspicion and dislike as an innovator and teacher of dangerous doctrine by a large number of Unitarians of the period which saw the publication of his "Endeavours after the Christian Life," and for years after that. If he had not been minister of a Free Church, if there had been any standard of Unitarian orthodoxy to which he was bound to conform, or any method of Church discipline that could have been put in motion against him, doubtless there would have been a heresy trial and he would have been expelled from the connection. Yet even if he had deviated much less than he did from "the Unitarian beaten track," the advantage of his unbound position would have remained, for the reason of that absence of change would have been not the artificial restraint of a creed to which he was obliged to conform his thought and his teaching, but simply that truth in the open sincerity of his mind had not led him further.

The full significance, however, of the Open Trust in the churches into the heritage of which MARTINEAU was born becomes clearer still when we take a wider view of their history. The founders of those churches knew nothing of any "Unitarian beaten track," they were staunch Trinitarians, but they left their churches free from dogmatic limitations; many of them are established on a trust simply for the worship of Almighty GOD, or in other terms equally broad, and the result has been that in an unbroken continuity of religious life congregations have passed through such radical changes of theological thought, not by sudden revolution, but by a process of natural development, from the strictest orthodoxy to the Unitarianism of to-day. But now as of old, and perhaps with a fuller comprehension of the significance of that great principle, they are Free Churches, unbound to any Unitarian orthodoxy, as they were formerly unbound to any of the elder forms of doctrine which with equal sincerity have been held. The churches are dedicated to Truth and to GOD, that is the Trust placed in the hands of ministers and people together in their common devotion to sincere religious life, and we believe that such a position is safer and happier and infinitely to be preferred to that of a Church pledged to the maintenance of a fixed standard of doctrine, which in the nature of things cannot remain true to the progressive thought of an earnest people.

The Church of England is still bound to that preposterous anachronism, the so-called Athanasian Creed, and the Presbyterian Church to the Westminster Confession. These are the worst examples of the fetters which are supposed to bind the great Churches to a strict orthodoxy; and if they cease to bind, it is in defiance of pledges solemnly given. In contrast to these stand the Churches which openly declare their trust in the freedom of the Spirit and the binding power of truth and religious sympathy. The harmfulness of dogmatic fetters Mr. ARMSTRONG again emphasised in his letter in Monday's Daily Post, explaining the position which Dr. MARTINEAU maintained with such ardent faith. Having enumerated the several methods by which it is attempted to secure doc-

Now, it seemed to Dr. Martineau that this system tended to two kinds of unveracity ; and, in using that word, let me again plead that I am far indeed from desiring to impugn the loyalty of any man to the behests of conscience as he interprets them. It is only that Martineau, and some of us who follow him, read those behests so as to yield somewhat different contents to the word "veracity" to those usually found in it. But, taking his own reading of the meaning of the term "veracity," Martineau found in the accepted ecclesiastical system, shared by the Roman, the Anglican, and the great Evangelical communions, a tendency to lead to two kinds of unveracity.

The one is the temptation of timid men, the other is the temptation of bold men. Let us glance at either variety.

To the timid man comes the temptation to suppress his genuine religious convictions—to hide his doubts, or to pretend to believe that which he believes no longer. You suggest, sir, that the man who should yield to this temptation "would be a poor creature." It may be so ; but it is difficult to believe that you can be unaware that there are many men in all the creed-bound denominations who do thus yield ; and I, for one, am in no haste to mete out judgment against them. There are, I imagine, few of us to whom some "orthodox" brother has not poured out his secret of private doubt and disbelief—a man often of devout and earnest life, but torn by scepticism concerning miracles, or the doctrine of the Trinity, or other contents of their official creeds. Then such men are entangled in the miserable casuistry of the problem whether they ought to sacrifice a post of public usefulness to intellectual scruples, or in the fiercer struggle with the problem whether it is, indeed, the call of the Lord to them to rob wife and children of bread for the sake of an ideal truth. I have known many to whom this problem has been very urgent. Some have decided one way, some the other. But I think, sir, that a very little inquiry will convince you that there are tens of thousands in the Churches to whom the question between naked veracity or a little accommodation and compromise is a very real and a very terrible one.

So much for the timid man ; now for the bold one.

You seem to suggest, sir, that the man who, having obtained his position by accepting certain prescribed conditions, treats some of those conditions as null and void may very properly leave his conscience in the keeping of the ecclesiastical courts. But to Dr. Martineau it would have seemed that to a fine sense of honour it would not be enough for a man to know that a court of judicature would not condemn him ; but that rather he must carry to the court of conscience the question whether he is or is not doing that which he has engaged to do. And Dr. Martineau lamented the spectacle of men reading in liturgies in the solemn exercise of worship, when, if ever, the heart should be a pure well of truth, phrases to which their own convictions gave no assent, or which they strove by legerdemain to twist into non-natural senses. And so it gave him no pleasure to hear these bold men enunciating in their sermons heresies wholly at variance with the pledges by which they held their offices, or with the authorised formularies which they had pronounced but half an hour earlier with what should have been consecrated lips ; for to him it seemed that if, in the market, in the forum, in the home, an unadulterated truthfulness was binding on a man of honour, that claim had no less force in the house of prayer. And I think he would have had a tenderer judgment for the man whose timidity made him hide his heresies than for him whose boldness led him to avow them while still consenting to the position and the language which, if his boldness had been of a nobler type, would have been to him impossible.

But it must be freely admitted that herein Martineau's conception of the demands of veracity does not carry with it the concurrence of the majority of men ; and one remembers that, in a pamphlet published thirty years ago, on "The Ethics of Conformity and Subscription," Professor Henry Sidgwick deliberately discussed the precise measure of "insincerity" ethically lawful for a clergyman.

Finally, sir, may I commend to your readers a little book, "Types of Religious Experience," just published by Mr. Philip Green, London, which recounts the several experiences of the Revs. E. W. Lummis (now of Warrington), W. Wooding, G. V. Crook, A. Webster, and Dr. L. De B. Klein (now of Liverpool) in their original homes in the Church of England, the Congregational, the Methodist, and the Presbyterian communions, and the Roman Church respectively, and in their subsequent journey to Unitarianism? This profoundly interesting work will illustrate better than I can pretend to do, first, the grave evils incident to every system of externally controlled religious thought ; and, secondly, the sense of reinvigorating enfranchisement felt by brave men who have pushed their way through into a communion of non-subscribing churches.

We may be well content to leave the matter there. The Daily Post, in a further short article, still insists that a free mind can always have liberty under subscription : but we repeat our question of last week, At what cost? Surely the affirmation is too positively made that "Preachers accept the duty because they accept the doctrines." Many accept the duty in spite of some of the doctrines which they cannot wholeheartedly accept. Even the Daily Post looks upon the creeds and articles in such a light that a way must be found "of rendering them innocuous." We cannot understand why it should pass the wit of Churchmen to devise some wholesome means of securing that "earnest agreement" as to the methods and aims of worship and religious fellowship, essential to a healthy Church life, without "subscriptions to confessions," which are not confessions of perfect truth.

MR. J. H. LEIGH will commence his tenth annual series of Shakesperean Dramatic Readings at the Steinway Hall on Tuesday evening, March 3, at half-past eight, with "Richard III.," to be followed on Tuesdays, March 17 and 24, and April 7, by "Henry V.," "Julius Cæsar," and "Othello" respectively. There will be music specially composed or selected at each reading.

THE "NON CON CLUB."

II.

A MINUTE in the records of the March meeting of 1833 has an unpleasantly familiar ring. "The principles of the Irish Coercion Bill now in progress through the House of Commons were discussed ; and various and opposite opinions expressed on their merits." The secretary was discreet, and we are not much the wiser as to the line adopted by the Club on the apparently interminable Irish question. It is rather noticeable, by the way, that Irish affairs are seldom mentioned as forming matter of deliberation at the quarterly dinners. Only too probably the opinions held by members were so many, and so various, not to say antagonistic, that the Non Cons shrank from debating this very thorny subject, as other and less courageous spirits have done since their time.

Towards the close of the same year, steps were taken by the Government of the day to inquire into the state of education in the country ; and a committee was appointed by the Club to watch the proceedings on behalf of the Nonconformists. It was suggested by Dr. Rees, one of the staunchest of the Club's members, that the committee should also make an inquiry into the numerical strength of the Dissenters ; but this proposal was not carried out. Several members objected to it on the ground that the return would not be reliable, as owing to exclusion from Church membership on account of tests imposed by the more orthodox, the numbers would probably appear smaller than they actually were. One could wish that the Doctor's suggestion had been acted upon ; it would have been interesting to compare the unknown strength of the Dissenting body in 1833 with its power in 1903, and particularly so in connection with a matter of national education.

It was about this time that a strife arose within the Nonconformist body itself, between the Independents and the Presbyterians. The former were the aggressors, and a dispute over the management of the Orphan Working School in the City-road seems to have led to a series of attacks upon the Presbyterian trusts. The daily Press, according to the Club minutes, "was much used by the orthodox Dissenters to inflame the public mind against the more liberal," and the struggle was keenly followed by the Non Con members. Mr. Dewey, minister of New Bedford, U.S.A., was a guest at a Club dinner during the controversy, and the prevailing feeling is well shown in the wording of the proposal giving his health :

Mr. Dewey ; and may the Independents of Old England become as liberal and enlightened as those of New England.

Another toast at the same dinner was :

Earl Grey and His Majesty's Ministers. May they remain in office till every grievance of which any Englishman can fairly complain shall be removed.

Unless the remedy of grievances was more rapid then than now, the Premier and his Cabinet might well have been excused from agreement with the wish.

There is a feeling—seldom expressed, it is true, but none the less maintained and even fostered in some quarters—that Liberalism is inconsistent with loyalty. The Non Cons were nothing if not loyal, though they put principles before princes, and the King's health, instead of heading the toast list, followed after the Club had drunk to John Milton. But no Tories could have cried out against treason and conspiracy more solemnly than they, as is shown by the following impressive words, given at a meeting on Nov. 5, 1835:

May the memory of this day, and the fate of the Grand Master of privy conspiracy be a warning to all men who enter into illegal and anti-liberal lodges!

Did not the shade of Guy Fawkes cock its hat a trifle on hearing itself so styled, and find some consolation in the description for the very unflattering effigies of its mortal frame that the little boys carried about the streets that day?

In 1837 one of the most distinguished of the Club's members took his seat at the table. Henry Crabb Robinson had been proposed by Mr. Aspland two years previously, but his actual election was long delayed.

The foundation of the University of London by an examining body was an event of the greatest importance in modern Nonconformist history. The movement had been set on foot some time previously, and had been received by the orthodox most ungraciously. The opening of University College in 1828 was greeted by "Thomas Ingoldsby" with a parody on Canning's "University of Göttingen," in which savagery is only partially redeemed by humour; and Professor Wilson had sneered at it in the "Noctes Ambrosianæ." In earlier days the Non Cons had hoped in vain for the opening of the old Universities to all classes and to all beliefs; the foundation of University College had given England unfettered University teaching, and the charter of 1837 now enabled a fresh body to confer degrees which were not to be confined to members of any sect or school of doctrine. But the proposal moved by the Committee of the Senate on degrees in Arts, that candidates should be examined in the Old and New Testaments and in Scripture History, at once caught the attention of the Non Con Club. The desirability of the examination was discussed, and the matter was only allowed to rest on the assurance of Dr. Jerrard, a member of the Senate, who was present at the meeting as a guest, that the examination would be optional, and that no question would be put that had been objected to by any member of the governing body. The regulation finally adopted was that no question should be asked upon any doctrinal point disputed between Christians or such as to require an expression of religious belief on the part of the candidate.

And so year after year the Club continued true to its principles. The minutes are usually brief, and even meagre; but they show clearly that the Non Cons were no mere dining and debating society, but a body of active reformers, who were always ready to put into practice the decisions they arrived at in their quarterly discussions. Probably their influence was felt more than acknowledged; the only reform that can be certainly traced to its origin in their meetings was the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts; but there was scarcely a movement in the cause of liberty to which the Non Cons did not give their ardent support.

Between the November dinner of 1845 and the first meeting in 1846, held in February instead of March, the Club sustained the heaviest blow that could have fallen upon it, in the death of its founder, Mr. Robert Aspland.

He was alike distinguished [write two of his colleagues] for the wisdom of his counsels, and the energy of his exertions. This was especially manifested on occasion of the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, a measure the agitation of which originated with this Club, and whose final success was essentially promoted by Mr. Aspland's judicious and effective services. . . . The Dissenters' Marriage Act was another addition to the rights and privileges of Nonconformists, with which in conjunction with the late Mr. Edgar Taylor we are beholden to the enlightened suggestion of Mr. Aspland. And when the decline of his health and strength had awakened in the minds of his friends the most painful apprehensions, he still continued to exert himself as long as he was permitted to attend to public business.

The Club survived its founder six years; the dinners were held as usual, and vacancies were readily filled up; yet there are signs that its activity was somewhat relaxed. It is well that a society should be founded for sufficient cause, and it is well that it should cease to exist at the proper time, and not drag on after its activity is a thing of the past. The time came when the Non Cons recognised that it was best to break up their society before decay set in; and on Thursday, July 5, 1852, the members having met at the Freemasons' Tavern, and the Rev. Edward Tagart being in the chair, it was sadly agreed "That this Club be now dissolved." Two only of the original members, Dr. Rees and Mr. Richard Taylor, were on the roll and took their places at the last meeting.

They said that the objects for which the Club had been founded were achieved. Hardly so; fifty years have passed since its dissolution, and still the cause of liberty and justice to all men cries aloud for championship. And still the call is answered, for the spirit of the old Puritans lives in these latter days, too. Another Club may perhaps succeed to the Non Con traditions in the same spirit that inspired its members when they met together to toast John Milton, the Memory of the Two Thousand and Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over.

ROBIN ROSCOE.

"WHITEFIELD'S TABERNACLE," in Tottenham Court-road, rebuilt some five years ago, so as to seat over a thousand people, and burdened with a debt of nearly £8,000, has been taken over by the London Congregational Union, to be devoted to the work of a Central Mission, of which it is hoped that the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, of Kensington, will take charge.

THE Rev. Alfred E. Garvie, M.A., B.D., who since 1895 has been minister of the Montrose Congregational Church, has accepted the professorship of Ethics, the Philosophy of Theism and Comparative Religion, at New and Hackney Colleges, and will enter upon his duties at Hampstead next session. Mr. Garvie, who is forty-two years of age, and as a student distinguished himself both at Glasgow and Oxford, is well known as a writer on theological subjects, his most substantial work being perhaps his exposition and estimate of the "Ritschlian Theology," published in 1899.

"BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH."

SIR,—I intend this to be my last letter on the above subject, but it is both my right and my duty to say a final word.

1. Mr. Robinson still insists that I am "hardly fair" to Mr. Blatchford's doctrine of a supposed necessary relation between the virtues and low wages under our present system. He says the doctrine "cannot be separated from the context, which is directed to the contention that these things (virtues) will not of themselves bring about the social elevation of the workers, for which the writer yearns." But who disputes the said contention? Does any Socialist more constantly ask for legislation than, for example, the Temperance reformer? The whole question is whether Mr. Blatchford's means of achieving the end which all right-minded men desire are good. It is possible to choose means so badly as to miss the end fatally—to flood a city in order to extinguish a fire in a house, or to pour out the child with the bath. Of such a kind would be the result, if Mr. Blatchford's argument on morals and wages were generally accepted by those for whom it is intended. Whether it is contradicted by experience for such reasons (increasing municipalisation, &c.) as are vaguely assigned by Mr. Robinson, is a large question. But, in any case, the municipalisation of gas is a short step to the nationalisation of all capital, and gives us practically no idea of the meaning and effect of such a measure; and anyone who endangers anything actual which is good for the sake of a hazy ideal which is at best very remote, anyone who uses arguments which have the slightest tendency either to check moral effort or to excite the violent and subversive instincts, should realise that he assumes the heaviest responsibility, that he should doubt himself many times, and should long and deeply scrutinise his thoughts.

2. Mr. Robinson thinks that the recognition of the ambiguity of the word "workers" is "an essential part of Mr. Blatchford's argument," and that I fall into a "misconception" through not seeing it in that light. Singularly enough, his evidence consists first of two quotations from the very passage on p. 32 to which I called attention, and from which I actually quoted the most telling words. His third quotation occurs only four pages further on, where Mr. Blatchford is analysing the distribution of the produce of a factory, and is obliged to recognise that the working owner has claims as a "worker"—the fact stares him plainly in the face. This passage, too, I had noted as one of the few (I believe there are no others) in which Mr. Blatchford admits an obvious truth which it is fatal to ignore. Mr. Robinson does not seem to see the seriousness of Mr. Blatchford's almost complete neglect of this truth. The question I ask is, If Mr. Blatchford acknowledges that the capitalist is often a "worker," and if this fact is "an essential part of his argument," why does he entirely ignore it in all general statements of his theory of production and distribution? Why does he say baldly, "The capitalist produces nothing," "The workers produce all the wealth"? I suggest to Mr. Robinson that the "misconception" is on his side, and that his answer to my question proves the fact. He says:—

I wish that Mr. Blatchford had dropped the personal terms "landlord" and "capitalist," and had used the economic terms "land and capital." His argument would have been just as sound, and he would have avoided the personal note, which, to do him justice, he disclaims in the plainest way.

Such a wish is both irrelevant and vain. "Landlord" and "capitalist" are as strictly economic terms as "land" and "capital." The whole question is about persons and what is due to them. Land and capital can of themselves do no good and no harm. They have neither virtue nor vice, merit nor demerit. Do not Socialists themselves demand that institutions be "humanised"? Mr. Blatchford would wholly fail in his object if he were not personal, and it is because his arguments must be personal that they should be sifted to the bottom without class prejudice. They would not be made less false than they are by verbal changes of the kind suggested.

The real reason why he makes no distinct allusion to the worker-capitalist, when he makes his formal statements of his theory of production and distribution, is that his plea for nationalisation is founded upon those statements—and his plea for much else. Turn to Chap. XVII. on "The Need for a Labour Party."

During an election there are Tory and Liberal capitalists, and all of them are friends of the workers. During a strike there are no Tories and no Liberals amongst the employers. They are all capitalists and enemies of the workers. Is there no logic in you workers? (P. 150.)

Neither of the political parties is of any use to the workers, because both the political parties are paid, officered, and led by capitalists whose interests are opposed to the interests of the workers. The Socialist laughs at the pretended friendship of Liberal and Tory leaders for the workers. These party politicians do not in the least understand what the rights, the interests, or the desires of the workers are; if they did understand, they would oppose them implacably. The demand of the Socialist is a demand for the nationalisation of the land, and of all other instruments of production and distribution. The party leaders will not hear of such a thing. (P. 151.)

In these sentences where is the recognition of the worker-capitalist? He is altogether ignored. And for what purpose? To set "the workers" against "the capitalists." And what are the means adopted? A short word of four letters occurs to me, but I will say instead — statements which have the illusory strength of audacity and vehemence, and the real weakness of wild exaggeration. Did no capitalists aid the dockers when out on their great strike? Have none helped the Penrhyn quarrymen? Has neither of the political parties done anything for the working-classes in the past? And is there nothing worth doing—short of universal nationalisation—which can be done by either in the present and future? Do no capitalists "in the least understand what the rights, the interests or the desires of the workers are"? Do all, or even many, regard their own interests as entirely "opposed to those of the workers"? Strange to say, Mr. Blatchford himself can summon the party politicians to his support when it suits him. In his first chapter, under the heading "Reliable Evidence," he quotes from them strong and sympathetic words upon social evils and the duty of dealing with them.

"Is there no logic in you workers?" I hope and believe there is, and that they will see that the recognition of the worker capitalist (which with Mr. Blatchford is but a momentary concession) must be made fully and consistently by anyone who wishes to understand and improve our industrial life, or to do bare social and political justice.

Earnest and liberal-minded men of every recent generation (J. S. Mill pre-eminent among them) have desired to see working-men elected to Parliament. To-day there are more than ever who would rejoice to see a strong and well-directed movement for this purpose among "the workers." But a movement on Mr. Blatchford's lines, and in the spirit of the above and other passages, can only lead them, even if victorious, to utter disaster.

3. With regard to the question whether a retired worker ("capitalist" or other) has a right to interest on money lent, Mr. Robinson admits the essential point. For lending Hodge a spade "I am entitled to remuneration, for the spade was mine and Hodge wanted it." There remains only the question whether Mr. Robinson in such circumstances may bear the name "producer." He objects. So be it. Upon no one would I force a title, however suitable, honourable and well deserved. But I now ask — If Mr. Robinson, as retired worker turned spade-lender and interest-receiver, refuses to be called a producer, what place is there for him in Mr. Blatchford's theory or scheme? The answer is, none. "We want the fruits of labour for those who produce them." (P. 151.) "The capitalist produces nothing." (P. 32.) I cannot find anywhere in the book any recognition of any right on Mr. Robinson's part. I can find only insinuations about his idleness, &c. (e.g. on pp. 13, 14, 36). I hope, for Mr. Robinson's sake, that he can find something more favourable to himself. If not he must starve—unless, indeed, he comes to see that Mr. Blatchford's thinking and writing on this subject will bear mending, and that he need not be bound by it.

4. Mr. Robinson thinks that Mr. Blatchford appeals to the workers to adopt the supposed capitalist principle of self-interest or selfishness for mere argument's sake. Would that the fact were so. It is not. His phrase, "Let us take them at their word," does indeed resemble in form the usual logical preliminary to a reductio ad absurdum. But, though Mr. Blatchford is often the most helpless victim of verbal snares, I cannot make that apology for him in this instance.

He sets forth selfishness, not as absurd, but as worthy of imitation. He advises, not the temporary acceptance of a proposition in reasoning, but the deliberate adoption of a motive of conduct. Consider his first inference on coming to details.

Therefore as a selfish man, alive to your own interests, it is clear that you will not trust the rich man, nor believe in the unselfishness of his motives. (P. 10.)

Is there not here some flavour of the doctrine, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"? Again, mark the note on which he ends. On p. 14 luxurious living is held up, not to excite aversion, but for subtle suggestions of another kind, which must be read in full to be appreciated. No, the case is by no means one of mere argument. If a man insists, against me, that a certain road leads to London and I accept his reasonings provisionally and set forth with him to test them by the proof of trial, the result is only the settlement of a point of debate. But if, as we pass a rich man's house, my companion whispers that gold is good and easily obtainable, and I give place to his motive and act upon it, the result is a crime. How enormous the difference between these two ways of "taking a man at his word"!

I by no means say that self-interest has no legitimate place among motives (in some men it becomes identical with disinterestedness) or that Mr. Blatchford never prompts it wisely. But confessedly he appeals to it in the very spirit which Socialists have constantly denounced. Either, then, the traditional Socialist view needs revising, or Mr. Blatchford is corrupting Socialism and even neutralising the better parts of his own work. I am by no means insensible of the amount or of the tone of these better parts. I note with pleasure how often he is candid enough to contradict his own errors. These errors are, however, so dangerous, when thus spread broadcast, that it has seemed to me a duty to truth, and to the cause of progress which Mr. Blatchford himself has at heart, to call special attention to them.

H. RAWLINGS.

THE NATIVE LABOUR QUESTION IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR,—Your note on this subject in your last issue takes advantage of the strong feeling so properly existing against anything like slavery in any form to condemn in advance and in very strong terms proposals which, as far as is at present known, have nothing whatever in common with slavery.

I have just returned from a visit to South Africa, and have seen and heard enough to enable me to realise on the one hand the serious nature of the native problems calling for solution; and on the other, that public spirit is as active and high-minded in South Africa as it is in England. Any immoral bargain with the mine-owners for their special benefit is entirely out of the question. Whatever is ultimately done will be in the interests of society as a whole, and not for the benefit of a particular class.

In Natal at present the white population is 60,000, as against 750,000 African blacks, and yet it has been found necessary to import Indian coolies to do work which the Natal natives decline to do. Mr. John Shepstone, a former judge of the Natal Native High Court, says:—

The native must be compelled to take his part with us, and do his share towards the development and progress of the country, or else he will be elbowed out. He must be treated justly but firmly; it will be no hardship for him to be kept well under control.

It must be borne in mind that we have profoundly altered the life of the natives that have passed under our control. We have freed them from the severe and arbitrary rule of their chiefs; we have stopped native wars; we have enabled them to earn, if they will, high wages; so much so, to put the case very moderately, that a man can earn enough in one year to keep him for three, and enough in five years' steady work to live as a gentleman—i.e., without labour, for the rest of his life. Unless by taxation or some other means the African native can be induced to become a steady worker, he is certain, as Mr. Shepstone says, to be elbowed out by Europeans; or, as is more probable, by Asiatics. He cannot for an indefinite period remain a drone in a country where labour is so well paid and the demand for it so great.

It is no hardship to put the African native under more control than the European. Any civilisation he has is only skin-deep; he is a child with the passions and strength of a man. He has never before been accustomed to the personal freedom he has obtained under our rule. We can teach him no better lesson, as a first step in civilisation, than that of steady industrial work under fair conditions.

Incidentally it may be said the Zulus, who for reasons connected with their religion object to work below ground, are never, therefore, engaged for that purpose.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will kindly allow me to state in your columns that circulars relating to the above have been posted to the secretaries of all the churches on the roll of the Conference, inviting the selection of one delegate, for whom hospitality will be provided if required, in addition to the minister.

May I also direct special attention to the provisions of Rule 8, by which each congregation has the right to nominate a candidate for election to the new committee.

CHAS. FENTON, Acting Hon. Sec.
"Cranford," Vineyard-hill,
Wimbledon, Feb. 14.

AN OBSTINATE FALLACY.

SIR,—In his paper on "The Organising Idea of our Churches," Mr. Rudolf Davis lays it down that if any one in an associated group of non-subscribing congregations should develop Trinitarian opinions it ought to be excluded from any interest in the common fund. This proposition seems to show that Mr. Davis uses the word "Unitarian" as equivalent to "Anti-trinitarian"; and further, that he would turn our church-organisation into a scheme for mulcting Trinitarianism in money penalties, and so, inevitably, for limiting our fellowship of churches by a dogmatic test.

I do not "refuse to use the name" Unitarian. On the contrary, I glory in it, and rejoice to belong to the Association which exists to promote Unitarian principles. But I do refuse to define by that word the basis of organisation among the non-subscribing churches; and the fact that it is pre-engaged in the sense in which Mr. Davis employs it is my sufficient reason.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT.

IN reporting on Liverpool Unitarianism and its doings, the forthcoming visit of the Triennial Conference naturally looms largely. I cannot say that there is any widespread excitement on the subject, as the project has not yet impressed itself on the rank and file of our churches; but quietly, without any blowing of trumpets or beating of drums, many of our best workers have been for weeks consulting and organising, and the results of their labours will be apparent in April.

Liverpool bears, deservedly, such a high name by reason of the wealth and munificence of a small group of its Unitarian families, that it seems natural that this Conference should be right royally entertained. Fears are expressed that the scale on which its hospitality will be provided will deter other cities from offering future invitations, through inability to follow such a precedent. This is a very real danger; and there is a feeling here that a limit should be put and adhered to in this regard. But, after all, individuals and Conferences alike only come of age once in their earthly existence. The babe of promise saw light in Liverpool twenty-one years ago. It is surely meet that its majority should evoke a special birthday party, and the future will then return to a normal level.

It is not for me to give away the plan of action. Suffice to say that Liverpool possesses buildings worthy of the occasion, and men bold enough to use them. The rest will depend on the spirit in which ministers, delegates, and general visitors come together. Why should not a Pentecostal outpouring of love and enthusiasm baptise all present, sending them back to their respective churches inflamed with new zeal, and with a deeper faith in the broad Christianity for which we stand? One fact is noteworthy. It is the younger generation of Liverpool Unitarians which is shouldering most of the actual work with splendid courage. If, in all our churches, the young men and young women could be "enthused," the future would be safe. One by one the elders drop out of the ranks, and at times we look round to see who there are to fill the gaps, and almost despair; yet when the occasion comes a Gideon's band is found.

Passing from the Conference to purely local affairs, universal regret prevails at the broken health of two of our respected ministers. Mr. Armstrong's illness cast a cloud over us. Happily, he is better, but limited in strength. We must be careful not to overtax his willing energies, and we trust that, with the help which is forthcoming, he may be able to lead and inspire us for many years. At Southport, too, Mr. Wellbeloved has so broken down that he has to seek a curate. We trust he will soon recover his strength.

Two coming events are of great interest. The Domestic Mission in Mill-street already possesses the noblest block of buildings devoted to such a purpose in our fellowship, and this month a new and beautiful addition will be formally handed over to the Society. Through the foresight and generosity of one gentleman adjoining property was purchased when the main building was erected, and on the site another friend has placed an even more beautiful suite of rooms. Needless to say, the abounding energies of the missionaries and their large staff of lay-helpers can utilise every foot of these growing premises.

Then, in April, the new church for the Birkenhead congregation will be dedicated. It has been long in hand, but will fully repay the delay by its excellence. Mr. Crossley is to be congratulated on the termination of the sojourn in—I won't say the "wilderness"—but in the school-room, and the entrance into the Promised Land, where his preaching and personality will receive a setting worthy of them. We hope for a new era of prosperity for this church.

The remaining churches of our district live a wholesome and uneventful life. Ullet-road Church still rejoices in the noble church-hall so recently added, and uses it well, offering frequent hospitality in it to our various societies and institutions. The small but dainty meeting-room added to the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth is also a real help to congregational life and growth.

Hamilton-road Domestic Mission teems with young and energetic enthusiasm, in startling contrast to the death-in-life which preceded its conversion (in every sense) under Mr. Haigh. If ever events justified a new departure it is here; while under Miss Wells and Mr. Topping the older Bond-street Mission throbs with renewed vitality.

The work of the District Missionary Association in the charge of the Rev. H. D. Roberts has been most energetically conducted. The centres at Garston, Widnes and St. Helens are as yet in their infancy, and if only considered numerically do not show results adequate to the efforts expended on them. But, not many years ago, Liscard and Bootle, being then also infants, might have been similarly looked on as disappointing; yet now they live and thrive and steadily approach the time when they will be self-supporting churches. (By the way, Bootle Free Church will hold a sale of work in March to clear a small remaining debt on the caretaker's cottage. Liverpool Unitarians please note and turn up to encourage and help!) At Liscard the Church Hall has had a gallery added to cope with increasing numbers at social events; and at Bootle some extension of accommodation will be needed before long. Meanwhile Mr. Roberts has had, as regards new centres, to live by faith, not seeing the promises, but hailing them afar off, and working at whatever he has found to do. He has been our handy-man, useful in a multitude of ways, till we have wondered how we got along without a district missionary. His loud and urgent cry is, "Give us more money and there is no limit to our field for work. Give as generously as you give for hospitals, universities, politics and other useful objects. Be generous for mind and soul culture, enlightening the eyes of the blind, unstopping the deaf ears and proclaiming the acceptable year of the Lord!" The fact remains that there is a heavy balance on the wrong side, and either a new and wider spirit of giving must set in, or the work must be curtailed. Mention should, I think, be made of many laymen who have helped Mr. Roberts to keep his different enterprises going. Mr. Hirst, of Gateacre, has also given willing service, while neglecting no usefulness at that restful chapel.

The month of September will, however, see new developments. Mr. Roberts, as announced in your last issue, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Hope-street Congregation to become joint minister with Mr. Armstrong, and a new district missionary will have to be discovered. On whom the mantle will fall remains to be seen, but he will have to be a man of energy and resource if he is to follow worthily in his predecessor's steps.

May I repeat a word I said long ago? In Liverpool we have two institutions which might be copied with great benefit in other cities; I mean the '88 and '96 Clubs, both private organisations, but exercising a wholesome influence in our churches. They were founded, as their names denote, in 1888 and 1896, and consist of ministers of the district and laymen, who periodically dine together and afterwards confer on matters of interest. In the elder club the laymen kindly bear the expense. In the junior and more democratic one, intended especially for the young men of our churches, the meal is simpler, and those who attend pay their own share. In both cases, however, ministers and laymen meet in social intercourse, and learn each other's views on many important matters. Why should not every town have its Unitarian club, by whatever name it might be called?

I now gladly chronicle a great step in advance on a question which not many years ago was frozen out amongst our churches. I mean the temperance movement. As individuals many, notably Miss Johnston, Mr. Shilton, Mr. Armstrong, and others, have done great things, but now we have a Unitarian Temperance Society (note the name!) combining the temperance forces of all our churches, and taking overt action. A limited company has been formed; a well-known lady has lent capital at a low rate of interest, besides giving a large amount; spacious premises near the Mill-street Domestic Mission have been bought, and are being converted into a well-fitted social institute, with coffee-rooms, &c., up to date and of the best sort. The bane of large dividends will be avoided by limiting the interest on shares, and the whole affair is a bonâ fide attempt at counter-attraction as regards the gin palaces.

Returning to Church affairs, I must, in all honesty, name our one failure at Crewe, where a pretty chapel with a good organ and commodious school is locked up with small prospect of being reopened. Were I twenty years younger I should feel like begging the keys from the trustees and making one more attempt to resuscitate the submerged congregation. More unlikely things have happened, and may happen again.

Nantwich is not literally in this district, but as a near neighbour to Crewe, its minister attends our meetings, and we count him as of our district brotherhood. I feel personally interested in this little old chapel, as my grandfather, Rev. James Hawkes, ministered there for twenty-six years, and his earthly remains lie within its walls. I was hopeful that when the Willaston School, founded primarily for Unitarian boys, was opened, its Unitarian scholars might be brought into touch with an old Presbyterian chapel, with its venerable traditions of Dr. Priestley and other worthies. Surely this would be a fitting part of their education as future members of our congregations. When I was at Mr. Herford's school in Lancaster, I was encouraged to teach a class of ragged boys in the St. Nicholas-street Sunday-school. I largely attribute to this fact my call, later on, to missionary work and my thirty odd years of ministerial life. Unfortunately, as I cannot but think, the wisdom (or otherwise) of the managers of Willaston School has ignored and tabooed this venerable monument of the ejected two thousand, in favour of services in the brand new school. And then we lament that so few of the sons of our old families enter our ministry! Is not this unsectarianism run to death?

H. W. HAWKES.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdare: Highland-place.—The Rev. David Evans, of Cwmbach, occupied the pulpit on Sunday evening last, and preached a helpful sermon on "Wayside Opportunities." Some people, he said, were always preparing themselves for some great occasion—waiting to do something great and grand—while all their lives neglecting the most obvious duties by the wayside. The greatest things were often the simplest things. Christ, on the other hand, availed himself of every wayside opportunity, with what magnificent results they knew. Mr. Evans, though a thorough Welshman, is becoming quite as much at home in the English as in the Welsh language, and his sermon was greatly appreciated.

Accrington.—The Rev. H. V. Mills has just concluded a course of week night lectures on "Religion and Evolution" to crowded audiences of about 300 at each lecture, many persons coming over four miles in order to be present.

Bridgwater.—The monthly meeting of the Social Union was held on Monday evening, when a lecture was given by Mrs. Broadrick on "The Life and Writings of Jane Austen." In the unavoidable absence of the President (Miss Margaret Spiller), the chair was taken by the Rev. T. B Broadrick. The most interesting account of Miss Austen's life and sketches of some of the principal characters in her novels were thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated by the audience. Mrs. Broadrick, in returning thanks, expressed the hope that her paper would result in many renewing their acquaintanceship with the charming works of Miss Austen.

Cardiff (Resignation).—The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, B.A., has resigned the pulpit of the Westgrove Church.

Carlisle.—A course of four Monday night lectures was concluded on Feb. 9 in the Viaduct Unitarian Church by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, who spoke on various aspects of Evolution. The four lectures were entitled "The Autobiography of the Earth," "The Evolution of the Physical Body," "The Coming of Mind into the Body," and "From a Molecule to a Soul." The body of the church was quite full at each lecture, and the collections steadily improved, amounting on the last occasion to £1 3s. 2d. Half the audience were strangers.

Colne.—A course of four lectures has been given on Thursday evenings in the Stanley-street Unitarian Chapel by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, the subject being "Evolution." An attendance of about 100 was steadily maintained, and very satisfactory collections were taken at the close of each lecture, many strangers being present.

Kendal.—Under the auspices of the North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association, a course of five Tuesday evening lectures has been given on "Types of Religious Experience." The Rev. J. J. Shaw, of Newchurch, gave the first lecture, which was an eloquent account of his change from Methodism to Unitarianism. He was followed by the Revs. Francis Wood, J. Morley Mills, and E. W. Lummis, and the last lecture was given by the Rev. Charles Hargrove on 10th inst. to an audience of about sixty-five, on "The Catholic Faith of all Religious Men." A similar course of lectures by the same ministers has been given in Lancaster, Preston, and South Shore, Blackpool.

Kilmarnock.—The anniversary services of Clerk's-lane Free Christian Church were held on Sunday last, when the preacher was the Rev. James Forrest, Glasgow, whose sermons were highly appreciated by unusually large congregations. At the annual soirée, on the following evening, the attendance was exceedingly good, and the meeting was bright and pleasant. The minister of the church (the Rev. A. Irvine Innes) gave a satisfactory account of the progress made during the past year, showing that the number of members had been doubled, that the average attendance at worship had of late largely increased with a change of hours, and that there was improvement in all branches of the work of the church. Dr. Barlow, the President of the Scottish Unitarian Association, made an encouraging speech, expressing much satisfaction with the advance that had been made. The Rev. E. T. Russell, Glasgow, spoke of the breadth and beauty of the Unitarian faith, and the importance of being in earnest for its maintenance and propagation. Acknowledging a hearty vote of thanks, the Rev. James Forrest delivered an eloquent and animating speech on the unique history of the church, its gospel of Free Christianity, the pride which the members should take in the past, the work they should do in the present, and the confidence they should have in the future.

Leicester (Appointment).—The Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington, has accepted a call to the pulpit of the Great Meeting, in succession to the Rev. Henry Gow, B.A.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—A meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 14, in the Bootle Free Church Hall. There were between seventy and eighty teachers and friends present, including delegates from Southport, Warrington, Gateacre, Garston, Bond-street, Hamilton-road, Mill-street, Ullet-road, Hope-street, and the Ancient Chapel Sunday-schools. After tea, which was kindly provided by the Bootle teachers, Mr. Cooper (headmaster of the Hope-street day-school) gave a specimen lesson to a class of boys and girls connected with the Bootle Sunday-school. By the use of photographs and the blackboard, and his wonderfully sympathetic way of talking to the children, Mr. Cooper kept their undivided attention for three-quarters of an hour whilst he gave them a most helpful lesson on "The Journey of Life," comparing it all through with that of a traveller ascending the Alps, the subject being divided into five parts, namely, preparing for, the difficulties of, the pleasures of, the helps on, and the guides for, the journey. The teachers present could not fail to be greatly helped by the lesson, together with the children's bright and ready answers, and showed their appreciation by a hearty vote of thanks tendered to Mr. Cooper at the close of the meeting.

London: Islington.—Last Sunday morning, at the conclusion of his sermon, the Rev. Dr. Hicks made a sympathetic allusion to the death of the Rev. T. W. Freckelton, who was for so many years minister of Unity Church. The fortnightly entertainments in connection with Unity Church have been most successful this season, and last Monday's was no exception to the rule. The whole of the proceedings was in the hands of Mr. J. T. Mackey, and with the assistance of friends of the church and Mr. Mackey's private friends, a very excellent programme was secured, including songs, recitations, instrumental music, and a ventriloquial sketch. The lecture-hall was full to overflowing, in fact many failed to gain admission.

Liverpool: North End Mission.—On Wednesday, Feb. 11, a congregational party was held in the Mission Hall, Bond-street, in which a crowded and enthusiastic audience assembled. During the proceedings of the evening, which were enlivened by music by the choir, the opportunity was taken of presenting the Rev. J. L. and Mrs. Haigh with a marble clock and crayon portrait as a token of goodwill and esteem on the occasion of their marriage. Mr. W. G. Topping, who presided, in making the presentation, bore testimony to the great kindness and brotherly sympathy he had received from Mr. Haigh during the time he had been labouring at Bond-street. He very heartily offered the good wishes of the members and friends of the mission to Mr. and Mrs. Haigh. Mr. and Mrs. Haigh both responded, and the Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle, also made a sympathetic and encouraging speech.

Parkstone.—The first anniversary was held in connection with the services at Emerson Hall on Sunday and Monday last. The Sunday afternoon meeting was a most inspiring one. Several friends from Poole attended, and the Hill-street Church choir rendered valuable service, with two anthems. A recitation was given by Mrs. Hickman, and a short address by Mr. Bushrod. At the evening service the congregation numbered seventy-eight and Mr. Bushrod gave a résumé of the year's work taking as his text the words of Haggai, "In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord."

Rotherham.—A successful concert was given on Thursday, Feb. 12, in the schoolroom of the Church of Our Father, in aid of the Sunday-school renovation fund. The programme included tableaux vivants.

South Shields (Resignation).—Mr. Thomas Paxton has resigned his charge at Unity Church, which he has held for the past two years, and is preparing for a course of study at Oxford.

Warrington (Resignation).—The Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., has resigned his charge at Cairo-street Chapel, having accepted an invitation to the Great Meeting, Leicester.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—On Saturday last the thirty-sixth Teachers' Conference, under the auspices of this Union, took place in the schoolroom connected with the Unitarian Church, Fitzwilliam-street, Huddersfield. The attendance, though fairly good, would have been considerably larger but for the clashing of other functions at two or three other schools. It would be well if the secretaries of the schools would bear this in mind in future. After tea the chair was occupied by the President, Councillor Conyers, of Leeds. A hymn having been sung, the Rev. E Ceredig Jones, M.A., of Bradford, read a paper on "Some Sunday School Teachers' Ideals." In the course of the paper, which was of an interesting, instructive, and thoughtful character, Mr. Jones dwelt upon the responsible work of the true and earnest Sunday-school teacher, which should include strong convictions, high and noble character and pure ideals of life, the teaching of love of the school and church on the part of the scholars, sincerity, truthfulness, punctuality, the distinctive tenets of our simple religion, and a special regard for and love of reverence, emphasising the latter most strongly and sincerely. A very interesting discussion followed, in which the Revs. W. Mellor, C. Harvey-Cook, and Charles Hargrove, and Mr. Frederick Clayton took part. A well-deserved vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Jones at the close of the very cheerful and enthusiastic meeting.

POINTS from the PRESS

ON

CADBURY'S COCOA

The MEDICAL MAGAZINE says:

"The favourite Cocoa of the day. For Strength, Purity, and Nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found."

Cadbury's is Cocoa and the Best Cocoa only.

The LANCET says:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to Cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and indeed, pernicious, having regard to the fact that Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."

HEALTH says:

"The perfect purity of CADBURY's Cocoa—a strong point with the makers—constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence and the secret of its universal popularity."

Has stood the Test of Time.

Entirely free from all admixtures.

Absolutely Pure, therefore Best.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hope next week to publish an article by Mrs. Bosanquet, in the series on Questions of Social Economics, the subject being "Relief Works and the Unemployed."

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE has almost entirely recovered from his attack of influenza, but under medical advice did not lecture this week at University College. The concluding lectures of the present course, which are to be on Wordsworth, are now fixed for Thursday next, March 5, and Thursday fortnight, March 19. In the intervening week Mr. Brooke is to preach in Birmingham, at the annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C., presided at a breakfast of the Liberation Society at the Holborn Restaurant on Wednesday, to celebrate the appointment of Dr. Clifford as President of the Society, Mr. Lloyd-George, M.P., and Mr. Carvell Williams as vice-presidents, Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., and Mr. W. Carpenter as treasurers. The Chairman, in a characteristic speech, denounced the official connection of Church and State. He defied any man to point out a single instance in modern history of the State being made more religious by the Church, but he could point out hundreds of instances of the Church being made more irreligious by the State. Dr. Clifford vigorously sounded the note of resistance to the Education Act, with its imposition of a new Church rate. There were, he said, now 16,410 headmasterships of State schools closed to Dissenters, unless teachers in the lower ranks were willing to conform to the Established Church. That was a bribe such as the State ought not to offer. No State could go into the business of hypocrite-making without suffering for it, and he refused to be an accomplice.

THE German Emperor, as we noted in our issue of Jan. 17, for a second time countenanced by his presence, with distinguished members of his Court, a lecture by Professor Friedrich Delitzsch, the Assyriologist, on "Babylon and the Bible" (Babel und Bibel). All through last year echoes of the controversy raised by the Professor's first lecture were heard, orthodox champions of the old theory of revelation in the Bible seeking to discount the conclusions of the modern scholar, based upon the similarities discovered between the religious beliefs of ancient Babylonia and those enshrined in the Old Testament. In his second lecture, Delitzsch returned vigorously to the charge, and the disturbance in orthodox circles has been so great that the Emperor has thought it well to make a pronouncement of his own on the subject. This has taken the form of an autograph letter to Admiral Hollmann, dated Feb. 15, and published in the Grenzboten, a Leipsic weekly paper.

THE Emperor expounds his own views as to revelation, but first deprecates the course taken by Professor Delitzsch, remarking that their Oriental Society was not called upon to enter into the discussion of such questions. "We excavate and we read what we find," says the Emperor, "and publish it for the benefit of science and history"—but must not be made responsible for the conclusions which any individual scholar may draw. Nor are such speculations, however, permissible in academic circles, fit for a popular audience.

Professor Delitzsch, unfortunately, abandoned the strict rôle of the historian and Assyriologist and plunged into theological and religious conclusions and hypotheses which were very nebulous or daring. When he came to deal with the New Testament, however, it soon became clear that with regard to the person of our Saviour he held such extreme views that I not only could not follow him, but was bound to recognise a standpoint diametrically opposed to my own. He does not admit the Divinity of Christ, and therefore he alleges, carrying the argument back to its bearings upon the Old Testament, that that book does not contain any revelation referring to Christ as the Messiah.

The Emperor on the other hand distinctly affirms his faith, in terms which we may suppose will satisfy those who have trembled for his orthodoxy. Two kinds of revelation are recognised by the Imperial theologian, one "continuous, and to some extent historical," the other "purely religious." This latter, beginning with a special revelation of monotheistic truth to Abraham, culminates in the coming of the Messiah, "the greatest revelation of God in the world. For He appeared in the Son himself; Christ is God, God in human form." Of the other kind the Emperor says :—

With regard to the first kind of revelation I have to say that there is to my mind not the slightest doubt that God constantly and continually reveals Himself in the human race, which is His own, and which He has created. He has "breathed His breath" into man—that is to say, He has given man a part of Himself, a soul. He follows with fatherly love and interest the development of the human race: in order to lead it and advance it further, He "reveals" Himself now in this, now in that great sage, whether it be priest or King, whether it be among heathens, Jews or Christians.

And among the great revealers, in this class the Emperor enumerates Moses, Homer, Charlemagne, Luther, Shakespeare, Goethe, Kant, and the Emperor William the Great! "God has certainly 'revealed' Himself to divers persons in divers ways corresponding to the position of a nation and the standard of civilisation it has attained, and He still does so in our day."

As to what may be described as the special revelation of the Christian Dispensation historical criticism may modify some ideas, but its essentials, the Emperor declares, cannot be disturbed.

It is to me self-evident that the Old Testament contains a number of passages which are of the nature of purely human history, and are not "God's revealed word." There are purely historical descriptions of events of every kind which are accomplished in the political, religious, moral, and spiritual life of the people of Israel.

Such was the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, which can only be regarded symbolically as inspired by God. At the same time, while the Old Testament "will certainly undergo considerable alterations under the influence of research and of inscriptions" regarded as the vehicle of revelation, "that does not matter, and another thing which does not matter is that much of the nimbus of the chosen people will disappear. The kernel and the contents will always remain the same—God and His dealings. Religion was never a product of Science; it is an effluence of the heart and being of man arising from his relations with God."

THE German Emperor's excursion into the realm of theology has called forth a reply from Professor Harnack in the March number of the Preussische Jahrbücher, which is fully summarised in Thursday's Times. It is the more significant from the fact that Harnack is not only the leading liberal theologian of Germany, but also a personal friend of the Emperor's. The distinction between two kinds of revelation, Harnack maintains, is inadmissible. "The Evangelical Protestant faith nowadays recognised revelation—apart from the reverent contemplation of the universe—only in persons." The revelation in Christ is supreme only because he is the supreme person of history. "The Divinity of Christ" is not the right formula. Neither Jesus nor his first disciples claimed it, and Harnack urges that the Pauline phrase, "God was in Christ," is as far as we should go in attempting to define what Jesus himself left unexplained of his own relation to the Father. "If ye love me keep my commandments" should be the Christian's watchword; "thereby shall everyone know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another." That is better than the formulæ of theologians, which have been "as rigid as swords."

The thousandth number of Great Thoughts is issued to-day, Feb. 28. Among those who in this number congratulate the Editor, the Rev. R. P. Downes, LL.D., on the success his paper has achieved, are Mrs. Henry Fawcett, the late Edna Lyall, Dean Farrar, Mr. Frederick Harrison, Miss Frances Power Cobbe, Mr. Watts-Dunton, Dr. Clifford, Dr. Fairbairn, the Earl of Meath, Sir Lewis Morris, the Bishop of Ripon and Canon Barnett. The editor of Great Thoughts is a Wesleyan minister, though without a stated charge, and still preaches regularly on Sundays. The first number of his paper was issued Jan. 5, 1884. Mr. Downes had from the first Ruskin's warm sympathy, and permission to make free use of any of his writings. Spurgeon also was among the earliest well-wishers, but said, "We fear it will never pay; people do not want GREAT THOUGHTS; they want Funny Bits." At first it did not pay, but capable friends rallied to its support, and the story of its subsequent success may be read in this number.

OF the congratulations offered to Great Thoughts, in which we heartily join, we will quote two. Miss Cobbe writes:—

I have always highly approved the journal, and rejoiced that among all the silly and idle publications now in vogue there was one in which readers of the class you address might get a glimpse at something loftier and more serious than a ping-pong shuttlecock!

The following words from Canon Barnett well describe the aim of the paper:—

I congratulate you that you have sent out one thousand numbers of Great Thoughts, and that your faith in humanity has been justified. The demand for bread and games is so general, the call for something practical is so common, that it needs faith to hear the cry for ideals. With you I believe in that cry. Men cannot live by bread alone. It is prophets rather than practical men who have opened eras of progress. It is poets who have won the title of makers. There is always a call for ideals, and during these twenty years Great Thoughts has answered the call by giving its readers the ideals which have been born in different ages, in different sects, and in different minds. The thoughts have doubtless been food to many men and women. May your efforts go on to prosper.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark in their spring announcements include some welcome notes as to the promised extra volume of Dr. Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible." The dictionary was completed last year in four volumes, and it is not a supplement, but an extra volume which is now to be added, with full Indexes to the whole work. The following are the publishers' notes:—

During the progress of the Dictionary through the press, it was seen that many of its articles touched somewhat closely upon subjects which lay outside the scope of a Dictionary of the Bible. It is sufficient to name Agrapha, Diaspora, Philo, Josephus, Talmud, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and the Religion of Greece and Asia Minor.

Again, it was felt that certain subjects or portions of subjects invited a fuller treatment than the space at command or the proportion to be observed could afford. This volume will therefore contain a fuller investigation of the English Versions, the Sermon on the Mount, Textual Criticism of the New Testament, Wages, Ships, Religions of Assyria and Babylonia, of Egypt, and of Israel; and the Development of Doctrine in the Apocryphal Age.

There are other subjects, related to one another, which had been treated at quite sufficient length under their own individual titles, but which lose something from being scattered throughout the volumes. A few general articles have been written in order to bring these subjects into relation to one another, e.g., articles on the Races of the Old Testament, on Roads and Travel, New Testament Times, Hours, Papyri, the Style of Scripture, Symbols, &c. All the articles have been written by scholars who have made a special study of the subjects assigned to them.

Although no part of the original plan, many readers have urged the utility of a series of Indexes. The extra volume accordingly contains Indexes of Authors, Subjects, Texts, and Hebrew and Greek Words, covering this volume as well as the four which make up the Dictionary itself.

THE denizens of the Manchester slums are themselves beginning to agitate for better accommodation. It is not to be expected that they can take a wide view of the housing problem. But what comes home to them is the increasing difficulty of finding any sort of a place in which to live and sleep at a rent they can pay, where they can be near their work. Unsanitary buildings have been demolished and no houses put up for the people who are displaced. The Corporation meets with the usual difficulty that it is impossible to acquire land and erect dwelling in the congested areas which can be let at any rent which the poorly paid labourers can afford to pay, without burdening the rates with a large part of the cost. The slum-dwellers see that the immediate cause of their overcrowding or its aggravation is the closing of these disease-breeding dens, and they are holding meetings and calling on the authorities to build houses for them to be let at a cheap rate. To solve the housing problem in this way without an unbearable increase in the rates will need fresh legislation, making easier and cheaper the acquisition of land by the authorities near the centre of the city, and the rating of unoccupied land. Thus the agitation for amended laws would have to go hand in hand with the wise use of existing powers.

THE Manchester Corporation has in hand a scheme for the erection of a good kind of workmen's dwellings on the Blackley estate which it has purchased. These will be suitable for families that are in receipt of good wages. The slum dwellers do not see how this will help them. But if a half-a-dozen such estates were bought and built upon without delay the pressure on the overcrowded areas would be speedily reduced by the migration of the better paid workmen from the centre to the circumference of the city, leaving houses to be occupied by those who are now forced into such close quarters as make healthy and decent life impossible. With good management and wise care in purchasing comparatively cheap land in lots large enough to allow of a pleasant and healthy plan for each district laid out, much can thus be done to improve the dwellings of the people even under existing laws.

OUR readers will be interested to learn that the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have arranged to celebrate the centenary of the birth of Emerson in connection with the Whit-week anniversary meetings when the Essex Hall lecture will be devoted to the influence and place of Emerson as thinker and writer. The lecture will be delivered by Mr. Augustine Birrell, K.C., which will mean that the members of the Association who desire to have seats reserved will have to apply early.

THE LONDON LAYMEN'S CLUB.—Considerable interest has been aroused in London among many of the younger Unitarian laymen by the formation of a club for social intercourse and occasional discussions on topics bearing on our churches and work in the metropolis. An inaugural dinner, attended by nearly seventy laymen, with a few ministers as guests, was held at the Holborn Restaurant on Friday, Feb. 13, Mr. C. Fleetwood Pritchard, Mayor of Hampstead, in the chair. "The King" was first honoured, then followed the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty," proposed by the chairman, and responded to by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Dr. Herbert Smith. The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie submitted the toast of "Our Churches and Work in London," to which Mr. Frank Preston and Mr. H. B. Lawford replied. "The Laymen's Club" was proposed by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, who explained that the idea of the promoters was to leave the constitution and management in the hands of laymen, though with a suggestion that ministers in London might from time to time be invited, and that some proportion might even be elected as members. Mr. Edmund Grundy moved, and Mr. Ronald Bartram seconded, a resolution approving of such a club, and appointing a special committee to prepare a code of rules to be submitted at a meeting of the club to be held about the end of April. A brief discussion followed, in which Mr. Thomas Adams, Rev. Henry Gow, Mr. Bryan Johnson, Rev. James Harwood, and Mr. F. Peppercorn took part, after which the resolution was unanimously adopted. Votes of thanks were then very heartily passed to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., who, as President of the London District Unitarian Society, had given the dinner, and to the chairman for presiding. Pending the appointment of the officers for the year, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Fern Lea, Kelross-road, Highbury, N., will be pleased to give further information respecting the club.

THE WORKING OF THE EDUCATION ACT.

SURREY.

Now that the Education controversy has somewhat ceased, and the Act itself has to be carried out, interest in the subject is properly diverted to the modus operandi adopted by the various authorities on whom this important work falls. The county of Surrey has from the first been to the front in Technical Education, and has had the great advantage of having a Chairman devoted to its work, and as its Organising Secretary so able a man and so keen an educationist as Mr. Macan. It has been one of the first to bring out its proposed scheme under the new Act, and to get it passed by the Education Department and then again by its own Council. Some interest may therefore attach to a history of its development, and to the methods adopted for securing an adequate representation of the county on a Committee not selected ad hoc, but by a Council generally regarded as permeated by clerical and Conservative predilections.

The Technical Education Committee has heretofore consisted of the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Council, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, the late Chairman of Quarter Sessions (whom the Council delight to honour by giving him a permanent seat on all committees), and twelve members of the Council. These latter have, so to speak, gravitated to that Committee from their known interest in education, and have been selected irrespective of either political or religious attachments; but as some interest now attaches to the question, I find on making inquiries that four of them were Dissenters and the remaining twelve Churchmen.

The County Council and the Boroughs.

It fell to this Committee, with the assistance of their Organising Secretary, to draw up a "Scheme" and to invite a private conference with the representatives of the five Boroughs in the county, which could, if it so pleased them, throw in their lot with the County Council. Some of these bodies would financially have gained while others would have lost by union. It was proposed that two seats on the Committee be allotted to each Borough, irrespective of its usual representative on the Council. The representatives of the Boroughs were also informed of the seven ladies and gentlemen whom it was proposed to co-opt on the Committee, and the liberal element certainly preponderated in this list. Although an interesting discussion took place at this conference, and it was generally recognised that great advantages, financial and otherwise, would result from joining in the County Scheme, the various Boroughs have apparently determined to stand aloof, and it will now be interesting to note whether the Town Councils will show themselves worthy successors of the old School Boards. If the future elections of these bodies show that more Educationists are attracted to them it may indirectly improve the personnel of these important Councils, a result in some cases greatly to be desired.

The County Scheme.

The main features of the scheme which was submitted to the conference alluded to, and which came before the County Council in January last, are as follows:—

A Committee, to be called the "Surrey Education Committee," shall be constituted for the advancement of all grades of education, consisting of not less than twenty-seven nor more than thirty-seven members, not less than twenty of whom shall be called Representative Members, and not more than seven Selected Members, provided that amongst the Members of the Committee there shall always be persons acquainted with the needs of and experienced in all types of education and grades of schools in the area, including the following:—University Education, Agricultural Education, Technological Education, First Grade Secondary Schools, Second Grade Secondary Schools, Evening Schools, Girls' Higher Education, Girls' Lower Education, Council Elementary Schools, Voluntary Elementary Schools; and if the representation of such types of education at any time is not secured by the members appointed under Section 2 (a) it shall be secured by means of the members selected under Section 3, and, if it appears desirable to the Council, after consultation with persons or bodies representative of the type of education concerned.

2.—The Representative Members shall be appointed:

(a)—Twenty by the County Council from its own members.

(b)—Two by each of such of the five Councils in the County being Education Authorities for the purpose of Part III. of the Education Act, 1902, as agree to combine with the County Council in the constitution of a Joint Committee for all purposes of the Act.

3.—The first Selected Members shall be: (1) A representative to be elected by the Senate of the University of London. (2) Miss Penrose (Principal, Royal Holloway College). (3) Mrs. George Unwin (Woking School Board). (4) The Rev. Dr. Rendall (Headmaster of Charterhouse School). (5) Sir Henry E. Roscoe. (6) Sir Philip Magnus. (7) A. W. Chapman, Esq. (late Chairman of the Farnham School Board).

4.—Every appointment of a Representative Member shall be made at a meeting held in accordance with the ordinary practice of the electing body, and all Representative Members so appointed, if they are members of the electing body, shall cease to be members of the Committee if they cease to be members of the electing body, and are not forthwith re-appointed to be members of such body.

Every appointment of a Selected Member shall be made by the County Council on the recommendation of the Education Committee and shall be for three years, provided always that no person engaged as a teacher in Surrey in any institution aided or aidable under the Act of 1902 be eligible to be a Selected Member, and that no person be disqualified from being a Selected Member by reason of his becoming a member of the County Council, provided also that the first election of Selected Members shall be for the period expiring on March 8, 1906.

The Committee shall present to the County Council and for publication a general report of their proceedings every quarter, and for the County Council meeting in each month of May a detailed estimate of their proposed expenditure for the current year, and, subject to the above conditions, it shall have delegated to it all powers under the Education Acts 1870 to 1902, except those of raising a rate or borrowing money.

Debatable Points.

In giving you the above as the main features of the scheme I have made a few verbal alterations, some of which were made in Council and others suggested by the Education Department, so that you have here the principal points of the scheme as it now stands, and this I have done rather than weary your readers with details of the original and now altered scheme. But, nevertheless, there are two points which are much discussed in the local Press, and which raise considerations of great importance. It is decided that every appointment of a Selected Member shall be made by the Council on the recommendation of the Education Committee. It is maintained by a considerable number in the Council, and especially by the local Liberal Press, that it should be for the Council itself to recommend and appoint Selected Members. Theoretically I regard this as sound, but I have no doubt whatever that the best results will spring from the arrangement made. A large Committee representing so many interests, and working with a special knowledge of its own requirements, able moreover privately to approach those whose assistance is desired, appears far more likely to be successful than a large public body before which first-class educationists might reasonably decline to allow their names to be submitted and their merits canvassed.

Teachers and the Authority.

Another point in the same clause provides that "no person engaged as a teacher in Surrey in any institution aided or aidable under the Act of 1902 shall be eligible to be a Selected Member." It is obvious that there are many objections to a person whose pecuniary position is affected by the decisions of a public body sharing in the management of that body, but as the Education Act itself says that such persons are eligible it is no wonder that the teaching body is up in arms against this provision. Personally I am inclined to think that a mistake was made in making this clause a part of the scheme, although the reason for it might have had the force of an unwritten law on the Committee, but the Education Department, much to the surprise of some of us, have sanctioned it without comment. It must not be inferred, however, from this provision that the Council is blind to the great assistance that the co-operation and advice of the teachers may be to them, and I hope that they may be invited to form a representative Committee whose advice and views on matters affecting the welfare of the schools and of themselves would be invaluable.

As the scheme was originally drafted the names only of the individuals now forming the elected members were given, and as they each of them represent one or other of "the types of Education" which the Education Department afterwards insisted on being represented, the forecast of the Technical Education Committee proved remarkably correct.

Representation of Voluntary Schools.

It was not, however, surprising that when under consideration by the Council objection was taken that no representation of the Voluntary schools appeared amongst the names, and it was suggested that one of the Diocesan Associations—either Winchester or Rochester—should be represented. Seeing that of the 60,340 scholars now being educated in the elementary schools of the administrative county, 43,051 are in Voluntary schools, this seemed a reasonable request, but the Council waived this at the request of the chairman, who said that the matter would be put right at a later stage. It may be assumed that knowing how largely the Church element predominates in the Council, he saw that any weakness in that direction would be more than made up when the Representative Members were chosen, and this was the work now before the Council.

Eagerness to serve on the Education Committee.

It has always been the plan on the Surrey Council to send to each member a form asking on what committees he would desire to serve for the ensuing year, but in this case a special circular was sent, requesting that the recipient would state if he wished to be placed on this Committee, and inviting him to say if he had been hitherto engaged on educational work, and if so, in what direction.

If there had ever been any doubt as to whether there was a general interest in the subject and a desire to participate in the very arduous work that lies before this Committee, it was dissipated when the Selection Committee met. Not only did every member of the Technical Education Committee desire it, but between twenty and thirty other councillors and aldermen. More absolute impartiality could not have been exercised than was exercised by this Committee, and the only desire of every member seemed to be fairly to represent all views, and, in so far as was possible, to represent all districts. I need not say that the combination of these two things involved the Committee in a very arduous task, and there are even now some most valuable men left off, but when the list was presented to the Council a fortnight ago, not a single name was challenged, and the recommendations of the Committee were unanimously accepted.

Work for the Committee.

We have now to set to work—and much must depend on the constitution of the local Education Committees. In so far as the School Boards are concerned, very little change may be expected. In this country parish from which I write, and where we have one of the few successful rural Boards in the county, the probability is that four of the present (5) members will go on the new Committee, supplemented by two chosen by the Parish Council. Every member of the County Council has been requested to send in names of those he would think desirable additions to the local committees, and, judging from my own experience, wherever there is a Voluntary school the clergyman, not satisfied with the numerical advantage which the Act gives him, evidently considers himself the person who should nominate the Council representative, and does this with the most amusing unconsciousness of how it strikes "the man in the street"! E. E.

THE Wesleyans have been holding special Mission Services in Birmingham. At one late service 400 were present, of whom about fifty were women. But the most extraordinary thing reported is that a publican marched thirty-six of his customers to this meeting, at which he also himself remained. The meeting, it seems, was on Sunday night, and did not begin till a quarter-past ten. Even so, the success and enthusiasm of the occasion must have been something quite exceptional and encouraging.

THE BACONIAN THEORY OF SHAKESPEARE.

THAT curious literary heresy which believes in the Baconian authorship of Shakespeare's plays appears to be increasing both in the number and the intellectual respectability of its supporters. The proofs adduced no longer consist of cryptogrammic messages from Bacon and reverberations of his titles up and down many of the great passages in the plays, turning them into something no better than dexterous double acrostics. Such proofs are discredited amongst the best Baconians, as table-turning, we believe, is discredited by the best spiritualists. It is increasingly believed that an ingenious intellect could discover any message in any book printed in the somewhat irregular lettering of early seventeenth century type. You have but to suppose two kinds of type mixed up together, one representing dot and the other dash in a system of signalling, and an honest one-eyed faith in a preconceived theory will find unconsciously but inevitably whatever is desired. To such a circle of enthusiasts Shakespeare raps out anything you like with the submissiveness of the smallest table.

But to-day we are faced with stronger arguments. Whether we are convinced or not we cannot help feeling that a man like Lord Penzance, formerly judge of probate and divorce, member of the Privy Council and Dean of Arches, and a man like Mr. Bompas, K.C., know the value of evidence. These lawyers have each published a book recently, supporting Bacon's authorship of the Shakespeare plays, and have based their arguments on historical and literary grounds. It will hardly do to dismiss such books with the excuse that life is short and that "the notion that Bacon wrote the plays is not worth five minutes' serious consideration by any reasonable creature." The subject cannot be adequately discussed here, but it will not be out of place to draw attention to some points. We of THE INQUIRER must feel a sympathy for heresies if they are heresies indeed—i.e., if they are the result of clear, strong, independent thought and investigation, working for the love of truth without fear of conventions. So-called heresies which are the result of mere wanting to be peculiar and desiring self-importance even at the risk of absurdity must, of course, be disregarded and despised. It is not, however, merely the duty of giving a hearing to an honest heresy which ought to appeal to us. There is a moral question involved. If Bacon wrote Shakespeare's plays he must have been a better man than most impartial historians allow. The sycophancy, the political meanness, the lack of sincerity in friendship with which he is generally charged, are not incompatible with great intellectual power, profound learning, or the sublime common sense which we find in the essays, but they are absolutely incompatible, we hold, with the production of Shakespeare's plays. If Bacon wrote them history must have done his character a great injustice. No coward or cold-hearted betrayer of his friends could possibly have created plays which are permeated with the fundamental principles of morality and beauty.

Some of the leading arguments of Lord Penzance against Shakespeare's authorship of the plays may be stated very shortly as follows:—

The first argument aims at showing that Shakespeare could not have written all the plays with which he was credited. "Are all the plays to which the words 'written by William Shakespeare' were attached, or which were publicly sold as written by him, to be accepted as really written by him? The answer must be in the negative. Nobody will be found to assert at the present day that the brain which produced the London Prodigal or the Merrie Devil of Edmonton (which were attributed to Shakespeare) could have produced Macbeth or Hamlet. This fact furnishes us with a conclusion which may turn out to be of remarkable importance in solving the main question with which you have to deal. For if Shakespeare did not write all these plays, it is inevitable that there was somebody else who did write plays under cover of Shakespeare's name. Some man was the author of some of these plays whose name was not Shakespeare, and who wished to keep his authorship unknown."

The argument runs: "There is just as good authority for believing Shakespeare wrote the Merrie Devil as Macbeth. He could not possibly have written both, therefore someone else was evidently writing some plays under his name. Shakespeare's origin and lack of education make it much more probable that he could have written the Merrie Devil than Macbeth. Bacon's origin and education make it much more probable that he would have written Macbeth than the Merrie Devil, therefore we may provisionally apportion the authorship in that way."

This is a striking example of the way in which even able lawyers sometimes leap to a conclusion when they are out of court. On examining the evidence we find that the Merrie Devil of Edmonton was never attributed to Shakespeare at all in his lifetime. It was published anonymously in 1608, and was first attributed to Shakespeare in 1653 by the publisher Moseley, no doubt for the purposes of sale. So far as this play is concerned, then, there is absolutely no foundation for the argument. The London Prodigal, the Yorkshire Tragedy, and one or two others belong to a different class. These plays actually did bear the initials W.S. on their title-pages when they were published in 1605 and 1608. No doubt their publisher wished them to be regarded as Shakespeare's. The action proves the looseness of literary ownership characteristic of the time and the value of Shakespeare's name; it does not prove that Shakespeare wrote these insignificant plays, and that he did not write the greater plays ascribed to him.

Another argument on which Lord Penzance lays great stress is the following:—In 1623, seven years after Shakespeare's death, was published the first collected edition of Shakespeare's plays. This first Folio edition by Heminge and Condell contained thirty-six plays, being the plays now known to all the world as Shakespeare's. Ten of these had never before been printed and published, and six out of the ten, so it is asserted, had never even been heard of until their publication in the Folio of 1623. The implication is easily seen. Seven years after Shakespeare's death there is a complete edition of his works. He makes no mention of them in his will, he does not leave them to his family, no one belonging to him has any part in the publication, and six plays are included which had never been heard of in his lifetime. Those six plays were evidently written after his death by someone still alive who, while Shakespeare lived, had used his name, and who wished still to conceal himself behind the same personality. One would have thought that this is exactly what a clever writer, eager to hide his authorship as though it were a vice, would not have done. After Shakespeare's death he would have found someone else equally compliant to publish his new plays under another name. The six plays never before heard of are Taming of the Shrew, Timon of Athens, Julius Cæsar, Coriolanus, All's Well that Ends Well, and Henry VIII. Speaking strictly it may be admitted that there is no clear external testimony for the existence of these plays before 1623. A writer named Weever, indeed, in 1601, refers to a masterly speech at Cæsar's Funeral which is just like that spoken by Shakespeare's Antony, and which is not mentioned by Plutarch. Most critics regard that reference as showing that Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar had been written by that date. Further, it is generally believed that the Taming of the Shrew is another name for Love's Labours Won, mentioned by Mere in 1598 in a list of Shakespeare's plays.

But the wonderful part of the argument consists in the absolute carelessness about internal evidence. Here are six plays usually supposed to belong to three different periods of Shakespeare's life. Whether you look at the rhythm, or the style or the playwright's art, or the intellectual power or the knowledge of character, these plays were evidently written at very different stages of development. They can be fitted in very easily among the other plays ascribed to Shakespeare, as e.g., the Taming of the Shrew near the Comedy of Errors, and Julius Cæsar near Hamlet. But it is incredible that if Bacon wrote all the other Shakespeare plays before 1616, he could then in the next six years have written these six plays which differ in manner and skill and thought so greatly from one another, and which so evidently belong to wholly different stages in the development of one mind. The argument must mean—if it means anything—that these six plays were written by Bacon after 1616, and that he amused himself by writing in the manner of his first, second, and third period. Such an assertion renders ridiculous all literary criticism and the laws of psychology.

The real basis for opposition to Shakespeare is the belief that he came up to London a mere country bumpkin, flying from enraged justices and from a wife and child whom he was unable to support. How could a man whose chief interests had been poaching rabbits and robbing deer parks suddenly develop into the greatest of dramatic writers? How could he who began by holding horses at the theatre doors learn court language, become familiar with foreign life and thought, learn English and Roman history, gain some knowledge of almost every profession and intellectual pursuit, and above all become saturated with the learning of the law? That is the stronghold of the Baconian position. Against this we can now only make two criticisms. To describe Shakespeare as a poacher and a boor is wild caricature. We know very little of his education, but we have no justification for thinking him wholly ignorant. Boys could learn a great deal even in those days in country grammar schools if they liked. It is a gratuitous assumption to assert that Shakespeare learnt nothing.

The natural argument is—Shakespeare wrote the plays, therefore he must have learnt somehow. The counter-argument is—Shakespeare could not possibly have learnt enough, therefore he did not write the plays. You cannot prove this counter-argument by caricature and an imaginative riot on the basis of ignorance.

Secondly, I believe it is easy to exaggerate the scholarship of Shakespeare's plays and their technical knowledge. He dhas sometimes been described as a profoun theologian merely because he quotes the Bible in several places and was familiar with many of its phrases. It is difficult to enter into a mind so great as Shakespeare's and understand how it acquires knowledge. He had a genius for life and thought, and every aspect of life and every idea which touched him would make an indelible impression on him and would fall into their proper places. Such a man is wiser with a little reading than most men who have read a hundred times as much. Such a man knows more of foreign countries from a little conversation with foreigners than most men who have travelled over Europe. He has the instinct for reality. He has the catholic sympathy which reveals life to him in anything. Give him one fact or thought and his mind will inevitably rightly develop other facts and thoughts out of them. No doubt Shakespeare had a genius for acquisition, but still more he had the genius of insight. If the Baconian theory rests, as we believe, on the impossibility that a boy brought up at Stratford as Shakespeare was should gain sufficient knowledge either there or in London to write the plays, then that theory rests on a baseless assumption. It is perfectly certain that wherever the giant who wrote these plays might happen to be born, he would pick up knowledge. It is quite certain that when a youth with such hidden power came to London he would make his way as he did. Given the plays, there is nothing impossible in the writer acquiring education even under much worse conditions than those of a country grammar school. We are entirely unconvinced by these and such-like arguments in which Lord Penzance's book consists. We welcome him, however, as an ancient alchemist. The alchemists, in trying to establish a false science, laid the foundations of chemistry. The Baconians, in trying to establish a false theory, are, we believe, contributing to a truer knowledge and a deeper understanding of the life of the man William Shakespeare whom they are seeking to discredit.

ROME AND THE BIBLE.

THE present Pope, as most people know, has appointed a congregation or committee which is to examine the present conditions of Biblical study within the Roman obedience. This committee will also discuss the relations of Biblical criticism to the faith of the Church and determine the extent to which a loyal Roman Catholic may accept current theories on the inspiration and veracity of the sacred books. Undoubtedly the step which the Pope has taken marks an epoch in the history of the Church over which he rules. He is trying to avert an imminent peril. A state of things has arisen which some twenty years ago might well have seemed impossible. Questions have been reopened which the decisions of the Popes and Councils had apparently settled long ago. In France at least the the Church which boasts of its unity is rent by differences of belief scarcely less fundamental than those which divide the various parties in the Church of England. Priests who continue to exercise their sacred functions are charged by their brethren in the priesthood with undermining the most essential articles of the creed, and betraying the citadel of the faith to Protestants and Rationalists. Prelates have denounced the new opinions, but at least one eminent prelate has become their champion. Here, surely, we have a state of affairs which ought to interest everyone who cares for theology or, indeed, for religion. In order then to give a clear view of the controversy we shall say a little of the Roman attitude to Holy Scripture as it used to be, say twenty or thirty years ago. We shall pass next to the change which has occurred and the present state of the controversy, and conclude with a diffident attempt to forecast its issues.

The Roman Doctrine of the Scriptures.

The doctrine concerning Holy Scripture is laid down by the Council of Trent in its fourth session. It declared that the entire books of the Old and New Testament, "with all their parts," are to be received as sacred and canonical. The reason given is that God is the "auctor" (i.e., the "author" or perhaps "originator") of the Old and New Testaments alike. The Council of Trent was concerned chiefly with the canon of the Scriptures in opposition to the Protestant rejection of the Old Testament Apocrypha and the authority of the Latin Vulgate. As yet there was little dispute as to the extent of inspiration, plenary inspiration being, as a rule, assumed both among Romanists and Protestants. The Vatican Council therefore, in 1870, felt the need of stricter and more explicit definition. This it supplied in the following terms:—It rejected as altogether insufficient the theory that the Scriptures are holy and canonical because the Church has accepted them, or because they contain divine revelation free from all erroneous admixture. They are what they are, because they "were written by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, have God for their author, and being so written have been committed to the keeping of the Church." Do these definitions affirm the absolute inerrancy of the Bible? Certainly they exclude error in faith or morals, but they were generally understood to exclude all error of any kind. This was the all but universal opinion of theologians. A very few writers of questionable repute admitted the possibility of error in small matters of historical detail, no one dared to advance beyond this point, and no one without suspicion of unsoundness could advance so far. The general teaching might be summed up in the words of Pope Clement VI., uttered as long ago as 1351. The question which he put to the Armenians as a condition of communion ran thus: "Do you believe that the Old and New Testament, as the authority of the Roman Church hath transmitted the same, contain the certain truth in everything?" No wonder then that Archbishop Manning, in one of his early synods, contrasted the absolute belief in Scripture held throughout the Roman Church with the endless varieties of belief and disbelief in the Church of England. The argument was a plausible one, and has often enough told in controversy.

The Price of Uniformity.

Unfortunately Roman Catholics forgot how dear they had to pay for this vaunted uniformity. They had succeeded in stifling free inquiry, but they had at the same time killed all real knowledge of the Bible, and indeed all living interest in it. Time was when they could boast of great names in this department of learning. The commentary of Maldonatus on the Gospels saw the light in 1596; Estries a little later had published his exposition of the Epistles, while towards the close of the seventeenth century Simon the Oratorian produced his "critical history of the Old Testament," which was followed by three works on the text, versions and exegesis of the New Testament. All of these writers may claim to be considered classical, and Simon is justly esteemed the father of Biblical criticism. Then came a long period of complete stagnation. Simon had brought his favourite science into bad odour with the leading members of his own Church. "Moses," he said, "cannot be the author of all that is contained in the books attributed to him," and this statement, cautious and almost self-evident as it seems to us now, was then a novelty which subjected its author to furious denunciation. He was charged with heresy, and the first edition of his "critical history" was seized and burned. No Roman Catholic was bold enough to follow in his steps. If criticism had begun within the Roman Church, it was to grow and flourish outside of it. True, Astruc, a Roman Catholic layman, as late as 1753 won lasting fame by his little book on the Jehovistic and Elohistic memoirs which Moses had used in compiling the Book of Genesis. That position was not absolutely contrary to the Churches' teaching. It was a very different matter when it was proved that these same documents ran right through the rest of the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua, so that instead of being used by Moses they must have begun to be after his death.

No Place for Biblical Critics.

Things had come to a deadlock. The Church asserted, or was at least supposed to assert, one thing; criticism just as peremptorily asserted the very opposite. Hence for a period of a century and a half Roman Catholics have done scarcely anything for the intelligent study of the Bible. The best Hebrew dictionaries and grammars, the best dictionaries and grammars of New Testament Greek, commentaries that have really added to existing knowledge, have come with scarcely an exception from Protestants. The same may be said of critical editions of the New Testament text; even the Latin Vulgate has fallen into alien hands, and is being edited critically for the first time by Bishop John Wordsworth. Knowledge has not been altogether wanting on the Roman side. Of such knowledge and talent Bickell is the most brilliant example. It is, however, significant that he does not touch questions at issue between the Church and the critics. He has devoted himself instead to the discussion of Syriac and Hebrew metres, and to emendations, sometimes arbitrary, but always ingenious and suggestive of the Hebrew text. Almost, if not quite, as eminent in Syriac learning is Ceriani, the Ambrosian librarian. As for the priests in general they know, or knew till lately, absolutely nothing of such matters. The present writer passed five examinations for orders. The only knowledge required was that of scholastic theology and casuistry. The theological treatises themselves supplied a few "proof texts" which had to be given, and that was quite enough. At the seminary in which priests were trained for the Westminster and Southwark dioceses there was a Bible lecture, but it was conducted by a venerable divine who frankly confessed his entire ignorance of Hebrew. We believe he was scarcely less ignorant of Greek and quite as ignorant of criticism. A young ecclesiastic might take his doctor's degree at Rome with the highest honours though he had never read a single book of the Bible even in Latin. Even historical studies, the glory of the French church in the palmy days of its learning and fame, were discouraged as useless and probably dangerous. It was thought that arid manuals of scholastic philosophy and theology contained the sum of divinity. An almost impassable gulf separated the Roman ecclesiastics from the secular world around them. Judged by Anglican or Protestant standards they were like men who had been trained to cast nativities, or who had acquired a competent knowledge of the Ptolemaic astronomy.

UNDER the auspices of the National Indian Association a paper is to be read next Thursday afternoon in the Jehanghir Hall, Imperial Institute-road, by Mr. R. Masujima, of the Middle Temple, and the Tokyo Bar, Japan, on "The Japanese Code regarding Family Law." The chair is to be taken at 4.30 by Sir Alfred Lyall, and no cards of admission are required.

IT has been a week of high ecclesiastical appointments. The bishopric of Winchester, vacated by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, has been filled by the promotion of Bishop Ryle from Exeter, and the Rev. Archibald Robertson, D.D., Principal of King's College, and Vice-Chancellor of London University, has been appointed Bishop of Exeter. Dr. Jacob, Bishop of Newcastle, undertakes the difficult see of St. Albans, and his place in the north is to be taken by the Rev. A. T. Lloyd, D.D., Bishop-Suffragan of Thetford, who was formerly for more than ten years vicar of the Newcastle Cathedral.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD.

THE International Brotherhood, which was founded by Dr. Bertha M. Skeat in 1897, is a very different thing from the "International" founded in 1864, though both were intended to break down the barriers that artifically separate nations. No one who joins the International, whose centre is in Manchester, need fear any complication with secret proceedings and underhand revolutionary matters. It is a most pleasant society of people of very nearly all civilised nations, resident in Manchester, who meet monthly for social intercourse. These meetings are always full of interest. Many members are engaged in the musical profession and give performances of good music with rare ability. There are literary men whose contributions are frequent in the local papers and elsewhere, teachers of many subjects, and men and women engaged in the multitudinous industries of Manchester. From these short addresses on interesting subjects, especially such as lead to a better understanding among the various peoples of the world, are given from time to time. French, German, Italian and English are in regular use, and no one who desired to address the assembly in any language, ancient or modern, would be refused a hearing at moderate length if there were any who understood him. The feeling of brotherhood and of desire for a good understanding prevails. By learning to know the good points in a Frenchman's character one gets into truer sympathy with the French nation. By personal intercourse with a German whereby his special abilities and characteristics are learned, one gains more insight into the "genius" of the German people. When we have found ourselves drawn into friendship with a few bright and kindly Italians we are conscious of an increased affection for the inhabitants as well as the land of Italy. In reliance on the reality and effectiveness of such experiences the International Brotherhood seeks to overcome the distrust and misunderstanding that exist among nations by promoting private friendships among individuals.

A great part of the sorrow and cruelty which come from the hatred and jealousies of rival countries is due to ignorance: ignorance of the character of the peoples, their history, their aspirations. Anything which makes clear to the people of one land that those of another land are of the same humanity with themselves, and have purposes with which they cannot do other than sympathise, is a gain, and helps towards universal peace. The International Brotherhood has no detailed programme of reforms, and, as a society, is not allied with any political party. But it rejoices over every influence which reduces the ignorant distrust of foreigners in any land and enlarges the international goodwill.

One duty it especially marks out for itself, that of welcoming visitors from other lands who often find themselves solitary in a strange city whither their work or inclination has led them. To such, opportunities of making friends and joining in social intercourse are gladly given. It must be manifest to those who frequent the Brotherhood's meetings that these strangers and visitors often bring with them very valuable and pleasant gifts which greatly enrich the proceedings.

The idea of the Brotherhood was formed in the mind of Dr. Bertha Skeat while studying at Zurich, where, the only Englishwoman, as it happened, among the representatives of many nations, she received many kindnesses and gave what she could in return. She was struck with the thought, how much better it would be if there were one society including all nations rather than the many little students' clubs, how much more they could do for each other, how much more valuable and interesting the intercourse would be! And why limit this Brotherhood to students only? Why not form a league of all who are willing to help each other and who recognise that foreigners have an especial claim on their kindness?

Miss Skeat formed such a society on her return to England in 1897. The Manchester centre was formed, and held its first meeting in October, 1898. Mr. Charles Lodge was its secretary, and afterwards chairman. Now Mr. W. E. Axon has accepted the position of chairman, in which Mr. Lodge has found himself unable to continue, and Miss Pollard, of 52, Park-street, Greenheys, Manchester, is secretary. The meetings are usually held at the Lower Mosley-street Schools, and are socially and musically highly successful, as also in the character of the addresses that are given from time to time. A monthly magazine, Amicitia, edited by a rising young journalist of great ability, is found to vary the language from page to page with an abandon limited only by the stock of type in the printer's workshop. No doubt if the compositor could do all that the authors desired, we should have the original languages of the Bible, and a selection of Eastern hieroglyphics every month.

This young movement wants to spread. The idea is that there should be such centres, not only in Manchester, but in every university town, and every other town where people of varying nationality concentrate for purposes of study, trade, or manufacture. A London International Clubroom is desired, with a resident secretary who would give help and advice to any who arrived from other countries and found their way to the club, so that foreigners might meet with a friendly welcome and have their way made easier for them. He would also be of assistance to English folk who were going abroad. It is hoped that centres will be established in many of the capitals and important cities of civilised countries on a similar basis to that of Manchester, and not omitting those monthly social re-unions which are a great source of vitality to the organisation, and the opportunity for carrying out its purposes.

The idea is excellent; it works well where it has been tried. It opposes no other organisation, and has nothing of diplomacy. It simply tries to increase friendship and a good mutual understanding across the borders which are merely imaginary lines dividing the peoples of the world, and hopes by increase of knowledge and amity to help to prepare the way for arbitration instead of warfare, and, instead of jealousy and conflict, peace and goodwill.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A LITTLE girl ran merrily down the street; she had a little dog with her of whom she was evidently very fond, for she was talking to him all the way. As she ran quickly past I heard her say to to the dog, over and over again, "Cats, Bob, cats!" Fortunately Bob took no notice, most likely because he did not see any cats about; else, with so much encouragement, he would most likely have started for a good cat-hunt. Very good fun it would have been for Bob, no doubt—and that was what the little girl was thinking of; but what for the cats?

Why should the poor cats be chased and frightened? Think of the terror in poor Pussy's little heart, as she flies before the creature that comes tearing behind her with his mouth wide open, and yelping and barking with eagerness. Perhaps he only wants to play, and would not hurt her if he caught her, and there is no doubt that she would hurt him; but she does not understand such rough play, and is terribly frightened. She is very clever, however, and manages to climb a tree or jump on to a window-sill or somewhere where the dog cannot follow her, where she sits and spits with terror and anger.

We had a dear little kitten whom we called Brownie; at first it looked like any other brown baby kitten, but as it grew bigger it turned out to be a lovely little Persian, with long fur and tufts inside its ears, and bunchy little paws, a magnificent bushy tail and a ruff growing round its neck. The gardener had a beautiful big sheep-dog, yellow and white, very young and very big, and a great romp; and he always longed to play with Brownie, but he was so rough and big and she so little that we had to keep him off her lest he should hurt her.

One night when it was very dark and Toss (the dog) was about, a great spitting and growling and barking and rushing about was heard, and then a sound of Toss tearing over the field barking. Two hours later Brownie could not be found, and I went out to call her. No answer came, and no Brownie; but at length as I wandered over the field some way from the house a piteous mew came in answer to my call. I fetched a lantern, and followed the sound till I came behind a cottage, when it seemed very near; and when I turned the lantern about I at last saw on the chimney of the cottage, up against the sky, the dark shape of little Brownie! She had run up there to escape from Toss. We had some difficulty in getting her down, as she was still timid and frightened, and when I carried her home she started at every sound. What a run she had had, poor little thing! Her legs were so short, and Toss had legs three or four times as long; and there was a running brook which she had crossed, and a fence that she must have climbed—with that great eager dog behind her; and how could she know that he only wanted to play with her?

If children thought about it they would never call out "Cats!" to their dogs.

Dogs and cats can be great friends if they are brought up together and if the dog is taught to respect and protect pussy and not be rough with her. There was a little kitten that lived in a cottage with a beautiful great yellow sheep-dog named Allan; and the children said that Lassie "lay in Allan's lap" at nights. He was very gentle with her.

And now I must tell you the end of Brownie's story. Her mistresses went away for the winter, and had to leave their dear little cat. They left her at a farm with some nice kind people who were very good to her, and she was to come back in spring to her first home. But, alas! that never came about! Brownie had companions—a cat that she liked, and a dog who was kind and gentle, and whom she kept in order if ever he wasn't—and a dear little girl who loved her and romped with her; and she was very happy. But there were some neighbours who had a dog who was not kind, and they were so cruel as sometimes to set him on to hunt Brownie. And then she vanished, and she was missing for many days; she was called, and searched for, and little Elsie cried for her, but she did not come back. And at last one day under a fence dear Brownie's little dead body was found. She had been killed by that neighbour's dog who had been allowed and taught to chase her.

A sad end to the sweet and happy little life.

Now none of you will ever say to your dog "Cats, Bob, Cats!" will you?

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

THE Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties has arranged a series of Sunday evening services at the Market Hall, Redhill, commencing on March 15, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will give the address. If the friends of Liberal Religion residing in the neighbourhood would kindly render what help they can by personally attending, it would contribute to the success of this effort. Musical assistance would be specially welcome, and also those who would be willing to undertake the duties of attending to the needs of visitors. The hall is about three minutes' walk from the railway station. The services commence at seven o'clock. Communications can be sent to the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, 31, Madeira-road, Streatham, S.W., who has charge of the arrangements.

MR. V. TCHERTKOFF is to lecture tomorrow (Sunday) evening at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell New-road, to the South London Ethical Society, on "The Oppression of the Working Classes," with glimpses of Russian life in its religious, political, and social aspects. The lecture, which will be illustrated by lantern pictures, begins at seven o'clock.

THE annual meeting of the East Cheshire Christian Union, held at Macclesfield, Feb. 21, we must report next week. The sermon preached by the Rev. J. Page Hopps on that occasion, on "God in Christ," is printed in full in the March number of The Coming Day.

Correspondents are requested to note that news for insertion the same week should reach the Office by Wednesday if possible, and the earlier the better. Thursday morning is the latest time for receiving news, and it should then be very brief, or it will probably have to wait a week.

IN THE REALM OF SPIRIT.

IN a recent notice of the January number of the Hibbert Journal we spoke of the great interest of the article by Sir OLIVER LODGE there concluded, on "The Reconciliation between Science and Faith," and referred to certain passages of speculation, to which we should be tempted to return. It is the fifth section of the article (pp. 218-25) in which these most suggestive passages occur.

Sir OLIVER LODGE has vindicated faith in the higher capacity of man and the Divine presence in the universe, as against an "orthodox science," which might seem to reduce the sum of all things to a merely external and material order. He has pleaded that no worthy human attribute can be denied to the Deity. Intelligence, power, love, personality are among the highest attributes of man, they have an actual existence in the universe ; and how, it is truly asked, can we possess them, and GOD not possess them? In Him they must exist, in highly intensified and nobler form, "unless we make the grotesque assumption that in all the infinite universe we denizens of planet Earth are the highest." Thus we are brought to the conviction of the Divine presence in the world as it now is, and it is clear that the orthodox science, which has revealed the outward order, has not searched all the depths of being.

Then Sir OLIVER LODGE takes a further step. There are aspects of our personal life, referred to such faculties as premonition, inspiration, prevision, telepathy, of which orthodox science has for the most part been merely contemptuous, and on which theologians have looked askance, but to which psychologists are beginning to attend. At present little understood, they appear to open out into a larger world of spiritual life, pointing to higher capacities in man, or such as he may grow into, and promising fresh ranges of experience to the religious life. "Men of religion," we are warned, will probably do well to leave the speculations thus suggested alone, until their scientific basis has been rendered more secure ; yet Sir OLIVER himself allures us into the field of religious speculation. We fully admit that meddling with occult psychological phenomena is a doubtful occupation for any but the healthiest natures of the most robust intelligence, but what is offered us in this article does not tread far upon doubtful ground ; and what we are anxious to make clear is that there is here nothing to disturb the fundamental basis of our spiritual life with GOD, while yet we may receive new light as to the methods of His working.

"We are not bodies alone," Sir OLIVER LODGE declares, "nor spirits alone, but both ; our bodies isolate us, our spirits unite us." On this material planet we are the highest bodily organisms, and in that realm we have control. "If there are other beings near us, they do not trespass. It is our sphere, so far as physics are concerned." But on the mental and spiritual side there is more to be said. We ourselves are GOD's agents in the order of the world, through obedience to His law, and we have other relations besides the physical. We influence one another not merely by physical means. Personal influence is always at work in the secret places of the spirit, and beyond this, which we recognise as normal, there seem to be links of intense sympathy by means of which kindred spirits at exceptional moments operate on one another at a distance. And what Sir OLIVER suggests is, that such links may bind us not only to those who are with us here in bodily form on this familiar earth, but with other spiritual beings from whom, as GOD's agents, we may receive aid and inspiration for our life.

Why, he asks, should that not be so? We trace the order of development up from the lowest form of life to man, and then make that stupendous leap from man to the infinite GOD. Are there not other ranges of being? And if so, are we cut off altogether from relation with them ?

> If we are open to influence from each other by non-corporeal methods, may we not be open to influence from beings in another region or of another order ? And if so, may we not be aided, inspired, guided, by a cloud of witnesses,—not witnesses only, but helpers, agents like ourselves of the immanent God ?
> How do we know that in the mental sphere these cannot answer prayer, as we in the physical? It is not a speculation only, it is a question for experience to decide. Are we conscious of guidance? do we feel that prayers are answered? that power to do, and to will, and to think is given us? Many there are who with devout thankfulness will say yes.
> They attribute it to the Deity; so can we attribute everything to the Deity, from thunder and lightning down to daily bread ; but is it direct action ? Does He work without agents? That is what our feelings tell us, but it is difficult to discriminate ; and fortunately it is not necessary ; the whole is linked together,
> "Bound by gold chains about the feet of God," > and through it all His energising Spirit runs. On any hypothesis it must be to the Lord that we pray—to the highest we know or can conceive ; but the answer shall come in ways we do not know, and there must always be a far Higher than ever we can conceive.

The suggestion of this passage seems to be that while our prayers must always be addressed to GOD Himself, the supreme Giver of all good, and our higher life cannot be apart from the constant support and inspiration of His Spirit, there is no reason to suppose that He may not use as instruments of His good purpose other spiritual beings, who may thus be in direct contact with our hidden life.

That influences from a purer realm of being do come into our life none who have had any experience of the deeper life with GOD will deny, and we should say that undoubtedly the major part of such influences come to us direct from GOD Himself, the one eternal, ever-present, all-sustaining Spirit. Thus, surely, it is, when we realise that one Presence in Nature, and its deeper influences calm and uplift, sustain and purify ; and no less in the surrender of duty, the recognition of the eternal law of Right, and the self-giving in the service of pure unselfish love. In these we have our hold upon the Eternal, and our communion is with the FATHER of us all. It is the peace of GOD that has come upon us, there is no other Giver and Sustainer of the heavenly life.

But while this is so, there is no reason for shutting out the thought of other helpers of our life, whom our FATHER may give to us, whether they are known or unknown. All that is best in our life is confirmed and constantly sustained and encouraged in the companionship of living friends, and in hidden communion with those also who are no longer with us here in their outward presence. We know most surely how such communion brings light upon a darkened way, how memories of love and reverence have a guardian power and are the inspiration of our better life. And when we speak of memories, that is not all, for there is the deeper faith of undying love. Such lives as we have known, of pure spiritual power, remaining with us as a hidden treasure and an inspiring force within, we cannot think of as subject to the law of death. We may know nothing definitely beyond the circle of this present life, where yet we are with God, but at the same time be absolutely convinced that they also remain as living souls, and are no less with GOD. Thus, they and we together are held in one communion of the spirit, with our FATHER, and so there opens to us a larger vision of the heavenly life.

They and others, in higher realms of being, Sir OLIVER LODGE suggests, may actually be the present ministers of help to us, in many hidden ways, though we cannot know it now. We may in time gain clearer insight into the conditions of such abiding communion, and find that it is so; and in any case there may be for us here encouragement to look forward to a deeper consciousness and greater fulness of life when we also shall have laid aside the outward vesture of our present life. Meanwhile, our happiness and peace are in the assurance that our central and abiding rest must ever be in GOD Himself, to Him must be our prayer, with Him, our FATHER, the communion into which must be gathered all else that He may give for the enrichment of our hidden life.

IS THE JESUS OF HISTORY TO BE KNOWN?

PRACTICALLY the whole world agrees about two things concerning Jesus. Whatever else he was or is, orthodox, heretic, infidel and atheist agree almost without dissent that he was once a man. And, further, almost all are compelled to admit, whether they like it or not, that few historic figures, if any, are so unfailingly and universally interesting. Obviously, then, it is a question of first importance whether it is possible, or even desirable, to know the man as he was. Whether it is possible, because we can hardly know ourselves "as we are," much less, it may be, those from whom years or centuries divide us. Whether it is desirable, because we certainly have a very tender and inspiring picture of him which may be spiritually truer than any literal truth.

Now I propose to begin this discussion by an attempt to get a clear idea of what we mean by "the literal truth" about other human beings, after which we may go on to inquire whether, if it is obtainable in the case of Jesus, the literal truth is really the truest truth—as I think it is.

Let us begin by asking what we mean by the literal truth about mere physical phenomena, facts of astronomy, chemistry, and so forth. We certainly do not mean what appears; for appearances, as every child learns to know, are often deceptive. The earth unquestionably appears to stand still and the sun to pass daily from the east across the sky to the west, but very few of us believe that the earth really stands still and that the sun moves over it every day. To get at the truth it was necessary to reason for many ages and to try many theories before the right one was confirmed. But, again, the theories must be very strictly and closely regulated by what we see, or else we shall wander into realms of mythology such as found a cow in the horned moon, chased daily by a bull which was the sun—though, except for a few points, such as the suggestion of horns, the moon in no way resembles a cow, nor is there a very close resemblance between the sun and a bull. Truth, then, concerning material things would seem to be theory formed and confirmed by exact observation. It is a real correspondence between our minds and the outer universe.

Now this, I take it, is exactly what we mean by the truth about persons, dead or living, but in a much subtler form. For the part played by our minds is something besides theory—namely, experience; we need to have experienced our own hopes, ideals, disappointments, before we can possibly understand the truth about another man's life. And, again, the outside element which plays upon our minds, and finally decides the form of our conceptions, is different. We must be influenced by the character of the man, and not by any material accidents connected with his physical life except as these happened to mould or to express that character. But the essential point is the same—namely, that we can get at nothing true, unless we have living inner emotions and conceptions which are worked upon by a real outside agent and strictly subject to it. In other words, we supply the mirror (sympathetic imagination), God's fact supplies the image (truth).

The test then of our having found the truth about personalities is whether our own lives are worked upon and moulded by them. I do not mean by the mere stimulating of our own ideals, but by a certain uncompromising authority of their own, which is sublimely inconsiderate of our preconceptions, and often puzzles and baffles before it finally enlarges and invigorates our minds and emotions. Even little children may become formative influences of this kind in our lives, and historical characters connected with whom we know only a few circumstances and a few words or acts may so truly "work up" us as to become real friends and masters. Now in this sense I claim that it is entirely beyond question that we may reach the real historic Jesus, though whether we shall do so depends, firstly, upon the sensitiveness of our imagination and the depth of our own spiritual life, and, secondly, upon whether we show unflinching fidelity to critical methods of sifting his real words and deeds.

(b) Is the Literal Truth the Truest Truth?

This brings us to the very grave question of whether it is really right or wise to disturb or endanger the exquisite ideal of Jesus which we find, for instance, written in the Fourth Gospel, or as a living experience in the minds of countless Christians in all ages? Is not this in every sense more real to-day, it may be asked, than any exact portrait with its local details and character of the period, even if this is to be obtained? Schools of the greatest diversity begin to argue that it is highly problematic whether we can ever bring to light the literal Jesus, and meanwhile we must deal with the Jesus as he exists in men's minds and hearts, or, at all events, in the gospels as they stand, an ideal which is for good or bad undoubtedly real. We are told that to many it is of no importance now whether the Christ they know is identical with the Jesus of history. "It matters not," they say in effect, "whether he ever left his footmarks printed upon the dust of this material earth. To me he is real in a far deeper sense. In my affliction he comforts me; in my weakness he gives me strength; in my doubt he confirms my faith; to deny him would be to deny all my truest and deepest life." And it has even been argued that since our characters are more deeply influenced by pure creations of fiction such as Hamlet than by any of the figures of history, how much more must they be by so great a figure as that revered by Christians as Master and Lord, one which is in no sense a pure fiction, though transcending in its present perfection all possible attempts at a historic portrait. Our conceptions, it is argued, necessarily fall short of the truth. Then is not the gathered experience of the ages likely even where it diverges from the literal truth to be far more illuminating and spiritually true than the scanty fragments which a recklessly literal criticism can afford?

Let us be quite sure what this argument implies. Few will dispute the claim that Hamlet, and other fictitious characters, may have a profound and vital influence upon our characters. But no one supposes that this is principally or even perceptibly due to the greatness of the original Prince of Denmark, whoever, and whenever, and if ever he was. It is due to Shakespeare. And the moulding influence upon our lives is the vital genius of the playwright, not of Hamlet. So that when we once admit that the historic Jesus is less important to us than something else, we are either admitting that John or the accumulated insight of ages of disciples is greater than the actual Jesus, or we are saying that Jesus is too great for us, and we need the help of another interpreting mind; or, again, we simply despair of finding the real Jesus, and we prefer these modified portraits to such travesties as we deem history can offer after 2,000 years. Now, if the first is true, which I imagine very few of those holding this position would admit—namely, that John is a greater than Jesus, then the knowledge of the actual Jesus will not destroy the ideal of John, but will rather interpret and enhance it. If the second is true, as it very likely is, that we need some mediating genius between us and the full greatness of Jesus, then we are admitting that our own life experiences are too shallow to enable us to know Jesus himself; but we have no right whatever to endeavour to dissuade those who feel the call to establish vital relations with the original from doing so. For babes, as most of us perhaps are, it may be well to live upon the milk of human genius, but genius itself and all strong souls of men, like the young lions, must seek their meat from God.

(c) Knowledge of the Historic Jesus.

Need we then despair of ever establishing a vital relation with Jesus as God made him? And does the scantiness of our data or the poverty of our souls stand permanently in our way? At first sight we may well feel misgivings. Jesus has left us not a single word of his own writing. Most of the records of his life were purely oral until many years after his death. We have them now as handed down by men of little culture, of crude conceptions, and very dimly conscious of the real meaning of his utterances and ideals. We have barely half a dozen words which even profess to be in the tongue in which he spoke them, and consequently all his sayings are translations into a language of a very different genius from his own. Luke was perhaps a true Greek, but he was not an eye-witness himself, and his materials come from the same Jewish sources as those of the other gospels. John was a man of the profoundest genius and insight but clearly sets himself to give an interpretive rather than a literal account of his Master. How, then, can we possibly hope to get at the literal historic Jesus?

Now, in answer to this, I would suggest that we must set about our task in the same spirit as we set about any other investigation. We must begin by giving close and judicial attention to the environment of our subject. A geologist who finds a tiny chip of a tooth buried in a mountain of foreign matter, and almost undistinguishable to the amateur from its embedding rock, is able through his knowledge of the environment not only to draw a fairly exact picture of the original beast, but to describe other animals and plants of the period, and even to throw light upon the history of a million or ten million years of the earth's history.

Now in our knowledge of the environment of Jesus we are singularly fortunate. To begin with we have a far fuller knowledge of the Greco-Roman world in which he lived than of many subsequent eras. Then we know the history of his people almost continuously for some thousand years or more before his time. We know the development of his national religion, and we have much contemporary literature enlightening us as to its character and the positions of the various sects at the time of his life. The manners and customs of his people and the geography of his country are well known, and may be studied even to-day in his native land. Most valuable of all, we probably possess in the Old Testament everything he ever read: a factor of incalculable significance. Surely with such exceptional knowledge of his environment we ought to have no difficulty in making some such critical use of the records of his ministry and the movement which followed his death as shall save us from the desperate alternative of complete acceptance or complete rejection.

Scarce any will tell us that we must take the life-stories of Zoroaster or Buddha uncritically on the ground that we have no means of testing the different degrees of reliability in the narrated facts. And yet we know less of the environment of these than of Jesus.

If we knew only this, that before the ministry of Jesus his countrymen disputed the question of God's omnipotence and how far it annihilated the will of man (as Josephus indicates*), or that they were ever anxious to appease God's justice (as the far-reaching impression made by the baptist seems to show†), whereas, on the other hand, his disciples after him seemed ever conscious of the Divine favour and co-operation—we should be able without one authentic word of his teaching, without one indisputable detail of his career, to gain a better and truer picture of the man as he was than the majority of uncritical readers of the gospels ever acquire.

Every one of us is easily able, if he will, to gain some such knowledge of elementary critical principles, and some such general impression of the period in which Jesus lived, with its movements and ideals, as shall make the gospels a new book to him, revealing the living character of great men, one of whom is so great that he seems almost as near and relevant to our daily lives now as if the abyss of centuries which divides us had been verily swallowed up.

But if we would know Jesus, the real human genius, with his human limitations of knowledge and power, and his human majesty of insight and idealism, then we must altogether abandon our nervous anxiety to rank him as the greatest of all God's sons. Very possibly he actually was so, for the combination in one man of intellectual, spiritual and magnetic genius of so high an order must be a thing of rare occurrence in this earth's history, to say the least. But who ever really valued the genius of Shakespeare, or Dante or Homer, whose sole purpose while reading these masters was to vindicate their supremacy?

Nay, the very thought that God's inspiration of genius was limited to a single light would make that light our darkness. And if we are to know Jesus as he was, nay, as he is, we can only do so when regarding him as a revelation of God, as distinguished from the revelation of God. By the attempt to exalt him to be our only avenue to Deity we cut ourselves off from one of the highest privileges we possess, and possibly at its very highest point: the privilege while on earth of living intercourse with men no longer living upon earth.

One final obstacle remains, and for many of us it is the most insuperable of all. Is there enough life in ourselves to enable us to know the life of Christ? The obstacles are great, but the reward is also great. And remembering what he taught, that each of us is himself child of the Infinite Spirit, may we not dare to strive, as Browning strove, in search for living knowledge of far lesser souls, when he found

> The life in me abolished the death of things,
> Deep calling unto deep.

JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED.

* "Antiquities," xiii. v. 9 and xviii. 1-3.
† Ib. xviii. v. 2 (Mk. xi. 32).

WE have not yet seen the volume of selections for "Matthew Arnold's Notebooks," published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., but cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of quoting some passages from a recent review in the Athenæum. "The raillery Arnold often adopted," says the reviewer, "was never mere superficial banter, just as his gaiety was a reasoned and self-chosen habit, not mere lightheartedness."

To the writer of this notice, wearied with the perusal of the dullest of the schoolmen, it comes as a refreshment to read, "La gaieté clarifie l'esprit, surtout la gaieté littéraire. L'Ennui l'embrouille." It is as an ascetic of culture, debonair because he chose to be, and often in spite of inclination, that we see Arnold self-revealed in these pages, desiring, as he said, to combine "Angelica hilaritas cum monastica simplicitate," and quoting as his guiding thoughts, "Une vie laborieuse et une succession de travaux, qui remplissent et moralisent les jours." But we get the ground of all in the oft-repeated words, "Le cœur de l'homme est religieux d'instinct, et dans toutes les cultures on trouve un besoin commun d'infini et de félicité."

THIS book, the Athenæum reviewer says, would be wholesome reading for multitudes of orthodox Christians. Arnold was regarded as a dangerous heretic, yet his constant aim was "to disengage the essential from the accidental elements of Christianity, and to show that the former were the best expression of the needs and aspirations rooted deep in human nature." Whether he is to be called a Christian, in the ordinary sense, or not, in this writer's view "his was clearly an anima naturaliter Christiana," and "the impression conveyed by this book is as distinctly religious as that made by the 'Confessions of St. Augustine.'" And the review concludes:—

> Though we dislike the phrase [that of "beautiful souls"], it is certainly descriptive of the compiler of these extracts, whose personality stands out perhaps even more clearly than it would from a piece of autobiography, severe and lofty in his judgments, his tastes, and his ideals, drinking deep of the true sources of joy and of knowledge, despising vain delights and little ambitions, seeking in all things to act by reason, and preserving, amid the intractable pettiness of modern existence, the rare and incalculable gifts of a lucid intelligence that only stupidity could irritate, and a dignified gaiety of spirit that no calamity could overwhelm.

THE Free Methodist gives part of a letter from the Rev. S. Pollard, a missionary at Chao Tong Fu. We reprint the quotation, italicising a clause in one sentence, as it seems to indicate that a considerable change of feeling has recently taken place in some parts of China in regard to Christianity:—

> To-morrow I leave Siao-tu-lee to open a little chapel at a market village fifteen miles south of this, and another at a town thirty miles south of that next week. There is an enormous work to be done and a great harvest to be reaped if we can work as we should. I am simply appalled at the amount of work this movement entails. By the time I reach home I shall have travelled five hundred miles. Fancy a circuit of that extent and no quick means of travelling. Two more men are needed, and a score or more of native preachers are needed for this district. Where shall we get them? Fancy hundreds and thousands of men, women, and children, idolaters, immoral, opium-smokers, opium-traders, deceitful, tricky, untrustworthy, all thrown at once on one's hand, because the idea has gone forth that it is a good thing to become a Christian. Constant teaching is needed. The work is overwhelming!

What has caused this temporary popularity of Christianity, how long it is likely to last, what will be its probable result are points on which information would be welcome. But the letter suggests what might be the consternation as well as the zeal of British Christians if they were to find out that in such an immense territory as China, it would be no longer a battle for toleration and liberty, but an open field and eager expectancy. Probably those least disconcerted would be those whose confidence in their message has buoyed them with courage in the hour when every step was into a hostile country, and every word was spoken to an unwilling ear.

DR. HUNTER is quoted as saying in an address on "Non-Church-going" that "to stay away from public worship was considered the sign of an emancipated mind, a cheap way of ranking as a superior person. Pharisees used to be found inside the churches; now they stayed at home, grumbling and criticising."

BUSINESS AT THE CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Some of us are anxiously watching for information concerning the proposals to be brought forward at the Triennial Conference. I presume that they are now finally settled by the Committee, but unfortunately for me I have been unable to attend their recent meetings, and am therefore in the dark. What I think most of us are most anxious to know is the nature and scope of the proposals for a paid officer, and whether it will be recommended that he be simply a secretary in the ordinary sense of the term, or a pastor at large, or both. The congregations have been asked to name their delegates, but there is some embarrassment with regard to taking this step before it is known what are the official proposals on which those appointed will be invited to vote. For a conscientious congregation or committee naturally desires to commit its representation to someone who is known to share the views of the majority of its members. In any case, it must be obvious that any decision at which the Conference may arrive must depend for its moral and practical weight on the sufficiency of the time which the congregations have had for discussing the proposals to be made. Our churches must not be asked to decide in a moment what the Conference Committee have had three years to consider. I trust, therefore, that all necessary information may be promptly placed in our hands.

Let me add with how much pleasure we in Liverpool are looking forward to our privileges as hosts, and what high hopes prevail among us of the interest and value the eighth Triennial Conference of our churches.

NATAL AND NATIVE LABOUR.

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Dowson complains that the native won't develop the resources of Natal. But does the white man set him the example? And if the white man shows that he considers hard work undignified, why should the native abandon his easy-going habits? How is it, with so much fertile land, that there are only 60,000 whites and 750,000 natives? And how is it that our Indian fellow-subjects colonise Natal when the overflow from Great Britain refuses to go there?

Again, how is it we allow our aristocracy of 60,000 whites to deprive our Indian fellow-subjects of the vote, when we have spent over two hundred millions of money and thousands of lives for the alleged purpose of obtaining the franchise for the outlander in the Transvaal?

I might ask your correspondent a few other questions, but I refrain.

JOHN P. THOMASSON.

Bolton, Feb. 24.

SIR,—I notice the letter of Mr. B. Dowson, in which he advocates that the native Africans should be compelled to do work for the white men. It is difficult to know on what principle Mr. Dowson can justify this compulsion. He does not allege that the natives are paupers, or any charge upon the State; on the contrary, his accusation against them is that they are able to live like gentlemen, and apparently it is this tendency of theirs that he wishes to disturb. I remember reading, two or three years ago, a letter from an Englishman in Natal, who was a thorough Imperialist, in which he said he would not insult the Kaffirs of Natal by comparing them with English street-corner men, as he considered the Kaffirs were so much more respectable. This view appears to be confirmed by Mr. B. Dowson. Then if the native maintains himself respectably, what work is it that he is to be compelled to do? Apparently he is to do some work which other men object to do at the price, and, to come to the point, that means that he is to be compelled to labour in the mines for a less wage than his labour is worth. Many Kaffirs object to working in the mines, and their reasons are that they have to go a long way from their homes, and all the social and moral influences of family life; that when once they have contracted to work in the mines they are compelled to keep their contract by imprisonment and severe floggings; and that the work in the mines itself is exceedingly unhealthy, and the mortality high, and the wages paid inadequate. Before the war the mines of Natal, which are coal-mines, were developing as fast as there was any requirement for their production, and the gold-mines of Johannesburg were developing at a rate unprecedented in the annals of deep gold-mining. This was done under the comparative freedom of the Government of the South African Republic, which limited the hours of work to eight per diem, and the days of work to six per week, and allowed the native freedom as to whether or not he made a contract, but enforced by severe penalties the performance of the contract for the period of three months. What good or material object is to be gained by compelling the Kaffirs to work in the gold-mines? What is the use of the gold to the toiling millions of the Empire? They cannot eat, drink, or wear it. What they want are food, clothes, and houses, and this digging of gold in the heart of South Africa is a very roundabout way, if it is a way at all, of securing the true wealth of the Empire. I have no objection to gold-mining in the least, but I have the greatest objection to the institution of slavery under whatever phrases it may be guarded for the purpose of promoting the wealth of speculators in gold-mines. Apparently one of the main charges Mr. Dowson brings against the Kaffirs in Natal is that they number 750,000, as against about 60,000 men of European descent, and another 60,000 of Asiatic descent; but the total population is very small, as compared with the area and resources of the country. The area is about 35,000 square miles, and the population is, therefore, about twenty-five per square mile, as compared with British India, which has about 230 per square mile, and the United Kingdom, which has about 350 people per square mile. When the late Anthony Trollope visited South Africa, he heard from the British everywhere that the natives would not work, but Mr. Trollope declared that he never saw anybody else do any work. The fact, indeed, is notorious that the natives can work and do work, and prosper wherever they are treated with justice and allowed freedom, and in an ordinary state of affairs there is no insuperable difficulty in securing sufficient numbers for work in the mines. This is well known to myself to be an absolute fact, and as proved by innumerable reports from mining engineers on the spot. The present time, however, is not an ordinary time. South Africa is only just starting on the road to recovery from the terrible desolation inflicted by the Imperialist armies. Nearly the whole of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, and some parts of Natal, were deliberately desolated by our troops, so that human beings, either black or white, could not exist. The result is (as must have been foreseen by every person capable of intelligent consideration of the question) that there is an insufficient supply of labour now that the work of restoration has begun. All the farms have to be re-built, and irrigation works restored. In addition to this, labourers for the mines, which have been but little worked for three years, have to be found, and food has to be grown for the people. I gather from Mr. Dowson's letter that the regulation of the labour of the people is not to be left for each man to choose the work he likes and the master he likes, and to make the best bargain for his work that he can, but that some superior person or superior people are to compel the common people to work at the kind of work which appears to these superior people the right thing. Perhaps they are to work as navvies in making cuttings in hard rock or in tunnels, or perhaps they are to be compelled to go into the mines. They are to be driven away from the fields which they love to cultivate, at the wish of these superior people. And all the time there is not the slightest difficulty in securing the labour of free men, who are fully capable of doing all this work very well. In England we have to pay free men good wages. A good English collier can make, at the present rate of wages, from 10s. to 20s. for eight hours' work. Why should he have to compete with forced labour in other parts of the British Empire? Italian miners can be got at lower rates of wages, and so can Indians. I said during the war that the Imperialists desired the subjugation of the Republics in order to establish a great slave empire in South Africa; and I said that upon the public statements of the owners and managers of gold-mines in South Africa. The letter of Mr. B. Dowson only too sadly proves that the anti-slavery work of eighty years ago has not ended the eternal contest between the advocates of slavery and freedom.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND: IRISH GRANTS.

SIR,—More accurate information from this side—the receiving one—might have amended the portion of the annual report printed in your last, page 102, middle column, section 3. "A dozen congregations" needs revision. "A sum of about £40 annually is collected" exceeds fact. "Little support from Ireland" is all too true. A further grant attests the liberality of the managers. Five of their grants come to Remonstrant Synod congregations. Of its places of worship there are ten which receive the £60 income. This, however, is considered investment property, and constitutes a bar to easy comprehension of cases. The Dunbar Fund, limited to this Synod, is the means of subsidy to struggling places. But its single £40 and seven £8 grants would not work up to the report's estimate—viz., "a dozen," &c. Yet there is further the Rights of Conscience Fund, disbursing, say, £150 annually, whereto ministers of the Synod and of the Antrim Presbytery may appeal. Additionally the so-called Dublin Fund, £600 capital, helps this last body. Then we come to the supposed £40 in the Presbytery. Excluding some interest, the last collection did not reach £30, two fairly well-to-do congregations enabling that to continue. And it is but a hand-to-mouth expedient.

Returns from eighteen Remonstrant Synod and ten Antrim Presbytery congregations being to hand, I find that thirteen Irish ministers are below a line of £125, averaging but £102 7s. 10d. for their labour. In Ulster only five are above the tax mark of £160. The remaining ten do not average £140. In Belfast, a green tree, two congregations look to England for assistance. What must be the case in the dry tree—the rural districts — where worshippers become sparse? Rights of Conscience grants to ministers average £9 13s. 4d., and not less than fifteen figure on the list. The day of small things is with us. In the seventies A.D. there was no small scattering of seed for this.

EXCURSION TO HUNGARY.

SIR,—It is much to be desired that Mr. Shrubsole's desire to repeat the successful Transylvanian experiment made by Miss Tagart two years ago may become a fact.

At the London International Conference, May 31, 1902, several foreign visitors expressed to me their regret that the then proposed Transylvanian excursion was not sufficiently near in time to the Conference to permit of attending both. This time the International Conference will take place at Amsterdam in September, and I know that several American friends proposed to use that opportunity to visit the old homes of the Pilgrim Fathers in Holland. If Mr. Shrubsole and his English friends could arrange the visit to Transylvania immediately after the Amsterdam Conference it would facilitate the union of two excursions of unparalleled interest to friends of the Liberal Faith.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SCOTLAND.

Stands Scotland where it did?
Almost afraid to know itself!

To break the sense of isolation and foster denominational kinship among our congregations, the Committee of the Scottish Unitarian Association arranged a scheme of pulpit exchanges which is now about half way through. It was not possible to exchange congregations, so the parsons were set on the move. The five travelling preachers are Revs. R. B. Drummond, G. A. Ferguson, E. T. Russell, A. Webster, and H. Williamson. These change places once a fortnight, and take up a subject assigned to them. I believe the exchanges have approved themselves in the working. They at least relieve the monotony of lonely congregational life; and though the message may be familiar, the fresh personality of the messenger vivifies it. The Sundays of exchange have chanced to be boisterous and wet, but still the congregations were larger than usual.

I found large congregations at Dundee with an inspiring air of interest in them. My experience in the Sunday-school there was very gratifying. Broad Churchism is strong in Dundee, and has the odour of sanctity in congregationalism. Some day the sanctity will surely be extended to us. Why should that which is popularly blessed in Ward Chapel be popularly banned in the Unitarian Church, Constitution-road?

At South Saint Mungo-street, Glasgow, I found fairly large congregations in spite of the incessant heavy rain. It certainly required strong determination to face such a deluge.

The exchanges have slightly increased the evening congregations at Edinburgh, but the prevailing stormy weather has operated against church attendance. My experience of the dimness of the evening light in the stately chapel prompts me to suggest the introduction of the electric light. Castle-terrace stands always in the "shadow of a great rock," and needs illumination.

The exchanges in which I have taken part have impressed me with high respect for the devoted workers who, at their several posts, keep up the churches. In each congregation there is a band of dependable doers who render patient service and put a gracious love into their labour. They form an inner apostolate of work, and by their living touch the Church and its institutions are energised.

Better than the exchange of ministers would be a fraternisation of these workers. If all our church committees and those who are pillars in the churches were to meet twice a year and have an exchange of experiences, much light and heat would be generated. Our congregations are too far apart for meeting, else it would do them good to mix. It is our isolation that devitalises. It prevents the enthusiasm that springs from collective communion. A Unitarian crowd in Scotland would be a novelty. And yet if all those connected with our seven churches—men, women and children—were to gather together with one accord, they would make a considerable gathering. It would be exhilarating if we all met on the Carse of Stirling some fine day!

But the sense of isolation is now almost entirely physical. There is an evident spiritual approach on the part of other denominations. Very rapidly indeed is theological thought coming our way. The dogmatic walls erected by the sturdy polemics of the seventeenth century are now as fragmentary as the old Roman wall. The old doctrinal controversies are extinct. The preacher of the ancient Evangelical type, fed on Augustine, Calvin and Knox, has given place to one of another breed, who has drank at Harnack's well and tasted Ritschl's wine.

The theological atmosphere of Scotland has entirely changed. It seems as if an order had gone forth to "untie the winds and let them fight against the Churches." The admission of the errancy of the Bible has been the greatest alterative. It has been made slowly and sadly. The higher criticism is not yet quite forgiven for its aggressive iconoclasm. It has come to stay, but its coming is not welcome. It has caused a reconstruction which is hard to undertake and difficult to accomplish. The most advanced men shrink from the task, and no Scottish theologian seems capable of producing a great reconstructive work. We get glimpses of the change of thought in special utterances, but the rebuilding is not yet systematically attempted. The teachers of ministers cautiously assimilate the results of criticism and conserve the old terminology while they suffuse it with a new sense. The ministers themselves are "between the deil and the deep sea"—the critics and the confession. The readier and richer-minded young preachers deliver literary rather than doctrinal discourses. They take up the picturesque and humanistic parts of the Old Testament and read its law through its poetry. They find more to say for the parables than for the miracles of the New Testament, and are more concerned with the beatitudes than with the arguments of Paul. The old-fashioned commentaries on Romans, such as Morrison and Gibson wrote, seem as remote now as to be among the Tertiary fossils of Biblical exposition.

Spiritual changes proceed faster than physical ones. A theological climate alters rapidly, and in the course of a couple of generations the flora and fauna undergo transformation, and even a new man appears in the renewed Kirk. Every observant Scot who is passing over to seventy, and has watched the process of theological development, must marvel at the thorough change which has taken place in the Scottish theological sphere.

Though there are in almost every city one or more conspicuously broad and courageously aggressive preachers who persistently set forth advanced thought, there is a lack of leading prophecy. There is a waiting aspect, a temporising temper which is relaxing. It is only the strong man here and there who dares to speak out. It is felt that criticism is not finished, that the new theology is nebulous, and the average preacher accommodates himself to the transition. There is thus all the more need for an alert, free, capable ministry to lead the required advance. It belongs to the Unitarians to be unrelaxed, to set themselves strenuously to the work of constructing a spiritual religion. To make the spiritual real, religion a passion of the enlightened soul, the Church a feeder of aspiration is the work to which we are specially called by the evolutionary activities around us.

It is unfortunate for the congregation at Kirkcaldy that it will soon have to face another vacancy in the pulpit. The "lang toon" needs a pregnant loon, and it is to be hoped that one of the peculiar build will be forthcoming. If the shades of Adam Smith and Thomas Carlyle still haunt the region, they should be invoked. Perhaps also Edward Irving's ghost (in some unrhapsodical moment) might be consulted. The problems of thought are no less tough than they were when Carlyle strode o'er the sands wrestling with them; and whoever essays to teach in the sturdy Burgh requires to have a good head on his shoulders, and a strong heart between his ribs.

The present exchanges do not include Kilmarnock. A new zeal has taken hold of Clerk's-lane Church, and things are lively there. May it once more be a scene of prosperity!

With the St. Vincent-street (Glasgow) congregation activity is highly energetic. All the institutions of the church are full of gladsome vigour. We hear of great plans for the transformation of the basement of the buildings, so as to make the whole edifice available for congregational purposes. With unity and enthusiasm the desired hall, &c., will become an accomplished fact.

The church property here is offered for sale again, and we trust that the day of sale (March 2) will bring a buyer. The key of the situation lies in the sale of the property. If a sale be effected building operations will at once be commenced on a less costly plan. We prefer our original plans, but unless we get additional help they must be modified. It seems a great pity not to be able to take full advantage of our excellent site. But we want to avoid debt, and though there is need for even larger buildings than our full scheme proposes, we may have to submit to severe modification. We are very anxious to have our new buildings, for our present premises prevent progress, but festina lente presses on us as a principle of action.

POSTCRIPT.

SIR,—By a strange oversight in my Provincial Letter last week I made no mention of Warrington, whose minister and Sunday-school teachers have fraternised most cordially with our Liverpool district work. I had the pleasure of preaching there a few weeks ago, and was impressed by the devotional effect of the liturgical services, musical throughout, the choir and organist maintaining a high tone of reverence. I was even more impressed by the teeming Sunday-school, with a large number of elder scholars. The attendance prizes were given that afternoon, and amongst eighty-six who obtained these, several young men and women took first-class prizes. This is a most noteworthy fact in face of the general difficulty in retaining elder scholars.

May I add that I feel confident that I voice a widespread feeling when I express great regret that we are losing Mr. Lummis from our circle of churches. Leicester gains what we lose, and we must comfort ourselves with that fact.

H. W. HAWKES.

A CORRECTION.

Provincial Letter (Liverpool).

SIR,—Referring to the letter in your last issue, I notice one or two slight inaccuracies (possibly prophecies) which I am sure Mr. Hawkes will excuse my pointing out. They concern our forward Temperance movement here. A limited company has not yet actually been formed, but is in course of formation, and a lady has generously promised to advance a considerable sum at a low rate of interest. The purchase of premises is practically concluded, though the contract is not actually signed, and we hope to begin the alterations very shortly.

I trust Mr. Hawkes' news is only a little "previous," and we intend to appeal soon to sympathisers far and near to help our movement in a practical way by taking shares in the new company. It has a splendid opportunity before it, especially as an ideal site for the purpose has been secured. HAROLD COVENTRY.

THE JOHN POUNDS HOME.

SIR,—Will you allow me through the medium of your paper, on behalf of our Committee, most heartily to thank all our kind friends who have recently helped us with subscriptions and donations at a time of great financial difficulty.

The last year has been one of special difficulty. We began it with an overdraft of £15, we have lost several of our old subscribers, who are very difficult to replace, and our expenses during the year have been more heavy than usual owing to necessary repairs and the illness and death of our under-matron. The generosity of our friends has enabled us to pay our debts and put us in a position to start a new year free, but our committee feel scarcely justified in carrying on the work unless they can obtain more subscriptions or promises from our present subscribers to help us in case of need at the close of next year. Mrs. Wilkins, who originally promised to pay the rent for three years besides giving us other substantial help, has generously continued the payment of the rent for another two years, which have now come to an end, and this, of course, is a great loss. A member of our congregation has undertaken to pay the rent (£30) for one year, and we can rely upon about £55 in subscriptions. This will leave nearly £100 to be raised for the year, towards which, judging from the past, we may perhaps safely reckon on donations to the amount of £20. We should therefore be grateful to any subscribers and friends who would advise and help us in this matter. I need hardly urge on those who know anything of the dangers and temptations for young girls in this large garrison and naval town, the necessity for such a work as we have been carrying on for the last five years, and how constantly they need help in beginning life.

During these five years forty-six girls have been received into the Home, most of whom have been placed out in domestic service. Of these twenty-eight are doing well, or fairly so; the remainder are more or less unsatisfactory, though we have not altogether lost hold of most of them. The greater number of these girls still keep in touch with us and attend our classes, for we feel most strongly that the training in the Home is but the beginning of our work, and, in spite of disappointments and failures, we know that the lives of many of these girls are raised and helped by the aid we give them. Our present matron has the Home in excellent order, and is thoroughly competent to train the girls for domestic service.

Hoping for advice from our friends at this most anxious crisis of our work, and thanking them again for the generous help they have already given.

(MRS.) MARY ROGERS, Hon. Sec.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Cirencester.—The Rev. Henry Austin has been elected by the Stratton Parish Council one of the first managers of the National School under the Education Act.

Dundee.—On Saturday, Feb. 21, the thirty-seventh anniversary of the induction of the Rev. H. Williamson as minister of the Unitarian Christian Church was celebrated in the Unitarian Hall. Mr. Williamson presided, and among others present were the Rev. R. B. Drummond, of Edinburgh; Dr. Barlow, President of the Scottish Unitarian Association; Professor Kuenen, Ph.D.; Mr. Charles Dand, secretary; and Dr. Wood, treasurer. The Chairman briefly introduced Mr. Drummond, who contrasted the treatment meted out to Unitarians forty years ago with that they received to-day. There was much more liberality shown in religious matters now, although he still noticed that people whose opinions were the same as his own were nevertheless very anxious to prove that they were not Unitarians; perhaps they would be nearer the truth were they to say they were not members of a Unitarian Church. Dr. Barlow referred to the prosperous state of the church. He was pleased they had a good financial balance. He believed the amount of collections was a good gauge of the interest manifested in the work. On Sunday anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. R. B. Drummond, when there was a good attendance.

Gloucester.—On Tuesday evening the congregation and friends at Barton-street Chapel had the privilege of listening to a lecture by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick on "The Visit of the English Unitarian Party to the Unitarians of Transylvania in 1901." Mr. Broadrick's description of the journey and the country, and especially of the enthusiasm with which the party was received, was heard with the greatest interest; but the audience was most deeply impressed with his account of the Transylvanian Unitarians, their history and present position. The lecture was illustrated by nearly 100 very fine lantern views, and at the conclusion the Rev. Walter Lloyd proposed, and Captain Calway seconded, a cordial vote of thanks to Mr. Broadrick for his visit to Gloucester and his instructive and impressive lecture. Mr. C. W. Washbourne presided.

Horwich.—Sunday last was the seventh anniversary of the opening of the church. The Rev. Principal Gordon was the evening preacher. The weather was wretched, but a good congregation assembled. The preacher's words were followed with the closest attention, and his eloquent sermon will not soon be forgotten.

Liscard.—The Lecture Hall of the Memorial Church was crowded on Wednesday, Feb. 18, at the meeting of the Wednesday Evening Society, and many people were turned away from the doors. The occasion was a Schubert programme, arranged by Messrs. H. P. Houghton and J. Monkhouse. Mr. Houghton first gave a brief but very interesting lecture on the life and work of the composer, and in conclusion quoted Schumann, who, referring to Schubert, said, "He has done enough." It was their privilege, as it was their pleasure, to pay grateful but inadequate tribute to the greatness of his accomplished work, and they offered their programme to the honour of his memory, and in reverence of his genius. The lecture was followed by a delightful rendering of some of Schubert's most characteristic works, both vocal and instrumental, in which Mr. and Mrs. Monkhouse, Mrs. Lusk, Miss May Ellis, Mr. J. H. Gibson, and others took part. The string quartette, led by Mr. Monk-house, was a most welcome feature in the programme.

Liverpool Postal Mission.—The annual meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 21, in the meeting-room of the Ancient Chapel, where a goodly number met and enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. R. Topham Steele, who kindly provided afternoon tea, as a preliminary to business. The room was nearly full, and would probably have been quite full if a storm of rain had not prevented several friends from being present. Mr. P. H. Holt was in the chair, and spoke of his sympathy with Postal Mission work, and the need which still exists for it. The year's report shows a steady increase in the number of applications for Unitarian literature, and some interesting extracts of letters received from correspondents testify to the usefulness of the work, while the balance-sheet shows the need there is for more financial help. Miss K. Gittens was present, and spoke of the widespread influence of Postal Missions and the growing change of thought among orthodox people, with special reference to her own experience in the work. The Rev. R. A. Armstrong spoke of the importance of having a plentiful supply of several copies of the best books, so that a correspondent need never be kept waiting for any such book through someone else having borrowed it, and named as especially useful "Types of Religious Experience," recently published by the B. and F.U.A. A vote of thanks to Mrs. Steele, Miss Gittens, and the Chairman, brought the meeting to a close.

London: Bell-street (Appointment).—The Rev. Sydney H. Street, B.A., of Great Hucklow, has accepted the invitation of the London Domestic Mission Society to take charge of the Bell-street Mission, and is to enter on his duties on March 22.

London: Brixton.—At the annual business meeting of the congregation, held at Effra-road on Feb. 25, a resolution, moved by Mr. David Martineau, seconded by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and carried with the heartiest unanimity, placed on record the gratitude and appreciation of the congregation for the great services rendered by Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, who had held the office of treasurer for a period of eighteen years. Mr. John Harrison was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mr. Nettlefold. Encouraging reports of the various activities of the congregation were read by Mr. T. H. Terry, who was re-elected hon. secretary.

London: Central Postal Mission.—There was a fair attendance at the Soirée and Religious Conference held in the Council Room at Essex Hall on Monday evening, when an address was given by Mr. T. J. Hardy, B.A., on "The Moral Danger of Theological Reserve," followed by discussion. Progress in thought, Mr. Hardy said, was like practical navigation if people insisted on using old and defective charts, disaster must follow. The creeds of the churches were like charts long out of date, and must be revised in the light of present-day knowledge. The theological reserve, which was so hurtful to religious life in the churches, was either silent about facts, or represented them as what they were not, in order to make it appear that the old positions were not disturbed. This point was illustrated by the Bishop of Ripon's treatment of the subject of revelation in his "Introduction" to the Temple Bible, and the common attitude of Broad Churchmen towards miracles. A wise caution in the acceptance of new opinions was to be commended, but perfect frankness was essential. Mr. Hardy concluded with a powerful appeal for practical veracity on the part of the clergy, and the martyr's courage, without which moral progress could not be effected. The chair was taken by Dr. Herbert Smith, who took a different view of the Broad Churchman's difficulties, and in the course of the discussion Sir R. K. Wilson strongly supported Mr. Hardy's position.

London: Little Portland-street.—A large congregation assembled on Sunday evening last, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., on Tolstoy's novel, "Resurrection," which has just been produced in dramatic form at His Majesty's Theatre by Mr. Beerbohm Tree. In the morning the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke was unable to preach, owing to a slight attack of influenza, but he hopes to resume his ministry to-morrow.

London: Stratford.—The church at Stratford a few weeks ago lost by death its oldest member, Mr. Warne; it has now sustained another loss by the death of Mr. Willes, who passed away unconsciously to the rest and peace of the higher life during the early morn of Thursday, the 12th inst. He had not been very well of late, but the medical attendant anticipated nothing serious. He was bright and cheerful on the preceding evening, but when his son went to take his morning farewell before going to business, there was no response, for the spirit had quitted its earthly tenement. For many years he was a member of the Effra-road Church, Brixton, and the faithful attendant of the late Rev. W. M. Ainsworth. On removal to Poplar he identified himself with the Stratford congregation, and was very highly esteemed by all who knew him. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, at the East London Cemetery, on Monday, the 16th inst.

London: Wandsworth.—The "coming of age" of the congregation was celebrated by special services last Sunday, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant addressed the younger people in the morning, and the general body of members and visitors in the evening. The attendance was large on both occasions. "Our Unitarian Gospel" was the subject of the evening sermon. The preacher said theirs was a message of good tidings, for it affirmed the Divine Life, evident in the universe and revealed in Christ and Christ-like souls. They claimed freedom for all to realise this Life in the best way possible to themselves; to think freely and worship freely. Above all they invited co-operation in all that makes a community wise, intelligent, and virtuous. Their church was now "of age." The hopes with which it started were so far fulfilled that it had no mean record of service done to human souls. Now it was for them to rejoice and go on with God's help to greater service still.—On Thursday and Friday (26th and 27th) other meetings were arranged, and to-morrow (Sunday) the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was an active promoter of the first meetings of the congregation twenty-one years ago, will conduct the services. A report of these proceedings will appear next week.

Richmond.—The annual meeting of the Ormond-road Free Church was held on Thursday, Feb. 19, the Rev. S. Farrington in the chair. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:—Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Edwards, Mr. J. Marshall, Mr. Clayden, and Dr. H. C. H. Carpenter, on the committee; Mr. H. Richards as treasurer, and Mr. T. J. Hardy as secretary. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the annual report, reviewed the work of the past year, and regretted the loss which the church had sustained by the removal from the neighbourhood of some who had long been in active connection with the work. Among these was Lady Agatha Russell. There were, however, signs of progress, and he accorded a hearty welcome to those who had recently enrolled themselves as members. The adoption of the report was seconded by Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., and supported by Mr. E. Wilkes Smith, in words of valuable practical counsel. Mr. Clayden also spoke earnestly on the need for providing interests within the church for the young. This was apropos of a resolution passed to the effect that a junior branch of members should be constituted, to which young persons under the age of eighteen should be admitted on compliance with certain conditions. Previous to this year there has been no provision for the recognition of members under eighteen. An address was then delivered by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who reminded those present of the aims and methods of the church, and of the numbers of men and women outside seeking the light and help which liberal faith can alone afford. Mr. Bowie was followed by Mr. Hardy, who drew attention to the newly-formed Boys' Guild, and its claims on the church, and expressed, as secretary, their very earnest appreciation of the valuable assistance afforded by Mr. Clayden and Mr. Day in the establishment of the project. The Chairman then closed the proceedings with the benediction There was a good attendance, and an earnest and sympathetic tone pervaded the meeting.

Rotherham.—The last lecture of the session of the Church of Our Father Literary and Social Union was given on Wednesday, Feb. 18, by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford. His subject was "The Solar System," and the lecture, with lantern illustrations, was highly appreciated. Alderman D. L. Winter, J.P., presided.

Sidmouth.—The local newspaper has been taking a religious census of the morning attendances here. The Old Meeting, with a total of sixty-seven, makes a good showing, considering the comparatively small population. Recently a number of strangers from London and the North have come to reside at this favoured spot, so that the outlook for the future is most promising.

Swansea.—The annual tea and entertainment were held on Thursday, and there was the largest attendance on record. Mr. C. H. Perkins presided in the evening over a most interesting entertainment, and the schoolroom was crowded. Last week the Rev. W. Tudor Jones officiated at the burial of the oldest inhabitant of the town—Mrs. Butt—who died at the advanced age of ninety-six. She had been connected with our church most of her lifetime.

Todmorden.—In a Free Church Mission, organised by the local Sunday School Union, the Unitarian Church and School have taken part. The Mission was held from Feb. 14 to Feb. 23, the missioner being the Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, of London. It has been in every way a success. The presence of two Baptist ministers, one Congregationalist, one Primitive Methodist, one Wesleyan, and one Unitarian, afforded a happy sight of Christian unity.

Whitchurch: Salop.—On Wednesday, Feb. 18, the annual tea and business meeting of the congregation of the Church of the Saviour was held in the schoolroom, and was one of the pleasantest gatherings in the history of the church. The Rev. C. D. Badland, M.A., occupied the chair. Satisfactory reports were presented, and votes of thanks to the minister and other helpers were cordially passed. Mr. Badland spoke a few words of encouragement to the members, expressing the conviction that with united effort there was a happy future before the church. Business being over, the rest of the evening was spent in various games, and a most enjoyable time was spent by all.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Pope, Leo XIII., who is ninety-three years old, celebrated on Tuesday, amid great splendour, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his elevation. It is said that 70,000 people were crowded into St. Peter's when the old man was borne in gorgeous procession, crowned with a new tiara, the gift of his Cardinals, up the nave of the great church. Mass was celebrated, and the Pope himself chanted the Te Deum, and afterwards gave his benediction to the multitudes.

THE City Temple is to be congratulated on its choice of a successor to Dr. Parker. As everyone expected, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A., of Brighton, has been called to fill the most prominent Nonconformist pulpit in London. Mr. Campbell's great and deserved influence in Brighton, together with his phenomenal success at the Monday morning services, had clearly pointed him out as the coming man. Congregations have a curious way of going to the other extreme in the choice of ministers, and the City Temple is no exception, for Mr. Campbell is the very antithesis of his predecessor. The one laid on his colours with a trowel; the other uses a fine camel's hair brush. The one was dramatic, explosive, or let us say robust; the other is delicate, subdued, studious. The one had the voice of a Boanerges; the other has a voice of no exceptional power, although it has something better—thrill! The contrast could not be more complete. It speaks hopefully for the seriousness and earnestness of life in London that 3,000 people gather together at mid-day every Thursday to listen, not to clap-trap, but to thoughtful, quiet, philosophic talk on the great problems of the soul and destiny. Mr. Campbell is the very last man to be called a sensational preacher. His theological point of view is not ours, but he is so insistent and persuasive in the purely religious sphere where theological differences count for little, so emphatic in the appeal "Trust to thine heart and to what the world calls illusions," that we rejoice in the presence of a new religious force in the heart of the greatest city of the world, and trust he may exercise a ministry there the influence of which shall not only be deep and abiding, but carried far and wide.

Lest haply your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting. Such is the warning text of a sermon on "Civic Feasting—a Plea for Municipal Purity," preached in Hope-street Church by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and published in the March number of Sermons for the Day. (Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street. By post 1½d.) The sermon is based on facts revealed by one of the elective auditors of the city of Liverpool as to the excessive feasting of certain committees of the City Council. Some rather astonishing particulars of what these gentlemen drink and smoke at the public expense when on duty will be found in the sermon, and its indignant protest at the grossness of it, and the evil effect it must have on the tone of public life, will, we must hope, be widely heard. Two significant passages we will quote here :—

> He who is "overcharged with surfeiting," he who is a glutton and a wine-bibber, may still no doubt retain the remnants of better qualities. He may be good-natured, oven according to his lights truthful and honest. He may be a faithful and convinced adherent of a party, a devoted upholder of a Church or a creed. But he cannot retain that fineness of judgment, or that luminous decision of conscience, which alone can make a man fit to discharge with honour and effect responsibilities imposed upon him by his fellow-citizens in a position of public trust.
> All these considerations would be to the point if we were merely considering the self-indulgence of men offering themselves for public functions, in their own private life. The man of gross habits, the man of inordinate self-indulgence, can never be a really desirable candidate for public honours. He is a selfish man. And selfish men are the curse and ruin of public life.
> But still more shameful does this become when it is remembered that this surfeit is procured at the public cost, and the sermon further points to the contrast between this extravagance in self-indulgence and the kind of provision made for humble workmen injured in the public service. The actual self-indulgence, Mr. Armstrong said, might be regarded by some as a small matter, but he adds :—
> These things are symptoms. They are a tell-tale index pointing to a wrong conception of public duty, and a fell disease at the heart of civic patriotism. They reveal that the fine blossom of honour is bruised and crushed. They tell of a degradation which extends to the voters themselves, who single out for places of public trust men of gross and self-indulgent habits. They tell of a blurring of the high and pure ideal which should prevail in every self-governing community, and by which alone can free institutions tend to the common health and happiness, and the common moral and religious life.

Liverpool, happily, has many members of her Council, and many other high-minded and devoted citizens, to whom these things are abhorrent, and the sermon concludes with a fervent appeal for more such to take up the battle against every form of corruption in public life.

A SINISTER example of how the new Education Act may work out has been brought into public notice by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, in an article in the Nottingham Daily Express, of Feb. 26. In previous articles he had expressed the fear that under Sections 8 and 9 of the Act undue advantage was given for the extension of denominationalism at the public cost, and now he has this definite instance to point to, as justifying his foreboding. Thus he writes :—

> The congregation to which I have the privilege of ministering has been in the forefront of educational work in this city. For nearly a century before the establishment of the Board school system that congregation provided the town of Nottingham with a school unsectarian in letter and in spirit. On the distinct understanding that the unsectarian principle of that school should be preserved inviolate it was handed over, together with its scholarship funds, to the Board. That school is now the High-pavement Stanley-road Board School, of which I am one of the managers. It is precisely such a well-staffed and successful institution as I had in mind when I wrote the above-mentioned article. It has become full—so full that over 150 scholars, who form the intermediate section, are now being taught in the airy and commodious rooms originally intended for laundry work and gymnastic exercises—a purpose for which it had been found impracticable or unnecessary to use them. These rooms are in every way fitted for the use to which they are now being put, and the only possible cavil that can be raised is that the classes in them are too large. I understand that the School Board has already acquired land on which to erect premises which will relieve this temporary strain. Well, what has happened? Simply this, that the Board of Education refuses to sanction the temporary use of these rooms on the ground, inter alia, that (to quote the exact words of the official letter of the 21st inst.)—"The Board of Education understand there is ample surplus accommodation at All Saints' National School."

Referring to this matter in a leading article on "The Next Campaign," on Tuesday, the Daily News added the following vigorous protest:—

And was it for this, asks Mr. Thomas, that the High-pavement unsectarian schools were established and subsequently transferred to the School Board? Was it in order that they should become feeders for the Anglican system? Yes, for this. What other object had Convocation in mind when it sent forth its fiat to the Government? It converts the machinery of education to the amiable purpose of manufacturing little Anglicans—diverting the stream of toddlers from the Board School to All Saints'—and then it genially tenders its friendship to the Nonconformists, and asks them through its naïve Canon of Westminster why they cannot co-operate. Co-operate! In the same spirit Johnson's fishmonger complained that the eel he was skinning refused to co-operate. The business of Nonconformists is not to co-operate but to fight—to fight first to save the School Board of London, and next to remedy the great wrong that has already been done in the country. We will talk of co-operation when we have got justice.

Such is the feeling which will be aroused throughout the country by the Government's policy under the new Act.

THE NEW EDUCATION ACT.

DORSET.

The county of Dorset is well to the fore in its arrangements for working the new Education Act, and here it seems probable that June 1 will be the date selected on which the Act will come in force. Here, too, the Act seems likely to work smoothly. Pains have been taken to secure a representation of all interests concerned; and in some places, at any rate, an example will be set which may be useful in determining the lines on which amendment to the Act should be sought in order to promote justice and efficiency in the country at large.

The Technical Instruction Committee, which possesses a most efficient chairman in the Rev. E. W. Goodden, was directed to prepare a scheme for the appointment of the Education Committee. This scheme came before a special meeting of the County Council on Jan. 13, and after full discussion and some amendment was adopted in the following form:—

The County Education Committee is to consist of thirty-three members—namely (a) The chairman and vice-chairman of the Council and the chairman and vice-chairman of its finance committee; (b) twenty other members of the Council, five from each of the four Parliamentary divisions; (c) nine other persons experienced in education, of whom two at least are to be women. Of the other seven one is nominated by the Governors of the King's School, Sherborne, one by the head teachers of the secondary schools in Dorset, one by the certificated teachers employed in the elementary schools maintained by the Council (such nominee may be himself a teacher, and a National schoolmaster has been chosen, but then he is debarred from voting on any question of teachers' salaries) one by the Voluntary Association of National Schools and one by the Voluntary Association of Undenominational Schools. The other two are the hon. secretary of a secondary school at Blandford and a late assistant master of Harrow School.

In the selection of the twenty members from the County Council some curious points might be noted. For instance, one farmer was put on after he had proclaimed that he had never had as much education himself as his own ploughboys were now getting. But he is a first-rate farmer, and may give good advice on agricultural training, and there are plenty of other members to look after matters where his opinions are undoubtedly antiquated. It is gratifying to see the name of Mr. T. A. Colfox among the representatives for West Dorset, and no less so to see the name of Miss Colfox as one of the two women placed upon the committee, the other being the wife of Archdeacon Sowter. How these two ladies are to do the work which will be required of them for the whole county remains to be seen, but it is understood that there will be an elaborate organisation of district and local committees so that all details will be supervised by persons interested in education and residing in the immediate neighbourhood; and it is hoped that under the care of these committees, such improvements as are found practicable will be gradually introduced.

This is as far as arrangements for the whole county have been announced. Coming to the towns and villages we find contrasts which afford a striking illustration of the unfairness of the system which the Act perpetuates.

In Bridport all is well, because more than fifty years ago all parties united to build and support the General schools, and did their work so satisfactorily that for years a model of the Boys' School was on view at South Kensington. The fundamental principle of these schools is Undenominationalism. The Bible is to be read and taught daily, but no catechism or other formulary of religion peculiar to any religious denomination may be used, and parents or guardians are to be perfectly free to choose the place of worship and Sunday-school which their children shall attend. So successful have these General schools been, that it is only comparatively recently that the Bridport National schools have maintained a boys' department, Churchmen, as well as Nonconformists, having long been content with the undenominational religious teaching of the General schools. Here all religious difficulty has been absolutely non-existent, as the present writer is competent to testify, having been one of the managers for about fifteen years, and the hon. secretary for the last six. All the Nonconformist parents as well as a large number of those belonging to the Church of England have been perfectly satisfied with a religious syllabus which ensures a fair knowledge of the Bible, and such instruction thereon, given by the head-teachers, as is suited to children, leaving to the Sunday-school and the home any further instruction in such matters as cause denominational differences. In this school the new Act brings little change and no friction. The four foundation managers have been selected without the smallest denominational jealousy, and when two other managers are chosen, one by the Town Council and the other by the County Education Committee, the only change that we anticipate is improved efficiency, especially in the co-ordination of elementary with the technical and secondary education that the county will provide. Here all is well. But we need only go as far as Dorchester to find things different. Here some years ago a good British school existed. But the managers believed that the town should have a School Board and closed their school with the intention of compelling its introduction. The Church bewailed the necessity, but said nothing more till the school was closed. Then their plans were ready, the contracts were promptly signed, and extensions to the National schools provided the places required in time to avert the establishment of a Board. So in this thriving county town all the elementary schools may be warranted to provide a proper "Church atmosphere," and every head-teacher must be a member of the Church of England. The fact is Voluntary Undenominational schools in Dorset are limited to Bridport, Parkstone, Poole, Sherborne, Verwood and Three Cross. Then there are three Wesleyan schools, four Roman Catholic, and a few others that are difficult to class. The Board schools number only eighteen throughout the whole county, and outside Wareham they are exclusively rural schools, managed by the little School Board of the unsatisfactory kind. On the other hand, the Church schools in the county number about 160. What can the county Education Committee, with the best will in the world, do to make this arrangement fair to the Nonconformists? In nearly all the towns, and in nearly all the country parishes, every child must either receive no religious education in the day school, or else receive religious teaching which, if it is thorough and conscientious Church teaching, must treat Nonconformity as sin. And for these schools Nonconformists will be required to pay rates.

How the thing will work out remains to be seen. There is no doubt that strenuous efforts will be made to work the Act as fairly as possible, and we may be heartily glad of this. For it will show what alterations in the Act are absolutely essential, and in what directions change should be sought.

H. Shaen Solly.

Mr. Balfour's appointments to the vacant sees of Winchester and St. Albans, and to the sees from which bishops were translated, have caused no enthusiastic assent, nor any violent dissent among Churchmen, but a kind of apathetic acquiescence. From the standpoint of the Presbyterian Prime Minister this is, no doubt, the result to be desired, and the assurance of success. Dr. Ryle has not been long at Exeter, but his scholastic distinction is great enough to entitle him to high preferment in the Church. The devotion with which Dr. Jacob, at the age of fifty-eight, is undertaking the appalling task that confronts the Bishop of St. Albans, is in keeping with his whole record of work, both at Portsea and in Newcastle. The selection of a Bishop-Suffragan, outside the privileged dioceses of Canterbury and London, to fill the see vacated by Dr. Jacob, creates a new precedent. It is not, however, of a very audacious kind, and it has the advantage of reducing the actual bishop-making of the First Lord to the irreducible minimum. The appointment of Dr. Robertson, the Principal of King's College, to Exeter, is generally regarded as safe and discreet.

RELIEF WORKS AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

THERE is, perhaps, no form of relief so attractive, and primâ facie so sound in its methods, as the institution of relief works for the unemployed. If distress is due to want of work, surely the remedy is to supply work; and if those in distress are willing to work, what better test can you require that they are genuine people who deserve our help? And yet there are few departments of charitable work which afford such a history of failures. Year after year charitable funds and municipal authorities renew their efforts to provide for the "unemployed," and year after year leaves its dreary record of disappointment and waste. The best complete record and summary is the Local Government Board Report on Agencies and Methods for Dealing with the Unemployed, 1893; and for subsequent experiments and efforts the Report of the Select Committee on Distress, 1895, and later contemporary records of local experiences.

Do Relief Works really help?

In what sense, it may be asked, were these attempts failures? Did they not provide work for the unemployed, and pay them for it, and so relieve their distress? Or is it suggested that they had some other end in view of which they failed? The answer is a complex one; I will begin it in this way: We are all agreed, I suppose, that when we say we want to "help the unemployed" what we mean is that we want to help them to earn an honest living, not to help them to continue in dishonest idleness. Here arises the first difficulty—that of ensuring that the men really work. At the risk of being called harsh and unfeeling, we must, if we are to face this problem fairly, recognise the fact that a great proportion of those who figure as "unemployed" every year are really "unemployable," in the sense that they either will not, or cannot, work regularly and fairly. Now, if you are not to have the option of dismissing ineffective workers, the only way of ensuring that they will at least do the best they can is to put them on "piece-work," i.e., to pay them by results, instead of so much an hour. The most emphatic evidence on this point is that of the Lord Provost of Glasgow before the Select Committee in 1895: "During my term of office we have had two occasions on which we have had relief works, and the instant we applied piece-work the men melted away like snow." Again, when Millbank Prison was demolished a part of the work was reserved for the unemployed; when a change was made from time to piece-work, they did twice as much as before. The experience is invariable; the bulk of the men will not give fair work for a wage which they regard as a charity, unless the wage is made proportionate to their exertions.

The Pretence of Work.

Where this system has not been applied the pretence at work has degenerated into a mere farce. In St. Pancras in 1895 great pressure was put upon the Guardians to open the labour-yard. It was opened for a week, and then it was found that over £100 had been paid for work worth £12. In St. Olave's in the same year £17,000 was spent in employment relief, and every ton of stone broken cost the Union £7, the contract price being about 13s. a ton. The Chairman of the Board of Guardians stated: "You could not get the men to do anything—the class of men who were there. I know some who would have honestly endeavoured to do the work, but they were terrorised."

Here we see the fundamental obstacle to helping in this way the men whom we should all like to help—the self-respecting working-men who are really willing to give genuine work. These are a small minority amongst the habitual loafers who rush in to exploit any scheme of "employment relief," and they are forced to act with the majority. Of course, many prefer to hold aloof altogether, and so do not benefit at all.

If we are to aim not at touching the whole body of "unemployed," but only the select class, it must be done in one of two ways—either by a strict enforcement of piece-work to weed out the idlers, or by a careful investigation of each individual case beforehand. If we do this the numbers will be reduced to something very small, and we are likely to find that those who remain can be helped more effectively than by a temporary job of work.

An Example of Real Help.

Here, for instance, is the story of how one of the London "unemployed" was helped this winter. He is a married man, aged twenty-nine, with a wife and one little boy. Inquiry showed that in July he had been dismissed from his work in the country (he is a "ginger-beer brewer") with excellent references from his employer, had come up to London and found work, but the firm had almost immediately become bankrupt, and while with them he had rarely received his full money, £1 1s. a week. On Dec. 21 he had been seven weeks out of work, during which time he had lived upon his savings. These were now exhausted, he was in arrears with his club, his rent was half a week behind, and their food was reduced to a little bread. His wife was too ill with a weak chest to work. He is out every morning at 5 A.M. looking for work. The "plan of help" ordered by the Charity Organisation Committee was: "Sanction 10s. given, pay club arrears, give 10s. for another week, get medical report on wife."

The medical report showed the wife to be consumptive, and only capable of ameliorative treatment, which was procured for her; the man maintained his efforts to get work, and after many disappointments heard of a place at Croydon, but had no money to pay fares. Money was provided for this and to keep the home going for another week, and on Jan. 13 the man was engaged at Croydon for a fortnight on trial. Further help and nourishing food ordered by the doctor was provided until his first week's wages came in; and finally the family was assisted to redeem their clothing and move to Croydon, where they are now settled in a nice open part and with a garden. What would relief works have done for the family? They would have kept the man from seeking his proper work, they would have tempted him to stay on in London where his wife's death would have been hastened, and when they closed he would have been no better off than before, probably worse. And if it is objected that the expense of treating cases like this is too great, the answer is that the money now wasted on idlers is enough to help all the industrious two or three times over if carefully applied.

Danger of Aggravating the Evil.

For the second point in the complex answer I am trying to give is this: that unless we exercise the greatest care and wisdom the mere fact that either the State or the municipality or a charitable agency makes itself responsible for finding temporary employment tends to increase the numbers who swell the ranks of the "unemployed" every winter. We do not realise clearly enough how easily men may be tempted away from their work, if there is a fair prospect of someone stepping in to mitigate the consequences; and there is, I fear, no room for doubt that in our concern for the unemployed of late years we have greatly aggravated the evil. Look, in illustration, at the miserable processions which have been parading the streets of London, under the solemn escort of the police, and reaping a rich harvest from the thoughtless spectators. Very few real workers suffering from unusual lack of employment have been amongst them; they have held aloof from the degradation. But over and over again we have heard of men who have taken a day off from their work to "walk with the unemployed," and share the proceeds at the end. They are typical of the very considerable class who greatly prefer casual jobs to regular work, and are only too likely to sink into the class of the permanently unemployed if the way is made easy. So that I should be inclined to say that any scheme of employment relief, however well managed, must have this much counted against it—that it is another temptation to men to throw up their regular work on the chance of "something turning up"; in order to justify it we must be able to show results clearly outweighing this evil.

This temptation may be to some extent averted if we make the work continuous, instead of, as is generally done, for two or three days in the week only. The Local Government Board Report referred to is very clear on this point:

> The most searching of tests appears to be continuity of employment. Loafers and tramps are not unwilling to do a couple of days' work—even hard work; and many who will work for weeks together, three days in each week, would be weeded out if they were compelled to work every day. This being so, schemes which merely provide a few days' work for a large number of men in successive relays are of all others the most likely to be abused. They offer work in the form which exactly suits those who are unwilling to submit to continuous exertion, while doing very little for those really in distress. The plan of employing men in two shifts—three days a week each—is recommended on the ground that it gives them a chance to look out for work during the rest of the week; but against this very real advantage must be set the encouragement offered to loafers by an arrangement which falls in with their habits.

The Abbey Mills Experiment.

Some of the most interesting experiments have been made by those who were fully aware of the danger of perpetuating or increasing the unemployed class, but who hoped to make the temporary work the prelude to reinstating the men in permanent employment. The most carefully devised and carried out of these was the experiment known as the Abbey Mills scheme, the issue of a Mansion House Conference in 1892. It was confined to the special class of casual labourers who had been thrown out of work by the re-organisation of work at the Docks, and of whom there were said to be 6,000 or 7,000. The plan was to provide a fortnight's work as a test of willingness to work, and for those who passed the test to make every effort to give them a fresh start, either by emigration or in any other way they could suggest. Plenty of money was forthcoming, the London County Council provided land on the Abbey Mills Estate, and experienced men were found to conduct the experiment. Of the 6,000 or 7,000 supposed to be in need only between 700 and 800 applied for the work, and a preliminary examination showed that of those applying only 365 were even primâ facie suitable. Of these again, notwithstanding every effort, it was found possible to help with a view to permanent improvement only 86, and an inquiry some months later showed that of the 86 all but 40 had relapsed into the casual labour class. The cost of the experiment was £1,315, of which £732 was spent on the test work, and it was thought by one of the hon. secretaries who had worked the experiment that better results could have been attained by spending the whole of the money on assisting cases selected by careful inquiry, and without the intervention of relief works.

The Best Remedy.

The labour-yard, when properly supervised with strict discipline, may, no doubt, be made a useful adjunct to the work of the Poor Law Guardians in times of pressure. And large schemes of relief works may be very occasionally called for in an economic crisis, such as that of the cotton famine. But for our recurrent winter "unemployment" they are, I think, misdirected effort. So far as the distress is felt by the genuine workers, it is best met, I would suggest, by individual treatment, such as I have previously indicated; and if the scarcity of work is merely seasonal and temporary, the workers should be helped to lay by during the summer. If what we desire is to raise members of the loafing class into honest independence—and this, though difficult, is not impossible if you get them young enough—then the best results seem to be attained by individual work done on a small scale in small farm colonies, such as Mr. Walter Hazell's.

In conclusion I will quote Mr. John Burns, speaking yesterday (Feb. 27) at a conference on the unemployed. He said: "He was not in favour of any of the new-fangled schemes which had been brought forward. Perhaps the greatest permanent contribution to the unemployed problem and how to get rid of it was to so raise the wages of every honest man and woman when in work that, when some slight depression came along between the intervals of leaving one job and finding another, they would have sufficient to tide them over that period."

LITERATURE.

REASON AND REVELATION.*

Mr. Illingworth is one of the group of Oxford men who gave to the world the volume of Essays published in 1889 under the title of "Lux Mundi." The grounds of theistic belief were discussed by him in the fifth Essay of that volume. He treated the same subject more elaborately in the Bampton Lectures which he delivered before the University of Oxford in 1894; and again in a subsequent volume entitled "Divine Immanence." In both these books, as in the volume before us, the writer's method of treatment is very interesting, on account of his own wide and many-sided interests and the variety of aspects of experience to which he refers; but for the same reason it is hard to grasp his view of the relative importance of the contributions which these facts variously make to Theism. The deepest foundation he seems to find in an instinctive tendency to believe in God or in gods. This instinctive tendency needs to be morally and intellectually developed and trained.

In the present volume, what the author calls "natural theology" is taken for granted; he treats of those Christian doctrines which in his opinion are not simply added to, but grow naturally out of the ground of Theism when the implications of Theism are properly understood. The author belongs to that school of modern Christian teachers for whom the essential Christian truth (after the existence of a personal God) is the Incarnation. All else, even the Trinity, is subordinate to the Incarnation, and must be read in the light of it. The limits of the Incarnation and those of Revelation coincide.

This question is the greatest and the most practically important one of all those that confront religious teachers to-day. The present writer ventures to believe that this grand achievement of Christian thought, the doctrine of the Incarnation of God in Man, contains a truth which cannot be neglected without disastrous results to religion on its practical and on its theoretical side. By the neglect of this truth, the power of Unitarianism for good has been greatly, perhaps irreparably, injured. What then does Mr. Illingworth mean by the Incarnation?

In his opening chapter he expounds, with quotations, "the historic claim of Christianity to be rational," though he does not clearly show the ambiguities of that word "rational." In the four following chapters he carefully discusses the inevitable limitations under which human reason works, though he allows that "speculative satisfaction must ever remain the ideal." One would like, however, to have a clear answer to the question whether reason can be regarded as itself a source of fundamental beliefs, or only as a regulator of belief. The object of this preliminary discussion is apparently to lead up to one of the principal contentions of the book, that we cannot approach the study of Christianity without presuppositions of one kind or another; that the controversies which gather round the gospels are controversies between rival presuppositions, which depend not only on intellectual points of view, but also on personality and character. Argumentative objections to Christianity "are never purely intellectual in reality." (P. 172.) It is highly questionable whether anything can be "purely intellectual" in Mr. Illingworth's sense of the words, for our reason never works except in interpreting and organising our experience. But this part of the author's argument is of special interest as showing the variety of facts in the moral and spiritual experience of men on which their religious opinions and arguments really rest.

Along with the endeavour to illustrate this variety, the author evidently has another aim—to show that belief in the Incarnation is reasonable. He makes a few passing references to the Trinity, remarking in one place that the reality of God's love is possible "because there is a Trinity of Persons within the Godhead, between whom the reciprocity of Love can exist, a Divine Society." (P. 183.) Now it is a familiar fact that modern orthodox rationalists, in endeavouring to rationalise the doctrine of the Trinity, usually find that there is one Person too many. It is not surprising that Mr. Illingworth in his Bampton Lectures should explain the Holy Spirit as a "relation" between the Father and the Son. A "relation" is not a person. The Athanasian doctrine is practically reduced to this, that "The Father" gives in and through "The Son" the fullest possible expression of his Goodness and saving Love. Now the question is, what is the connection between "The Son," so understood, and the historic Jesus? We regret to find that Mr. Illingworth, like many others in the "liberal" wing of modern orthodoxy, unconsciously alternates between two different answers to this question. The first answer is that Jesus was God Incarnate. This involves the belief that the personality of Jesus, and the relation of the human and the Divine in him, was unique; and that he was absolutely good, in the sense of being by his very nature (or natures?) incapable of sin. If so, all that Jesus does for us must be purely miraculous, and the door is opened into the extremes of Sacerdotalism on the one hand, and of Evangelicalism on the other. The second answer is that "The Son" is Humanity. We recognise in human nature the incarnation and progressive self-revelation of the Eternal Life and Thought of God; in virtue of this incarnation, there are, inherent in every rational being, possibilities of advance in Thought, in Goodness, in Spiritual Insight, to which we can assign no limit. The person of Jesus shows to us the moral and spiritual aspects of the universal incarnation at their highest intensity; in him we recognise the supreme culmination and realisation of these possibilities of human nature, the supreme type in history, and perhaps the highest possible in a human life on earth.

In so far as the author's aim is to show the reasonableness of the Incarnation, the cardinal ambiguity to which we have referred leaves on the reader's mind a feeling of deep dissatisfaction. There are many points of interest in the book to which we should like to refer if space permitted. We cannot close without speaking of the perfect candour and refreshingly broad and reasonable spirit in which the author writes.

ROME AND THE BIBLE.

II.

BUT it is time to speak of that new intellectual life which has led the Pope to convoke the congregation for Biblical studies. It is almost exclusively connected with France, though in England also there were signs of coming change. There in 1881 Bishop Clifford, writing in the Dublin Review, argued that all attempts to reconcile the account of creation in the first chapter of Genesis with ascertained fact in geology had failed utterly. He proposed therefore to treat the chapter in question as a poem. In 1884 Cardinal Newman contributed an essay to the Nineteenth Century in which he repudiated the obligation to believe that Isaiah wrote all the prophecies attributed to him, or St. Mark the last twelve verses of the second gospel, provided always that these and other passages of the same kind were accepted as canonical and inspired. The Anglo-Roman public was, perhaps, too unfamiliar with the Bible to care much about this part of the Cardinal's thesis. He, however, went on to maintain that the Bible might contain mistakes in its obiter dicta, i.e., in trifling matters which were not even indirectly connected with revelation, and were evidently of no moment. St. Paul, for example, when he says he had left his cloak at Troas, might have been mistaken, and had possibly left it somewhere else. This second proposition excited considerable scandal, and the author of it was violently assailed because of it, both at home and abroad.

The Abbé Loisy.

But it is in France that the controversy has become serious. There the battle rages chiefly around one remarkable man, the Abbé Loisy, though, as we shall see presently, he is very far from standing alone. While still young he was made professor of Hebrew at the Paris Institut Catholique. Let us try to picture the circumstances in which the pious and learned priest found himself at the outset. We have already seen the remarkable decay of Biblical study in the Church. Something had been done by the brilliant Orientalist Lenorman, but he was a layman, and the Church to which he was devotedly attached placed one of his chief works (Origines de l'histoire) on the index. Apart from him no one, so far as we know, had shown any inclination to acknowledge even the best assured results of modern research. On the other hand Renan was interesting the world at large in the Bible and the early history of Christianity. It had come to such a pass that in France Bible study and rejection of the Christian revelation went hand in hand. Moreover, thoughtful men must have felt what a reproach the personal history of Renan was to the Church of Rome. Here was a man endowed with marvellous gifts, a man whose French was almost equal to Newman's English, a man of iron industry, of sympathetic soul, of blameless life. He had been driven out of the Church because he could not accept the historical accuracy of every chapter and verse in Genesis and Joshua. He had no quarrel with Christianity as such. He tells us in so many words that he could have continued to believe in the Holy Trinity and the Incarnation to the end. He might even have served his Church in the priesthood, if only he had never learnt Hebrew. The Abbé Loisy strove to mend this state of things. He tried to make peace between criticism and the Roman Church. He must have known that suffering awaited him. It has not failed to come, and he has borne it with a noble and patient courage. His early works on the Canon of the Old Testament, on Chaldean myths, on Job, were severely criticised, but nothing was done. When, however, in 1892, in his own review, "Enseignement Biblique," he denied that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, that the real history of man's origin could be learned from the early chapters of Genesis, and (most significant of all) that the narrative books even of the New Testament were always in accordance with the modern standard of historical accuracy, his Archbishop, Cardinal Richard, made him quit his chair. A heavier blow quickly followed. Leo XIII., in his brief Providentissimus, laid down the principle that "no error of any kind" (quidpiam falsi) could occur in authentic passages of canonical books. To think otherwise was to "pervert the idea of inspiration" and to "make God Himself the author of error." Consequently, Abbé Loisy brought his review to a close, and so far, but only so far, submitted. He still wrote under feigned names which deceived and were meant to deceive no one, and in 1900 Cardinal Richard forbade the continuation of an article which he had begun in a clerical journal on the origins of the people of Israel. His last book, "The Gospel and the Church," has once more roused the conservative zeal of Cardinal Richard, who has condemned it as subverting, not only the authority of the Bible and the Church, but even faith in the divinity of our Blessed Lord. Nothing, we are confident, could be further removed from M. Loisy's intention. He has now appealed to a higher tribunal, and gone to Rome.

Other like-minded Scholars.

Many able and learned priests support him, at least in the main. Such are the Abbé Dachesne, perhaps the most learned of Christian archæologists; Ermoni, professor of Scripture at St. Lazare in Paris; Paumier, professor of Oriental languages at Lisle; the Dominican Lagrange, head of the archæological school at Jerusalem and editor of the excellent Révue Biblique; and, above all, the brave and enlightened Archbishop of Albi, Mgr. Mignot. Many of the young priests are with him. Let us hear the conservative Abbé Gayraud in his "Crise de la foi." "Even among priests," he says, "faith in the authority is shaken, with several it is tottering: the doubt disseminated by criticism grows apace." We are told on similar authority that priests in conferences hurl accusations of heresy and unbelief against their brethren. Readers of "My New Curate" will remember that it hints at symptoms of neology among the young Irish priests.

One important fact remains to be mentioned. When the Roman Catholic Congress met in 1897 at Fribourg a paper was read by a well-known layman, the Baron von Hügel. He is by birth an Austrian-German; he has long made England his home, and he is, we believe, a personal friend of the Abbé Loisy. In this paper, then, he showed that recent criticism of the Hexateuch rested on solid foundations, and was permanently established. There was some dissent, but there was no storm. We may add that in England the Dublin Review and the Tablet now apparently take for granted that a Roman Catholic is free to accept or reject the theories of Kuenen and Wellhausen, according to the dictates of his own reason and conscience.

Admissions and Reserves.

How far are Roman Catholics of the critical school willing to admit that the historical accuracy of the Old Testament books is seriously affected by the process of dissection? Usually they avoid or evade the question. In England a Roman priest, the Rev. R. F. Clarke, thinks it enough to say that the compiler of the Hexateuch faithfully copied divergent documents and set them side by side. He was not responsible for their truth any more than the psalmist was responsible for the fool's statement that there is no God. Mr. Clarke ignores the fact that whereas the psalmist tells us he is quoting the words of a fool, the editor of the Hexateuch gives us no warning that he has welded together contradictory accounts of the Deluge. Nor can it be said that this fact is patent to all. For long ages the ablest Catholic expositors have had no inkling of the truth which Mr. Clarke sees so clearly.

What will the Church do?

We come at last to the final question, Will the Church of Rome tolerate reasonable and reverent criticism of the Holy Scriptures, or will it cast out this criticism as an evil thing? It is hard even to guess at the true answer, but there are hopeful signs. The Commission which was appointed in 1901 consisted originally of three cardinals and twelve consultors, but has been recently increased by the addition of two cardinals and twenty-eight consultors. The consultors meet once a fortnight under a cardinal president, while the cardinals who are members of the Commission also meet by themselves on the alternate weeks. It must be remembered that the cardinals alone vote; the consulters simply give their opinions with the arguments which they can bring to their support. Nor will anything be made public till it has received the Pope's approval. Nevertheless, we may assume that the points at issue will be carefully examined. Some of the consultors are undoubtedly men of learning. Van Hoonacker long ago won the respect of Kuenen by the ability with which he handled chronological difficulties in the period after the Babylonian captivity. Of Lagrange and Ceriani, we have spoken already. Scheil, like Lagrange, a Dominican, stands in the front rank of Assyriologists. Vigouroux, though an extreme conservative, is admittedly a learned and capable man.

Conservative Uneasiness.

It may be objected that the Commission is a mockery, since the discussion has been already closed by the brief "Providentissimus." It may be further urged that the Roman Inquisition, as if to show its contempt for the critics and all their works, declared as late as 1897 that no

Roman Catholic was free to deny or even to call in question the authenticity of John v. 7. (the text the of three heavenly witnesses), and that the Pope, in his letter to the French clergy (1899), repeated and confirmed the teaching of his former brief. Still, there is something to be said on the other side. There are tokens of uneasiness and of retreat in the conservative camp. The brief "Providentissimus," for all its peremptory tone, shrank from detail, and never, e.g., asserted the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. The letter to the French clergy was still more vague. As for the decree of the Inquisition, no sooner was it issued than Cardinal Vaughan wrote to Mr. Wilfrid Ward assuring him that the question of John v. 7 and its authenticity was still open. Nor do we believe that even on the principles of Ultramontanism either the Pope's brief or his letter to the French Church are ex cathedra and therefore irreformable. The Jesuits themselves, all along the deadliest foes of M. Loisy, betray some desire to capitulate. One of their number, Father Hummelauer, in his recent commentary on Deuteronomy, assigns that work which professes to be written by Moses partly to Joshua, partly to Samuel. We do not think this theory critical, though tested by the brief "Providentissimus" it is certainly unorthodox. And a Jesuit never utters a merely individual opinion. He can publish nothing that has not been examined and approved by his superiors.

Many a priest in M. Loisy's place would have been wearied out by the bitterness of the interminable conflict, and would have abandoned Christianity itself. He has chosen a better way. We hope that he will live to see the Church of his baptism and his affections enter upon a new era as glorious as any in the long history os its past. That Church is rich in good works at home; it does valiant service in the field of foreign missions. But it has, we fear, lost its hold on the great mass of educated and intelligent men. Even now it might win Frenchmen back to Christ if once it was convinced that no power on earth can do anything in the long run against the truth, that all truth is from above, and does but wait to be enlisted in the service of God and Christ.

"Help!" is the title of the sermon "for Hospital Sunday and Every Day," by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, published in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit. Taking first as parable a striking picture from Payn's "Lost Sir Massingberd," the weird cry heard across the park at night, and two years later the bones of the dead man found in the cleft of the hollow oak, the sermon turns to another picture and vividly describes the great city with its teeming life and prosperous activities, but then beneath that fair show another aspect, through which penetrate dull monotonous cries for help. The sensitive heart and conscience are thus brought into contact with many kinds of pathetic suffering, and cannot resist the urgent appeal for help. Not only through the hospitals, but in many other ways the needs of the city must be met, and this sermon should help to quicken those whom it may reach to fresh earnestness in faithful and devoted service. OBITUARY.

THE REV. HENRY SOLLY.

The Rev. Henry Solly, "Minister of Religion and sometime Secretary of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union"—so runs the notice in the newspapers—passed away on Friday, Feb. 27, at the home of his son-in-law, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Childrey, near Wantage. Had he lived till November he would have completed his ninetieth year. Any notice of a career so long and so crowded with efforts for the public good must be very inadequate. Happily he was able to prepare and publish an ampler record in the two teeming volumes entitled These Eighty Years, which were issued in 1893. It is there that the reader must look for the details of a story which as foreshortened here inevitably misses the significance and attractiveness of a true life-picture.

He was born in London, and through his father and mother inherited the blood of famous Puritans, including the Hollis family, to which Harvard owes so much, and the Neals, celebrated in and celebrators of Puritan history. The Sollys themselves, he was fond of declaring, traced back their ancestry to Kentish yeomen far in the Middle Ages; their kith and kin are numerous among our congregations to-day. His father was a man who, in spite of a catastrophe in the "crisis" of 1837, worthily maintained the commercial traditions of the family, and to the rest of his many business engagements added the first chairmanship of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, which afterwards developed into the London and North-Western, and the chairmanship of the first company that sent steamships across the Atlantic.

Henry spent his early days in old London city, and in the neighbourhood of Walthamstow, where his grandfather with others had erected a meeting-house about 1730. The Rev. Eliezer Cogan, preacher at this meeting house, and of high reputation as a Greek scholar, was his first schoolmaster; and his elder brothers were schoolmates with Benjamin Disraeli at Mr. Cogan's school. Later he studied at another school well known among Unitarians—Dr. Morell's, at Hove, Brighton. In 1829 he entered the new "University of London," i.e., University College, Gower-street, and continued his classical and mathematical studies with considerable success. His father's intention, however, was to make a business-man of him, and, to his intense disappointment, he had, on leaving college, to enter "the counting-house" in a leading shipbroker's establishment. For some years the struggle between natural inclination and obedience to parental purposes went on. He worked assiduously at the business by day, and got all the culture he could by night; fretted at his destiny, wrote tragedy, broke down in health, fell in love, and, above all, became (he says) ever more "conscious of intolerable disorder all around me, and an overpowering desire to right all the wrongs in the universe." For a brief period he was engaged in a private scientific laboratory, which might have proved a gold-mine, but did not. Then he was tried as a banker in sundry branch establishments in the country round London, his mind all the while gravitating more steadily toward the life of ameliorative labour which was to bring blessings to many, and to himself something like fame.

It was in 1840 that, on the advice of the Rev. Robert Aspland, he determined, after a brief period of study with the Rev. Benjamin Mardon, of the General Baptist Academy, to take at least temporary charge of the Yeovil congregation. This led to his entering the regular ministry, and the following succession of pastorates fell to his share:—Yeovil (1840-42), Tavistock (1842-44), Shepton Mallet (1844-47), Cheltenham (1847-51), Carter-lane, London—now Unity, Islington—(1852-1857), Lancaster (1858-62).

Mr. Solly took a distinct line in theology, and to the last he had a mediating word to offer both to Trinitarians and Unitarians. He was a keen disputant, and did not take his ministerial responsibilities lightly. But it is evident that the chief motive power in all his work was love for the common people. This it was that led him while but new to the ministry at Yeovil to begin a long course of publications with a book on "What Christianity says to the Present Distress." He flung himself into all sorts of "dangerous" agitations, and soon had to quit his first pulpit in consequence. A freer air prevailed at Tavistock, and here he added to his enthusiasm for extension of the suffrage, another, equally obnoxious to many respectable people, and became an ardent teetotaller. One thing led to another. The question of what to do with reclaimed drunkards suggested efforts to provide recreative meeting places for decent workmen; his work as a London minister deepened the sense of their special need; and at Lancaster the necessity for the establishment of clubs was borne in irresistibly upon him.

The chief work of his life thus began. In 1862 he was appointed secretary of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union. How that society throve, adding to its ranks many of the leading reformers of that strenuous period, and how it developed in one direction after another, always receiving the zealous and even passionate service of its secretary, is a history well worthy of the nineteenth century. Mr. Solly's name became widely known and everywhere with respect, and genuine admiration was mingled with the gentle satire of sayings like Henry Fawcett's: "Here is Henry Solly, who thinks heaven will be composed of Working Men's Clubs." But we must leave that history, together with that of his efforts on behalf of Technical Education and other manifold labours, to be read in the volumes to which we have referred, and in which, along with much genial gossip, are many things valuable to the historian, and authentic glimpses of celebrities, including the Mills, Kingsley, De Morgan, Carlyle, Harriet Martineau, Macready, Lord Lyttelton, Forster, Gladstone, Bright, and a score or two of political and social leaders, including Joseph Chamberlain, who is pictured as a "clever and resolute young man."

Of Mr. Solly's many publications we must not attempt a complete list, but the mention of a few will give an idea of their variety. In addition to the Autobiography above named, there were the dramatic poems, "Gonzaga di Capponi," 1856, and "Herod the Great," 1896; the novels "Gerald and his Friend the Doctor," 1874, "Lady Stella and her Lover," "Charles Dayrell," and "James Woodford, Chartist," 1881, a book on "Working Men's Social Clubs and Educational Institutes," 1867, and of theological works, besides many sermons, an early volume on "The Development of Religious Life in England," "The Great Atonement," 1847, and "Unitarianism and Orthodoxy: a Few Last Words" (with Introduction by Dr. R. F. Horton), 1897.

In everything he undertook Mr. Solly was greatly in earnest. He was, if any man, tenax propositi, and he spared neither pains nor words to convince his antagonist. Yet there was a kindly humour as well as sincerity about him that secured the genuine homage of juniors often apt to be impatient of "old men eloquent." Retirement from official duties afforded scope for prolonged social activity, but as the burden of fourscore years settled upon him he inevitably withdrew more and more from scenes once familiar with his cheery face and vigorous speech. His wife, a sister of Richard and William Shaen, was called to her rest two years after the celebration of their golden wedding in 1891; and his closing years were spent in the quiet of the country in his daughter's household. There, first at Sydenham-in-Oxon and finally at Childrey he spent very peaceful days, happy in the companionship and tended by the loving care of children and grandchildren. Last summer all his grandchildren and great-grandchildren were gathered round him, and he was photographed in their midst. While living at Hampstead, in 1899, he had a very serious illness, but in the country home the quiet evening of his life was prolonged, until at last he fell asleep.

The funeral took place at Childrey on Wednesday, and was conducted by his grandson, the Rev. Joseph H. Wicksteed, the Rev. T. B. Aldred, curate of Childrey, in the rector's absence, accompanying the family to church. The funeral was private, but Mr. B. T. Hall, the secretary, and Mr. W. G. H. Stroud, assistant secretary, of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, attended, and a beautiful wreath of white flowers was sent from 300,000 members of the clubs, as a tribute to "their founder." His son, the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, his son-in-law, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, five of his grandchildren, Mr. Charles Wicksteed, of Kettering, and Miss Caroline Bishop, of Birmingham, were among those who gathered around the grave.

In family life more especially it seems to be difficult to maintain an exalted standard, and to preserve a holy and serious demeanour, unmoved by the daily petty changes around us, judging by the light of the Spirit and the Word of God, while we show the greatest love and sympathy with all the infirmities and troubles of others. It is so easy to talk, to write, to use good words, to frame beautiful sentences, to imagine lovely thoughts—so hard to come down from the high pinnacles of self-conceit and feel that we know nothing, and have practised little as yet of the meekness and love of Christ.—Maria Hare.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Many of you who read this column will have heard something about "Wireless Telegraphy." Messages have been sent between America and England without any connecting wire. And a game of chess lasting three hours has been played by passengers on two ships in the Atlantic, signalling to each other from ship to ship as they passed at a distance of many miles.

This wireless telegraphy, sending signals direct from transmitting to receiving instrument by some kind of electric waves or vibrations, is a very wonderful discovery. But I have an instrument, or pair of instruments, for transmitting messages to a distance and receiving them by means of waves or vibrations of air, which is much older than Signor Marconi's and much better.

It does not work at nearly so great a distance, but, except in that respect and the secrecy, it is far superior. It does not only signal lines and dots which can be spelt into written words. It sends the words themselves with all their variety of tone and expression, so as to make the air-waves or vibrations convey the feelings and thoughts of one mind to another. It takes some time and a good deal of practice to learn how to work it properly. But a little baby can send short simple messages, and a child two years old has a good command of it.

It does not often get much out of order, and will last a lifetime. But the receiving instrument is much more delicate than the transmitting, and very commonly grows dull after a number of years.

I cannot patent this contrivance and make a fortune. For one reason because it is in general use already. And almost every baby is presented with one, and very soon begins to amuse itself by practising upon it.

Now, of course, you see what this older and more wonderful form of wireless telegraphy is. It is speaking and hearing. The organ of the voice, a very simple and wonderful contrivance, is the transmitting instrument. And the ears, that is the inside ears—which are fitted up with thousands of little rods for catching the waves of air with which they are in tune, like Signor Marconi's poles—are the receiving instrument.

"Oh! is that all?" does anyone say?

Yes! and enough too. It is ever so much more wonderful than wireless telegraphy. If it had been invented by a deaf and dumb man living among a race of deaf and dumb men, so enabling them to speak and hear, they would all have thought it a marvellous thing, far better than any telegraph with or without wires. But because we are so accustomed to it we are ready to say, "Oh! is that all?"

We feel that it is wonderful to send a message across the ocean. But the really great wonder is that we can send a message across the room. If there could be a race of deaf and dumb men communicating with each other by signs, would they not wonder at people who could speak and hear? They would not be able to believe how easily and perfectly messages could be sent to a distance by speaking. Yet they would already have the wireless telegraphy of sight; by which we receive the waves or vibrations of light from distant stars, an immeasurably greater distance than across the Atlantic.

This is not to undervalue Signor Marconi's great discovery; but to use it for showing the far greater wonders of speaking and hearing and sight, which we are so used to that we seldom think of them, and very seldom thank God for them with any real feeling.

There are some children born deaf who are therefore dumb also, because they do not hear words to imitate them. But being able to see they can learn and communicate with other people by sight. They can be taught to read and write, and even, with difficulty, to speak.

But there was once a girl named Laura Bridgeman, who was born not only deaf but blind also. She could receive no messages from a distance. The world to her was dark and silent, though she did not know it. There were no sights or sounds to wake up her mind. She had only the sense of touch by which she could know that she was in a world at all. You may shut your eyes and close your ears with your fingers to help you to imagine what it would be like; but then you know about seeing and hearing all the time. She did not know. And nobody could tell her, for she could not hear. But she could feel her mother's arms around her, though she could not hear her voice or see her face. And through the sense of touch alone, by wonderful skill and patience, a way was found to her mind: and she was brought into connection with other people, and was taught many things. She recognised people years afterwards by the "feel" of their hands.

What must she have thought about seeing and hearing and speaking? And what ought we to think who know what they are in their wonder and use and beauty?

We are so much accustomed to them that we seldom think about the matter. Of course we can speak and hear and so send messages to a distance; almost everybody does. We are astonished when we first learn that anybody cannot hear. We cannot spend all our time wondering, so we have to drop out of thought the common everyday things. But those are, after all, the most wonderful. The sunlight is a greater wonder than the lightning flash.

And when any new discovery like wireless telegraphy sets us thinking, we ought also to give a thought to the greater but familiar marvels of God's doings by which we live, that call us to adoring gratitude, and trust in His goodness and wisdom.

On Tuesday evening the first of the present series of Mr. J. H. Leigh's Shakespearean Dramatic Readings was given at the Steinway Hall, the play being Richard III., with special music composed and rendered by Dr. Ernest Walker. The great interest and power of Mr. Leigh's dramatic readings are well known, and the new music added a special attraction to Tuesday evening. Henry V. is the next play to be read, on March 17, Julius Cæsar on March 24, and Othello (read on this occasion for the first time by Mr. Leigh) on April 7. Next Monday evening, March 9, Mr. Leigh is kindly giving a reading of Henry V. to the Social Institute at Blackfriars Mission, Stamford-street Chapel.

LONDON, MARCH 7, 1903.

THE LONDON RELIGIOUS CENSUS.

During the last three months many of our readers will have followed with interest the results of the census as they have been tabulated week by week in the Daily News, to whose enterprise we owe the attempt. It is now drawing to a close, and although the returns are not yet complete, and will doubtless be revised before reissue in separate form, still they are sufficiently advanced to invite comment.

The enumeration has been made at the doors of the various churches and chapels Sunday by Sunday. How far the attendance on the Sundays in question may be taken as typical, it is, of course, impossible to say. How far the number of persons so enumerated represents the Church membership of the metropolis we are doubtful. If the object of the census be, as we take it to be, to find out what proportion of the population is "religious"—in the ordinary acceptance of the term—we should have thought it a better method if each church had furnished a list of its bonâ fide members. In that case many would have been included who by illness and other causes were prevented from attending church, while many casual attendants, and visitors from the country would have been excluded. However, the Daily News has thought well, at great expense of time and labour, to employ the former method, and we have nothing but praise for the admirably thorough and painstaking spirit in which it has carried out its task.

The conditions, we also note, were good. The time of year was perhaps the best that could be chosen, a time when there are comparatively few visitors, while most Londoners are at home. The weather was on none of the Sundays such as to prohibit persons in ordinary health from going to church. All possible secrecy was preserved as to the borough or district visited, so that no opportunity was given for special efforts on the part of the denominations. In the very few cases when the rush at the doors was too great to admit of enumeration the utmost care was taken in estimating the sitting accommodation of the place.

And now what have we as the result of all this care and industry? The area over which the census has so far extended comprises a population of rather over two and a-half millions, and the returns of worshippers amount to a little over half-a-million. These figures, however, include morning and evening attendances, so that some reduction must be made for those attending twice in the day. The Daily News estimates this reduction at 35 per cent., and thus the number of worshippers is reduced to about one-seventh of the population canvassed. This is equivalent to saying that out of the whole population of Yorkshire only the people of Bradford attend church. Further, of those enumerated, about 150,000 are children, while the various mission halls, including the Salvation Army, furnish over 40,000 of the half-million, many of whom can hardly be regarded as steady church-goers. So that the one-seventh above quoted is subject to a still further reduction if the object of the census is to show the number of adult and regular church attendants.

The disproportion of the sexes is not so great as one would suppose from the impression received in most churches one enters. It varies considerably in the several boroughs, but speaking generally the sex proportion runs fairly parallel with that of the population in those boroughs.

From a denominational standpoint the returns undoubtedly afford a good deal of interest. Taking the *un*reduced figures we have a Protestant total of 459,113, as against a Roman Catholic total of 44,475. The former comprises 239,265 Anglican, 198,321 Nonconformist, and 21,527 rated as "various." Roman Catholics are at their best in Kensington, Westminster, Islington, and Southwark; Nonconformists at Stoke Newington, Islington, Southwark, and Poplar. At Battersea Anglicans and Nonconformists are equal, and almost equal at St. Pancras, Lambeth, and Hammersmith. While at Paddington and Westminster the Anglican numbers are more than double those of Nonconformists, at Hampstead nearly double, and at Kensington more than treble.

Those who consult the "Essex Hall Year Book" will find the number of Unitarian and Free Christian churches in and about London (including the Missions) to be thirty-one. Of these only eleven (in eight boroughs) come under the present census, so far as it has gone. The great districts of Poplar, Fulham, Hammersmith, Westminster, Paddington, and Battersea are without Unitarian churches. Of the million and a-half to which the enumerated population is reduced, if we omit these areas, about 2,000 are found to attend Unitarian and kindred churches. Of these Islington (which includes Highgate as well as Unity Church) leads with 389; St. Pancras, which has Kentish Town and Rhyl-street, follows with 296, and Hampstead (Rosslyn Hill and Kilburn), Wandsworth, and Stoke Newington are not far behind.

Many, however, will feel that the most interesting aspect of the census is in its bearing on the localities enumerated. The following is a list of such, with the church attendances in ratio to population :—

Ratio of	1 in 3·10.	Stoke Newington.
„	1 in 3·69.	Westminster.
„	1 in 4.	Hampstead.
„	1 in 4·07.	Kensington.
„	less than 1 in 4.	Wandsworth.
„	„ 1 in 4.	Islington.
„	„ 1 in 5.	Paddington.
„	„ 1 in 5.	Southwark.
„	„ 1 in 5.	Lambeth.
„	„ 1 in 5.	Poplar.
„	„ 1 in 5.	St. Pancras.
„	„ 1 in 6.	Battersea.
„	1 in 7·56.	Hammersmith.
„	1 in 8·16.	Fulham.

Much might be said on these local returns did space permit. The religious history of the districts, the amount of immigration from the country to which each has been subject of recent years, the educational status, conditions of labour, and so on must be carefully taken into account before we are afforded a clue to these figures. For example, it is interesting to note that the lowest ratio is returned by Fulham, a borough comprised entirely of the lower middle and working classes, and one that, municipally, is among the most progressive in London.

We draw no inferences from these facts. Indeed, we abstain from drawing inferences at all. Whether the extremely low ratio represents a decline we are unable to say, and were a decline proved we could not infer anything from it except on assumptions that would seem to involve a vicious circle. At the time when the result of a similar census in Liverpool was published, the Daily News pronounced it indicative of "a disastrous state of affairs." From the standpoint of the churches it undoubtedly was "disastrous," and apparently the result of the London census is equally so. But obviously no such verdict can be pronounced from a national standpoint until some relation, direct or indirect, is established between church attendance and national welfare.

At the same time, there is no reason why those whom these facts primarily affect—the religious bodies themselves—should not inquire how it is that with all their facilities for reaching the people the great mass of the people so conspicuously fails to respond. Nay, if there be any use in a census of this kind it is surely to provoke such a question. We should like to see the Churches candidly facing the facts thus brought to light. Every variety of religious effort has here in the metropolis free expression, and yet the most popular, the most highly organised, the most wealthy and influential elicits response from only 240,000 out of two and a-half millions. How is it? Is it because, as we are often told, our religious sense, as a people, is on the point of atrophy? Is it because, as "Nunquam" has been telling us lately, "science is killing religion"? Is it because the grossness of practical materialism renders us indifferent to higher claims? Is it because men are profoundly discontented with the forms under which religion is presented to them? Is it because the "truths" the Churches iterate are no longer true? Is it because men are crying out for more of material justice and less of spiritual compensation? Does the pressure at which most of us live render us listless and dejected? Are the conditions of labour such as to oblige us to spend Sunday in the country or by the fireside or in some form of amusement? What do they generally do on Sunday? Do they excursionise, or do they loaf? Or is the emptiness of our churches due to their being out of touch with actual life, actual needs, actual hopes and fears? Are our services mechanical, and our preachers perfunctory?

These are some of the questions which those interested in the problem may reasonably ask themselves. If the truth were known, it would doubtless be seen that no one cause is responsible for this result, and as a last word we will express our conviction that the great need of the present time is not so much greater energy, as a more rational presentation of religious obligations, a more reasonable attempt to suit the public convenience, and a closer contact between religion and daily life.

TOLSTOY'S "RESURRECTION" ON THE STAGE.

To many admirers of Tolstoy the announcement that a dramatic version of his novel "Resurrection" was to be produced on the stage must have brought eager anticipation. If its terrible pictures of suffering and wrong, of the Nemesis of brutal selfishness and passion, and in the midst of this its story of the awakening of a nobler spirit in two lives, sunk in different ways in a common degradation, their resurrection from the death of sin to a better hope and the liberty and peace of self-renunciation—if these, with all the powerful appeal of worthy dramatic presentation, could be forced upon the attention of the public and driven home to search the conscience and unmask false conventions and rouse to purer aspiration and endeavour, that surely would be a great achievement, to be ranked among the best forces making for the uplifting of our common life. For this there were two expectations to be fulfilled: the play must grasp and enforce the true lesson of the novel, and the actors must furnish a worthy presentation of it.

Resurrection has been produced by Mr. Beerbohm Tree at His Majesty's Theatre, with all the lavish care and beautiful completeness in the staging of the piece for which his management is distinguished, and of the acting one can only speak with the warmest admiration; but that it is Tolstoy's "Resurrection" that one witnesses is not so clear. The story which has been dramatised is, of course, taken from the great Russian novelist, but with considerable license of reconstruction; several characters are quite different from those in the novel, and a certain amount of romantic sentiment is introduced into the chief action of the piece, which is not to be found in the ugly facts of the story.

The central idea is, however, preserved. The man of high social position, a young Russian prince, led by passion and the cruel selfishness of his class, ruins a young girl's life, and then discovers ten years later in the criminal court, where he is serving on the jury, how his conduct has borne horrible fruit, and stands convicted of the shame which he must now share with the miserable, degraded woman, whom he once knew in her simple, happy girlhood. When she is sentenced to Siberia for a crime, of which she is innocent, he is driven by self-contempt and bitter remorse to a determined effort of reparation. He will at least do all that is possible to mitigate her hard lot. Prompted not by love, but by remorse and pity, he makes himself known to her, quietly bears the invective of her just scorn and indignation, and declares his determination to secure her release, and in spite of the ghastly record of those ten years, to make her his wife. The woman's resurrection from the depths of degradation in which she had been sunk is completed when she at last acknowledges her honest love for him, and refuses for his sake what he has offered.

The four acts of the play present a succession of six scenes, the first three showing the origin of the tragedy, the man's agony of remorse and the judgment of society, the last three the convict's prison, where the woman's regeneration begins, and the halting-place in Siberia, amid the deep snow of winter, where the action is completed. The contrasts are very striking, and if the last scene is not the dramatic climax of the play, that is due to the somewhat weak ending of the novel itself. It is not dramatic, but rather didactic, though in a true and noble sense, and leaves the two chief characters parting to enter separately upon a problematic future, yet with the great lesson of self-renunciation learnt at last. In the novel there is much in the story of the woman's awakening to a better life, her contact with the political prisoners, the discipline of service among the suffering prisoners on their painful march, which in the play is not fully represented; and the close, in spite of the striking effects of the Siberian winter scene, loses much of the force which can be felt in a quiet reading of the story.

As a matter of fact the drama is two-fold, and in a sense separately worked out: that of the man's life belongs chiefly to the first three scenes, and there, at any rate, reaches its climax in dramatic intensity. In the later scenes Prince Nehludof is a comparatively colourless person, and the interest is transferred to the woman Katusha. His presence is still required, but the real interest is centred in her struggle out of gross darkness into the light of a purer, better life. This division of interest and shifting of the emphasis is due, perhaps, to a radical defect in the fundamental conception of the story. The passion of the man's remorse cannot really be brought into close contact with the lot of the woman he has wronged. He must, indeed, be ready to make sacrifice to the uttermost, having realised what he has done; but part of the bitterness of his punishment lies in the fact that to that one woman he cannot make any real reparation, the wrong is irretrievable. But the terror of such a result must lead him henceforth to devote his life to the service of others, in utter self-forgetfulness, defending the weak and oppressed, wherever he has opportunity throwing his whole strength on to the side of righteousness and against every form of wrong.

On the other hand, for the woman in such a plight as that to which she has been brought, his helpful service must be from a distance; the truest ministers to her re-awakening life must be other women, pure and noble-minded, in close companionship with whom all the best happiness now possible to her must be found. For her also the separate life of unselfish, loving service of others is the only true way. We are inclined, therefore, to say that in the closing scene, where Katusha is refusing what the prince has offered, her word to him, "You will marry and have children," strikes a false note, and the conception of what she is giving up brings an element of unreality into the action which accounts for the comparative failure of the drama as a whole.

At the same time there is much that is very powerfully presented in the play, and we only wish that it could have been more entirely worthy of the high gifts of the actors, and the great resource which has been so lavishly expended on its production.

Mr. Tree in the earlier scenes gives a powerful representation of Prince Nehludof, and especially in the jury scene, where the comedy of the other men throws out his intense excitement and the passion of his remorse into the greater relief. In this there is a searching appeal which, except with the most callous, cannot fail to go home. And in the next scene, that of an evening party in the aristocratic drawing-room, there is a touching episode, which is peculiar to the play. The character of the lady to whom Nehludof is engaged, and from whom he is now obliged to part, simply casts a side-light on the tragedy. In the novel the prince has no such connection with a generous and beautiful soul, he is merely half entangled with an unlovely society woman; but in the play, that of which he now knows himself to be unworthy, is embodied in this white-robed girl, contrasted with the rest of the people in that drawing-room, full of quick sympathies, and realising without a complete confession from Nehludof enough of what he means to understand that he is being taken away from her, and that it is right that it should be so.

In Tolstoy's novel there are many aspects of life touched upon, and many social and moral problems dealt with, which do not come within the range of the drama; but his indignation at the prison system of his country, its cruel wrong to many and its hardening effect upon those concerned in it, are represented in the prison scenes, which add something more than sensational touches to the drama. It was perhaps inevitable that for the stage a glamour of romance should be cast over the first scene, but those who turn from the theatre to the book will learn more from the painful reality there depicted. For the rest, we are grateful to Mr. Tree for the courage which has produced Resurrection, and for the opportunity thus afforded, not only for the enjoyment of vivid dramatic scenes, but for the earnest consideration of the great questions of life, with which the drama in its measure, and Tolstoy's novel in a yet greater degree, are concerned.

NATIVE LABOUR IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Sir,—Your correspondent Mr. Thomasson puts several questions in his letter on this subject which should be answered. He asks whether the white man in Natal sets the native an example of work; according to my observation he undoubtedly does; the colony would not progress in the rapid way it is doing if this were not so. His next question is founded on the assumption that the white man in Natal is an idler; not being able to follow him in such assumption, it does not lie with me to reply to it. Passing on to the relative number of whites and blacks he asks how it is that the white population is so small; there is a very manifest reason; the climate of Natal precludes the white man from competing with the black as an ordinary outdoor labourer on anything like equal terms. The black can work throughout the day in the fierce South African sun without distress, the white man cannot. The black can save money rapidly on a wage on which the white man can barely support himself, much less a wife and family. Only skilled white labour is really marketable in most parts of South Africa; but it should be remarked that the more black labour there is available, the greater field there is for skilled white labour. Indian coolies can compete with black labour, and therefore go to Natal in considerable numbers; they are admittedly not a desirable element.

Mr. Thomasson's last question relates to the franchise; in putting his question in the way he does he has to ignore entirely the existing position in South Africa; it is of a debating character and not practical; a distinction must be drawn between the white man and the black man. The white man's position in Natal and the other northern colonies would be impossible if the black man was allowed to become master. Our Government would under no circumstances have asked the late Government of the Transvaal to grant the suffrage to the coloured races, whether African or Asiatic. There is no analogy between the interference suggested by Mr. Thomasson in Natal and the steps taken by our Government to obtain the suffrage for the Uitlander in the Transvaal before the war.

What is going on at the present time in the United States in relation to the black question is an object-lesson which should be pondered over by those who think it possible to treat the black man as the equal in all respects of the white man. If granting the franchise to the black man in the States has been a mistake, and this is practically admitted by Mr. Root, the Secretary of State, what is it likely to prove in countries where the coloured population is roughly at least five times in excess of the white population?

Your correspondent Mr. Arnold Lupton bases his letter on the assumption that I advocate, to use his words, "native Africans being compelled to work for the white men." This is not a fair interpretation of my letter. I justified State measures to induce black labour to come forward; forced labour, whether in the interests of private employers or the State, is another matter; this, as I stated in my former letter, is not in question. The State may, I contend, fairly say to the black man, you are enjoying under our Government all the advantages of a settled condition of life and you must, if you remain in the country, contribute to the common good; you must, to put it shortly, work or pay. There are numbers of blacks living in idleness entirely on the work of their numerous wives or slaves. The latter word best describes their condition. These idle blacks form a dangerous element in the population and should not be encouraged. If a tax, even a heavy one, could eliminate this feature of South African life, it would be a very distinct advantage all round.

March 2. B. Dowson.

Sir,—There is one point in Mr. Dowson's letter on the South African labour question which appears to be specially suitable for consideration in the columns of The Inquirer as a journal of "Liberal Religious Thought and Life." The Zulus, he says, are never engaged for work in the mines because "for reasons connected with their religion" they object to working underground. This is quite right and proper so far as it goes; but it does not afford a very hopeful prospect for Christianity in South Africa, for surely the wise Zulu will cleave to his native gods whose superstitious terrors at least secure him this indirect protection, and will eschew the god of the Christians who apparently has no objection to his worshippers being "compelled to take their part in the development and progress of the country," and flogged if they slacken in the good work and become restive and insubordinate after entering into the compulsory contract. In this the children of darkness will be wiser in their generation than the children of light.

Moreover the religious difficulty will still meet us in another form even if we succeed in converting the whole of South Africa to Christianity. For though the Christian religion does not interfere with any honest and useful work that a man may desire to do, it seems to some of us to interfere very seriously with our compelling others to work underground against their will, either by direct methods of slavery, or by indirect methods of taxation, imprisonment and flogging. It is "for reasons connected with our religion" that we object altogether to the proposed legislation. Are our religious scruples entirely unworthy of consideration?

We also object to the proposed legislation for reasons connected with Political Economy. The problems which the study of Political Economy should help us to solve depend not merely on the so-called law of supply and demand, and the relations of capital and land and labour, production and consumption. They are affected by many things; but they ought not to be seriously affected by the colour of men's skins. It does not, therefore, seem to be profiting by the advances that have been made in economic science to employ means for securing and regulating labour in South Africa which would be universally condemned at home.

We also object for reasons connected with humanity and commonsense. Is it not a little unreasonable and inhuman, while recognising the feelings of the man who has a superstitious fear of evil spirits underground, to refuse to recognise the feelings of the man who has no such foolish fears, but desires nevertheless to remain at home with his wives and children, and cattle and fields of maize, and to live his own life in freedom and ease, rather than go and dig for gold, and help to enrich a foreign tribe of invaders?

We also object for reasons connected with the experience of past history and the future prospects of the English-speaking peoples. If the native races of South Africa develop a civilisation of their own, or if in fair rivalry of energy and activity we gradually supplant them by superiority of character, civilisation and religion, and the absorption of those who are capable of a superior life, there will in either case be a well-established civilisation there that may last as long as our own has lasted, and is to last at home. But if we merely endeavour to develop the resources of the country in the way that suits our own temporary requirements by despotic means, we shall fail, as in their various ways other great Powers have failed; as Rome failed to establish a permanent civilisation in Britain, and Assyria and Egypt and Rome all failed in turn in Palestine, as Spain failed to develop the religious life of Holland, as we have hitherto failed to develop the political life of Ireland, and as Turkey has failed in Greece, and is failing in Armenia and Macedonia.

A tax not upon property but upon individuals—the old poll-tax—is bad in principle even as a method of raising revenue. So hateful has the name become that no advocate of the tax would dare to use it. It is made ten-fold worse, more dangerous in the bitter resentment it arouses, when it is imposed in order that it may be burdensome, and so effect an ulterior purpose of compulsion. The proposal is dangerous to the peace and security of the Empire. It may raise up men like Wat Tyler. And future generations may find among the heroes of African history the man who slew the tax-gatherer, and the man who died in the English prison, or even under the English lash, rather than work upon compulsion of foreigners. This will not tend to produce a good friendly feeling between the races. It will tend to the occasional outrage on the one hand, and the brutal retaliation on the other hand, which are the aftermath of slavery in America.

Following Mr. Thomasson's example, I will venture to conclude with a few questions. Is the proposed taxation in order to compel men to dig for gold that they do not want, good Christianity? Is it good political economy? Is it good humanity and commonsense? Is it good imperialism?

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—With regard to Mr. Armstrong's letter of last week may I say that, in consultation with the president, it has been arranged that a copy of the report of the Committee containing the general nature of the proposals to be brought forward at the business meeting will at once be posted to the secretaries of all churches? The more precise terms of the resolutions to be moved from the chair, together with the report itself, will hereafter be distributed to all the members in accordance with Rule 15.

Will you also allow me to take this opportunity of stating that the respective railway companies have agreed to issue return tickets at the price of a single fare and a quarter, available from April 20 to 25 inclusive, to all who may attend, subject to the surrender of certificates which I shall be glad to freely supply? During the Conference a similar concession will operate in favour of temporary residents and others desiring to travel to and from places not more than fifty miles distant.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Orr's criticism on the recent report of this Fund in last Saturday's INQUIRER, it may be well to say that our information as to the Irish funds was derived from a leading minister in the North of Ireland, and is, no doubt, substantially correct. The additional information given by Mr. Orr is very valuable, but only confirms our view that Ireland has considerable local funds for the benefit of Presbyterianism.

A. W. WORTHINGTON,
FRANK PRESTON, } Hon. Secs.

March 3.

THE storm aroused by the Dean of Ripon's address on the Virgin Birth continues to rage. The correspondence columns of the Church papers are filled with letters affirming or denying the validity of the evidence for that miracle, and discussing the right course to be taken by a clergyman who ceases to believe it. The subject also came up in the Lower House of Convocation for the Province of York, where a gravamen moved by Canon Lister was unanimously adopted as an articulus cleri. This resolution calls on the bishops to "make it manifest to all Christian people that this sacred synod or Convocation holds fast to the primitive faith of the undivided Church in our Lord's Virgin Birth," and declares that no man who thinks otherwise should be allowed to minister in the Church of England.

THE Dean of Ripon himself, whose speech was nebulous, voted triumphantly with his brethren in favour of the gravamen. So did Canon MacColl, who spoke with the utmost clearness. Reason, he argued, must not presume to question the mysteries of faith. And he went on to quote, with approval, Professor Henry Sidgwick's "Ethics of Conformity," to the effect that "for a teacher, who by his office was bound to declare his belief in the Creed, and who had been led to reject that part of its contents, the proper course was to withdraw." He denounced Contentio Veritatis, with all its works, and confounded the authors of that book by citing "the illustrious names of Newton, Leibnitz, Faraday, the two Herschels, Clerk-Maxwell, Pasteur," and Sir George Stokes as believers in the Virgin Birth of Jesus. Towards the close of his speech he put the whole Broad Church question in a nutshell. "Their accredited teachers were to express their belief in what they privately disbelieved, and even publicly repudiated, if public opinion was ripe for it. Was it possible to imagine anything more demoralising to clergy and laity alike?"

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

AMONG the various matters which affect the welfare of churches, one of prime importance has been brought prominently forward, and received the practical consideration it demanded. Mainly through the energy and unwearying effort of Professor Estlin Carpenter "the Ministers' Pension Fund" has been established. It will prove an unspeakable boon to many of our ministers, and relieve them of a great deal of anxiety concerning the future. The "Fund" pays half of the premium of every insuring minister, so that the minister himself has to provide out of his often very limited income the other half. In many cases this can only be done by curtailing expenditure, which is a difficult problem. To help to solve this problem a "Supplementary Fund" has been established for the benefit of the ministers of our Provincial Assembly. The good old book tells us that "the liberal deviseth liberal things," and the treasurer of the Assembly, Mr. John Harrison, in the generosity of his heart, not only originated the scheme, but in a very substantial manner made it practicable. His appeal to a few personal friends brought forth a very gratifying response, so that a sufficient amount has already been raised to meet the demands for at least the next ten years, and there is no doubt that this fund will become one of the permanent institutions in connection with the Assembly. From the fund ministers in receipt of not more than £200 per annum can receive the benefit of a quarter of their premium, leaving only the other quarter for them to supply. Of course when a minister removes from the province his interest in the fund will cease, but it is hoped that the other Assemblies and Associations throughout the country will be induced to establish a similar fund, and thus lighten the burden which presses heavily upon some.

What is now needed is an Augmentation Fund, so that every minister should receive a minimum stipend of £200 per annum. This is a matter which not only touches the personal comfort of the minister, but very materially affects the supply of suitable candidates for the ministry itself. I am not quite sure that Unitarians are as liberal in their generosity as they are in their theology. There are, I know, splendid exceptions of which we may be justly proud. But you have only to examine the subscription lists of our various societies, and you will see how small is the proportion of contributors from the various churches; and if you analyse the financial statements of individual churches you will find that the contributions of many toward their own church organisations are not what they ought to be. There is plenty of room for improvement in this direction, in the smaller churches of the province as well as in the more influential. If the ministry is to be of such a character that it will commend itself especially to intelligent and thoughtful people, it must not have to bear the strain of financial embarassments. Knowing something of my brethren in the ministry, I can fearlessly assert that there is no class of men more prepared to make pecuniary self-sacrifice, if they know that God is giving His approval to their ministry; but there is no reason whatever why the sacrifice should be all on one side. When churches become vacant, their requirements very often are out of all proportion to what they feel to be their own obligations.

Another question which requires careful consideration is the settlement of ministers in churches that are vacant. In the province there are two churches without ministers, and two more will become so in the course of a few weeks. What method have we of bringing churches and ministers together? The question seems almost ironical, because it is notorious that we have no method, understanding by that word system, order, regularity. What happens when a church is vacant? Everyone knows, our secretaries painfully. From all quarters come letters of recommendation to the authorities; some from brethren of popular reputation, and these usually produce the deepest impression. Others from personal friends of the desiring candidate, written from pure commiseration and at his request. I have also seen communications from ministers who have sent pen and ink sketches of their own inestimable virtues, and a printed sermon, and scraps of eulogy from local newspapers. These latter cases, I rejoice to know, are both rare and unsuccessful. But the point is this: From these recommendations a candidate often has to be selected. What can come of such a haphazard system? What can we expect? That the right man will get to the right place? By some kind providence he may. But the Church Committee, with that bewildering and increasing batch of letters before them, need strong faith in order to believe it. I am simply raising the question that some method may be proposed to obviate and remove the evils. It would, I am sure, be a great relief to those churches seeking a minister if something could be done by which their need, and the supply of their need, could be more effectually met.

It is necessary also to put the secretaries of churches in the province on their guard against inviting men to occupy their pulpits without first making some inquiry about them. They may be good men and true, but it is most undesirable to make the way into our pulpits too easy for those who are not identified with any of our churches, or who have no particular qualifications for the work of ministering. We may glory in the freedom of our churches from all dogmatic limitations, but it would be wise and prudent to see that certain intellectual and spiritual gifts are possessed, as well as the gift of speech, before a man should be permitted to occupy the position of a teacher among us.

I should like also in this letter to refer to the subject of attendance at public worship. The religious census which has been taken of attendance at our London churches may be regarded as fairly representative of the churches throughout the country. It reveals a condition of things which is anything but satisfactory in relation to the religious life of the community. I desire to express my own strong conviction that a general observance of the Sabbath as a day for direct fellowship with God lies at the very root of vital godliness. I believe that a regular attendance at Divine worship is in these days, more than ever in the history of the world, a necessary means of strengthening the spiritual life. The one day which ought to be set apart, not only for physical rest, but for spiritual edification, is devoted largely, if not exclusively, to pleasure and recreation. The lax ideas which some Unitarians have of religious observances have seriously weakened our religious influence. Our churches are not as a rule overcrowded, and the absence of avowed Unitarians from our public services tends to diminish the magnetic power of numbers. Individual Unitarians may not feel the necessity of such services, but they owe something to their family and others in the way of example and visible testimony to their uplifting and strengthening influence on the life and character.

Circumstances often arise which make it difficult for some to attend the church of their choice. In the present age the tendency of the population is to get away from the great centres of business life and activity to where the air is purer and brighter. Constantly our friends are moving away from their old religious homes, and because they find no Unitarian church where they have taken up their abode they either join some orthodox community, or drift into a condition of indifferentism to public worship. This latter condition is most to be deplored.

An opportunity will be afforded to any who are living in the district of Redhill of attending some special Sunday evening services in the Market Hall, commencing at 7 o'clock on the 15th inst., when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie will deliver the address. It has been felt that as Redhill and Reigate contain a population of about 26,000, and are not two miles part, there may be an opening there for the deliverance of our message to those who are seeking a rational religion. It will be an experiment in faith, but we are sanguine enough to believe that good results may follow. T. E. M. EDWARDS.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE forty-third annual meeting of the above Union was held on Saturday, Feb. 21, at Macclesfield. The service was held in the afternoon in King Edward-street Chapel, a quaint old place of great historical interest, where the well-known commentator, Matthew Henry, once preached. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who took for his text, "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself." The sermon is printed in full in the March number of Mr. Hopps's Coming Day.

Immediately after the service the annual business meeting was held, the Rev. W. G. CADMAN, minister of the chapel, presiding.

The annual report stated that the Union's big bazaar to raise £,5000 was postponed to October, 1904, and that largely through the cessation of an annual anonymous donation of £40, there was a deficit in the accounts of about £150. The committee appealed for four generous friends to be kind enough to become annual subscribers of £10 each, in order to prevent the painful necessity of having to further reduce the grants to the aided churches; and at the meeting the retiring president came to the Union's help by promising a generous donation of £10. The missionaries' reports showed that the congregation at Ashton is still full of vigorous life, and doing exceedingly well for so young a church; that the Denton congregation has given evidence of healthy life and activity, and completed the six houses from which an endowment is to be derived, but that unfortunately the minister, the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A., is about to resign; that the Mottram Church is full of hope on the settlement of its new minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith; that the Macclesfield Church is reviving under the recently settled minister, Rev. W. G. Cadman; and that the church at Congleton continues about the same as usual, and still suffers from the loss of members by removal to other towns in search of work. The balance-sheet showed that the annual subscriptions amounted to £72 18s., and congregational collections to £82 2s. 4d., about the same as in the previous year.

Since the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (East Cheshire's esteemed "Bishop"), resigned the presidency last year (after ten years of office), on the ground that he thought it would be for the interest of the Union that the office should circulate, the rule has been adopted that a new president shall be elected each year. Mr. R.T Heys, of Stockport, succeeded the Rev. H. E. Dowson, and at Macclesfield the Rev. W. Harrison, of Stalybridge, was unanimously appointed his successor. Mr. W. Hudson, of Hyde, was re-elected hon. treasurer, the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, was re-elected hon. secretary, and Mr. M. C. Rogers, of Hyde, was re-elected hon. auditor. A vote of thanks was passed to the officers and to the preacher.

After tea a public meeting was held in the Town Hall, Mr. W. B. BROCKLEHURST, J.P., in the chair.

The first speaker was the newly-elected President, the Rev. W. HARRISON, who, after having humorously acknowledged the honour which had been thrust upon him, spoke of the progress which Unitarian thought was making, and said that we as Unitarians were supposed to get hold of those who went nowhere, and many who belonged to us were no doubt in that category.

Mr. J. HALL BROOKS, of Gee Cross, spoke of the need for spreading Unitarian thought, and also touched upon the education question.

Mr. R. ROBINSON, of Swinton, attended as the representative from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and spoke of the desirability of Unitarians being actively engaged, not only in disseminating their distinctive faith, but also in all the great movements of the day for bettering the conditions of mankind.

The Rev. H. BODELL SMITH, recently settled at Mottram, spoke of the need for acting upon the great truth of the Brotherhood of Man; and the Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE, of Stockport, reminded the members of the churches of the great bazaar to be held in October, 1904, begged all of them to throw themselves heartily into the work, and quoted "ten reasons why we should have a bazaar."

A vote of thanks to the chairman, the Macclesfield congregation, the speakers, and the Town Hall authorities, brought the meeting to a close. The weather was about as inclement as it could be, raining and blowing hard most of the time. Considering the weather, and the distance of Macclesfield, the attendance was very fair, there being about 160 at the service, 150 to the tea, and 170 at the evening meeting.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

ON Thursday, Feb. 26, the extension of the building, presented by the President, Mr. Walter Holland, was formally opened. In celebration of the event Mr. and Mrs. Holland gave an At Home on the premises in the evening, the invitation being accepted by some 300 of the subscribers and friends. Mr. and Miss Holland received the guests on arrival, and after a little light refreshment the new addition to the building was inspected. This consists of four class-rooms, one of which is entirely distinct, but the other three can, by means of folding doors or screens, be thrown into one large room, which it is proposed to utilise as a girls' gymnasium. It is also intended to give courses of cooking lessons, provision for which has been made at one end of the room. The new addition is beautifully finished off and is lighted with electric light, which has also recently been installed in the old part of the building. The cost of the new building has been about £1,500, apart from the price of the land.

After an organ recital by Mr. Claud Kershaw and other items of music by the choir of the mission in the chapel, a meeting was held in the large hall upstairs, Mr. Holland taking the chair. At the outset the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones presented to Mr. Holland a beautiful illuminated address and a portrait of himself from the teachers and workers as a token of their high regard and gratitude for his many acts of kindness during his twenty-one years of treasurership, and for the gift of the new building.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the gifts, said that whatever he had done had brought its own reward in the pleasure he had derived in the doing. With regard to the new building he mentioned that Mr. Charles Jones had shared equally with him the cost of the land. He said the great object of the new rooms was to provide adequate accommodation for the Sunday-school, which had now more than 700 members, with an average attendance of fully 500.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG moved:—

That this meeting, in reiterating its unabated adhesion to the principles upon which the work of the mission has been carried on for sixty-seven years, calls on its many supporters and friends to provide the necessary support and active assistance, whereby the larger opportunities now provided may be utilised to the full.

Mr. Armstrong appealed to the young men to show the same spirit and power and devotion and scorn for self-indulgence which had been evident in their fathers.

Mr. CHARLES JONES, in seconding the motion, dwelt on the great importance of the Sunday-school.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP supported the resolution and appealed for more workers to utilise the great opportunities. The resolution was carried.

Councillor ROBERT D. HOLT moved :—

That this meeting tenders its hearty and sincere thanks to Mr. Walter Holland for his generous gift of the new building opened to-day and also for his long and devoted services to the institution.

Councillor HERBERT R. RATHBONE seconded, and remarked that he looked upon the Mission as a means of bringing together the rich and the poor.

The resolution was carried with acclamation, and Mr. HOLLAND acknowledged the same in a few feeling words.

Among those present were the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. J. Jupp, H. D. Roberts and T. Lloyd Jones, Mr. Joseph Anderton, Messrs. Robert D. Holt, C. W. Jones, J.P., H. R. Rathbone, Joseph Wilson, Mrs. George Holt, Miss Holt, Miss Florence Melly, Miss Bowring, Mr. and Mrs. Tom Cook, Mrs. R. C. Hall, Messrs. R. W. Manning, Fred Cook, F. Bowring, F. Heyn and Harold Coventry (hon. sec.).

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The sixth annual sermons were preached last Sunday, when the services were conducted by the Revs. W. C. Hall, H. Enfield Dowson, and J. Collins Odgers. Collections, with donations, realised £15.

Banbridge.—By the death of Mr. David McWilliam, which came suddenly in the early hours of the 23rd ult., the Banbridge congregation and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster have lost a valued member. Of the former he was secretary and also trustee, and of the latter a member of the Finance Committee and trustee of the funds. He was also a trustee (and acted as secretary) of the Dunbar Fund for Weak Congregations. At the comparatively early age of fifty-six years, Mr. McWilliam passed away after having lived a busy life, three years of which were spent in Germany just after he had served his apprenticeship. When he returned home he joined his brother James in carrying on a bleaching concern at the Brewery, Banbridge, and when his brother died in 1880 he conducted the business alone till it was discontinued in 1883. Subsequently he was appointed manager of Mr. Uprichard's bleach-green at Laurencetown, a few miles from Banbridge, which post he filled with great acceptance till his death. The funeral, which was very largely attended, took place on the 25th ult, the Revs. A. B. Hamilton and J. A. Kelly officiating. On Sunday, in the First Presbyterian Church, Banbridge, the Rev. A. B. Hamilton made special reference to the loss the congregation had sustained, and bore warm testimony to the worth of Mr. McWilliam's character and the value of his services.

Birmingham: Church of the Messiah —The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Wednesday week, Mr. Percy W. Crosskey in the chair. Among those present were the Right Hon. W. Kenrick, Alderman Beale, Dr. J. H. Poynting, Dr. Priestley Smith, Dr. J. W. Russell, Mr. Herbert New, Councillor J. S. Nettlefold, Mr. L. O. Matthews (treasurer), Mr. E. Taylor and Mr. W. Byng Kenrick (wardens), and many others. Alderman Beale, in proposing a vote of thanks to the Rev. L. P. Jacks for his services, spoke in appreciative terms of the excellent work Mr. Jacks had done during the period of his ministry in the Church of the Messiah, and of the keen regret which the members felt in having to part with him at the end of next September, owing to his appointment as Professor of Religious Philosophy at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Jacks, in replying, said he regretted the trouble and upset which his leaving would cause. His ministry in the church was a record of peace and of friendship, the quality of which would in no way suffer by his leaving. It gave him much pleasure to reflect upon that. He should do the congregation an injustice if he permitted himself to believe that his leaving would be a fatal blow. They had given him an excellent character, and he would promise to speak well of them to his successor, for if the church was not one of the largest in the world it was one of the best. His acceptance of the appointment at Oxford was not the gratification of a longing for academic society. He was not moving along the line of self-interest, but for the furtherance of certain wide questions which he felt convinced could be best dealt with in a centre like Oxford, where he would still be near enough to visit the church from time to time. Mr. James D. Skirrow was elected junior warden. The meeting, which was very well attended, was followed by a conversazione in the upper schoolroom.

Birmingham: Old Meeting.—At a meeting of the congregation held on Wednesday, Feb 24, it was resolved to give the Rev. Joseph Wood six months' leave of absence. Mr. Wood has now been thirty-seven years in the ministry, nineteen of which have been spent at the Old Meeting Church. It is thought and hoped that a prolonged rest may have the effect of restoring Mr. Wood to perfect health, and of sending him back to his labours with renewed hope and vigour.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Monday evening, Feb. 23, Mr. A. T. Crook presiding. Mr. A. Pilling was appointed secretary, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Mr. J. Percy Taylor for his services as secretary for the past six years. The question of the appointment of an assistant minister to succeed the Rev. E. S. Hicks, on the completion of his term of service, was also considered. The annual report shows a list of 421 seatholders at Bank-street and 119 members of Halliwell-road Free Church. Reckoning Unity Church as well, the total membership in our Bolton churches is over 700. During the year Bank street has lost thirty-two members and gained thirty-nine. During the last seven years there has been a net increase of 125 members at Bank-street, and the congregation at Halliwell-road has been established in addition.

Bootle.—A Sale of Work on March 25 and 26 is to be opened by the Mayor, and it is hoped that the remaining debt on the caretaker's cottage, which in two years has been reduced from £200 to £60, will by this means be cleared off. On Sunday, March 15, Ensign Searle, of the Salvation Army, is to give a short address after evening service on "The Social Work of the Army."

Cheltenham.—On Wednesday week the Rev. T. B. Broadrick gave his lecture on "A Visit to Hungary and the Transylvanian Unitarians" in the Bayshill School, having also lectured at Gloucester on the previous evening, as reported in our issue of last week.

Derby (Resignation).—The Rev. John Birks has resigned the pulpit of Friargate Chapel, and proposes to retire from the charge of the congregation in June next, when he will have completed a pastorate there of twenty years. He will then be open to engagements as minister-at-large or pulpit supply, and looks forward to being still able to render services to his old congregation.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The fourth meeting of the session was held at Mansford-street on Saturday, the 28th ult. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards read a paper on "How to Secure an Improved Tone and Method in our Sunday School Teaching," in which some very helpful suggestions were made for carrying on the work of the Sunday-schools. A conference followed, in which the Rev. John Ellis, Messrs. W. J. Noel, A. Verstage, and others took part. The meeting was rather larger than usual, there being thirty-six present.

Horwich.—The Rev. G. H. St. Patrick Garrett, B.D., the vicar of Horwich, who some eighteen months ago came to the living from Prince's Park, Liverpool, recently made the following statement at a Sunday afternoon service for men :—"Unitarian and Christian are antagonistic terms. A Unitarian cannot be a Christian." These words were reported in the local papers and have called forth a large correspondence, which shows no signs of abating. Feeling in the town has been profoundly stirred. The vicar has disclaimed any intention of hurting anyone's feelings, but it cannot be said that he is coming well out of the matter. He apparently identifies a Christian as one who accepts the Nicene Creed. His latest confession is that he recognises that there are Unitarians who have caught something of the Master's spirit, who are living Christ-like lives, but who in the technical sense are not Christians. The Rev. R. C. Moore was announced to deal with the subject, "Are Unitarians Christians?" last Sunday evening. A great congregation assembled. The chapel was full, a large proportion of those present being men. For the first time in his experience during the sermon the preacher heard at one point a deep, undertoned "Hear, hear." The rapt attention and perfect stillness that prevailed were most marked.

London: Essex Church.—An interesting and helpful conference on "The Housing of the Working Classes" took place on Feb. 25, in connection with the Congregational Society. It was opened by Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., and led to an earnest debate, in which the following took part :—Miss Strack, Mr. F. Chesterton, Mr. Edgar Worthington, Mr. C. T. Mitchell, M.A., Mr. Osborne Smith, Mr. Herbert Cooke, and the chairman, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston.

London: Highgate (Stone-laying).—Two memorial stones for the extended school buildings of the Unitarian Christian Church were laid on Saturday afternoon by Lady Durning-Lawrence and Mr. F. Withall, Chairman of the Church Committee. A new hall, 20 ft. by 36 ft., is being built between the church and the present schoolroom, which is also to be extended by the addition of a new entrance, while in the rear of the new hall a classroom and a vestry are secured. New dormer windows are also added to the schoolroom. Not only the new hall, but, as was said with true feeling on Saturday, the whole of the buildings are to be regarded as a Robert Spears Memorial. The foundation of the church was due to his zeal, and the present extensions have been rendered necessary by the progress of the work which he initiated and had greatly at heart. The Free Public Library and public lectures have proved such a success as to leave little room for special church activities. Hence the need for the larger premises. The contract for the building (of which Mr. Arnold Tayler is the architect), Mr. Withall stated, was £1,000, other expenses would amount to £250, but they required another £250 to complete the scheme they had in mind. The congregation had promised £702, the Sunday-school £25, and the reading room had made a grant of £25. The Unitarian public had given £322, and it was announced that on that day Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence had promised an additional £105 if the whole scheme was carried out. A collection was made amounting to £16 12s. 10½d. That brought the total to £1,204, and they hoped to raise another hundred or two in the church itself; to friends outside they must therefore look for a little more help to complete the work. The proceedings began with a brief religious service in the church, conducted by the Rev. R. H. Greaves, after which some small members of the children's flower club presented bouquets to Lady Durning-Lawrence, Mrs. Spears, and Mrs. Greaves, and button holes to Sir Edwin, Mr. Greaves, and the chairman. The company then proceeded to the building site, where the two stones were duly laid, and a hymn was sung, and then a meeting was held in the church, at which Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence took the chair. Mr. Withall made a statement with the particulars above noted, Lady Durning-Lawrence expressed the pleasure it had given her to lay one of the stones, and the chairman recalled his long friendship with Mr. Spears, and bore affectionate tribute, as did other speakers, to the devotion and value of his work. The Rev. R. H. Greaves having spoken, and declared that before long they would want a further extension of their buildings, the Revs. H. Gow and W. Copeland Bowie offered their congratulations, and Mr. F. Tremain, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and Mr. H. G. Chancellor proposed and seconded a vote of thanks to Lady Durning-Lawrence and Mr. Withall for laying the stones. Tea was subsequently served in the schoolroom, and a very pleasant and encouraging meeting was brought to a close.

London: Lewisham.—A course of four lectures on "Religion and Evolution" is now being delivered in the Unitarian Church, High-street, on Wednesday evenings, by the Rev. Herbert V. Mills, of Kendal. The first lecture was delivered on Feb. 17, when there was an audience of 328 persons present. The second lecture attracted an audience of about 335, and there was a marked increase in the collections. Mr. Mills is also lecturing on similar topics at the Brotherhood Church in Islington.

London: Stepney.—The monthly Postal Mission Religious Conference took place at College Chapel last Sunday afternoon. Mr. Ginever introduced the subject, "The Future Life," stating in strong and earnest words the reasons for his belief in the immortality of the soul. The discussion was continued by Mr. Evans, Miss Florence Hill, Miss Read, and Mr. Seeley. The question of future rewards and punishments was also touched on Free Saturday evening concerts and Sunday afternoon (P.S.A. gatherings) have now been started at College Chapel. Mr. John Howell (formerly one of the organising secretaries in connection with the Canning Town settlement) is giving valuable help. The new plans promise well for Stepney.

London: Stratford.—On Monday, Feb. 23, a special Temperance Demonstration was held in the schoolroom, under the joint auspices of the National Unitarian Temperance Association and the Stratford Unitarian Church Temperance Guild. The chair was taken by Mr. William Crow, J.P., late

Mayor of West Ham, and addresses were given by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, T. E. M. Edwards, W. H. Rose, Mr. A. H. Biggs, Mr. A. W. Harris, and others. On the following Wednesday evening the annual meeting of the congregation was held. Refreshments were provided from seven o'clock, and at eight o'clock the chair was taken by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., supported by the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards, J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., W. H. Rose, H. Woods Perris, F. Allen, J. Toye, and others. The secretary, Mr. W. J. Noel, read the committee's report for the past year, which stated that the church had been open nearly thirty-four years. During the last thirteen it had had no settled minister but for ten years had been under the care of the minister-at-large of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly—the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards—whose services had been invaluable in helping to keep the church alive. The report gave particulars of the faithful work carried on by the church and its allied institutions. The statement of the treasurer of the church showed a deficit, which it was hoped would be reduced by a Sale of Work to be held in May, to which contributions were invited. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, stated that our Unitarian Church stood to teach character and good conduct rather than doctrine. Some forms of doctrine might tend to cramp the soul and destroy the character, but our endeavour was to build up character. We should aim at perfection, and keep right on in the cause of right. We have to be, and only by being can we be true followers of Jesus Christ. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed expressed his interest in the work at Stratford as an instance of self-help in church life. To live a religious life was not easy, it costs time, strength, energy, thought, money; but to live an irreligious life costs man his very life itself. The Rev. F. Allen also spoke, and the committee and officers were elected. On the following Sunday anniversary sermons were preached in the morning by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, and in the evening by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed.

London : Wandsworth.—"Our Church's Coming of Age" was the title of an illustrated booklet distributed on Thursday evening, Feb. 26, to the congregation and many friends who assembled to celebrate the event. With pictures of the church and portraits of some of the church workers, the booklet told of the first service held in Wandsworth, on Sunday, Feb. 26, 1882, conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, in the first temporary premises, of the zeal of Mr. David Martineau, Mr. S. S. Tayler and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie in the initiation of the work, of the appointment of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, then a student at Manchester New College, as the first minister, taking up the work in the summer of 1883, of the opening of the present church in October, 1885, when the Rev. J. P. Hopps was the preacher, and of the subsequent quiet but steady growth of the congregation and its beneficent institutions. The church was completely filled on Thursday week, when a commemorative service was conducted by Mr. Tarrant, and Mr. Carpenter was again the preacher, as at the first service twenty-one years ago. Psalm cxxii. 1 was the text, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord," and the sermon was full of the inspiration of gladness in the great fellowship of spiritual worshippers, of thanksgiving for the helpful ministry of that particular church through all its years, with many sacred memories, and of earnest resolve for completer service in the future, both as witness to Divine truth and as ministering to all human needs. "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength," "stedfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord"—Such was the spirit of the exhortation. At the conclusion of the service Mr. H. B. Lawford, secretary of the congregation, and Miss Lawford, received the company for tea in the schoolroom, after which a meeting was held in the church, Mr. A. W. Biggs, chairman of the congregation, presiding. The chairman offered a cordial welcome to all the friends who had come to join in their celebrations, and the subsequent speakers were Mr. David Martineau, representing the L.D.U.S., and Mr. J. F. Schwann (chairman 1881-1901), who laid the two foundation-stones of the church in 1885, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the B. and F.U.A., Mr. John Harrison, representing the Provincial Assembly, Mr. E. Capleton and Mr. C. Fenton, two former secretaries, Mr. Lawford, the present secretary, Mr. Hugh James, the treasurer, Mr. R. R. W. Oram, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The speeches were full of happy memories of the past, warm congratulations, and good hope for the future. Mr. David Martineau presented a letter of congratulation from his society. Among the original helpers in the movement present, besides the above-named, were Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. B. Lewis, and Miss Humphreys, who played the harmonium at the first service. Other London ministers present were the Revs. J. Harwood, T. E. M. Edwards, F. W. Stanley, S. Farrington, F. Allen, J. H. Wicksteed, and V. D. Davis. Mr. Carpenter was unable to stay for the evening meeting, and letters of regret for absence and of congratulation were received from Mr. F. Nettlefold, the Rev. T. L. Marshall, Mr. F. Maddison, and others. On the following evening a party was held for the young people, and greatly enjoyed, and on Sunday the services were conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, in further celebration of the anniversary.

Nottingham.—A meeting of the High Pavement Historical Society was held in the schoolroom on Thursday evening, Feb. 19, when the Rev. Frank K. Freeston, of Kensington, delivered a very interesting and instructive lecture on "Old Cheshire Chapels, their History and Ministry." The chair was occupied by the President (Mr. J. C. Warren), and there was a very good attendance. Mr. Freeston traced the development of the old and historic chapels of Cheshire from the seventeenth century, when the Act of Uniformity was passed, and a number of ministers who refused to conform to its provisions established places of worship, some of which existed to this day. Out of nineteen of their chapels in the country, thirteen owed their origin directly or indirectly to ministers who were ejected from the Church. Not only the oldest but the most interesting of these was the Knutsford Chapel, which was known all over the world by its association with Mrs. Gaskell's novel, "Ruth." This place of worship was established in 1689, and had a most interesting history. Some of the greatest figures in the movement had appeared in its pulpit, and one of its ministers, the Rev. John Turner, distinguished himself during the Jacobite rebellion by laying aside the spiritual sword and taking up a more material weapon. He armed a number of men of his congregation, and himself captured a messenger conveying important despatches to the Jacobite forces, a service for which he was thanked in front of the Hanoverian forces. Macclesfield Old Chapel, which was associated with Henry Newcome and Dr. Eaton; Matthew Henry's Chapel, which held a record of three ministers in 111 years; Dean-row Chapel, Hale, Nantwich, Dukinfield, Stockport, and Gee Cross were all dealt with, the lecture being illustrated with a number of very fine lantern slides. On the motion of the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, seconded by Miss Guilford, a very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Freeston.

Poole.—In connection with the "Guild of the Good Shepherd," an entertainment was held in the Hill-street schoolroom on Wednesday, Feb. 25, the programme consisting of a large number of tableaux, interspersed with vocal and instrumental music and recitations. This week Mr. C. E. Sykes, of Bournemouth, lectured, with lantern illustrations, on "The Sun, Planets, and the Satellites."

Rotherham.—The annual meeting of the Church of Our Father was held on Monday, Feb. 23, Mr. Andrew Thomson in the chair. The minutes of the committee and of the Fisher's Bequest Trustees and Fellowship Fund, together with report and balance-sheets, were duly passed, and the officers and committee appointed. The Rev. W. Stephens and Mrs. W. H. Shephard will represent the congregation at the triennial conference to be held in Liverpool.

Scarborough.—An address on "The Housing Question" was delivered at the Liberal Club by the Rev. O. Binns on Monday, March 2. The address, after depicting the horrors of overcrowding in both town and country, and the grave moral and national issues involved, suggested some methods of tackling this gigantic evil, though progress would necessarily be slow. The lecture was well received by the audience, and fully reported in the Evening News.

Stockport.—On Sunday last the Rev. B. C. Constable commenced a series of six Sunday evening discourses on "Why are we Unitarians?" the first being introductory, giving a short historical account of Unitarianism, and stating the great principle of free inquiry which characterises it. A much larger congregation than usual was present. On Monday Mr. Constable gave a lecture in the schoolroom, under the auspices of the Mutual Improvement Society, on "Extinct Monsters," illustrated by some eighty or ninety limelight views.

Whitchurch : Salop.—On Wednesday evening, Feb. 25, a very interesting lantern lecture (preceded by a children's lantern exhibition) was given in the schoolroom of the Church of the Saviour by the Rev. E. A. Malley, of Nantwich, upon "Newfoundland, England's Oldest Colony." The Rev. C. D. Badland presided. At the close a hearty vote of thanks was accorded the lecturer. The proceeds are for the redecoration of the schoolroom.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE annual meeting of the Midland Christian Union was held on Tuesday at the Old Meeting Church, in Birmingham, under the presidency of Mr. W. Byng Kenrick. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke was the special preacher, and at the Conference an important paper was read by the Rev. Joseph Wood. A full report we hope to publish next week. On Wednesday was the annual meeting of the North and East Lancashire Mission, and (to-day) Saturday, of the Manchester District Association. Then on Tuesday comes the annual meeting of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, and on Wednesday that of the Mansford-street Church and Mission. Our next week's issue will therefore be crammed full of reports of these important meetings, and we must warn our friends before hand that their own particular society can hardly obtain half the space for its report that they may naturally think its due.

THE report of the Committee to be presented to the National Conference of our Churches at the Liverpool meeting on April 23 has now been sent to the secretaries of congregations throughout the country. It contains passages forecasting the policy of the Committee to be proposed for the acceptance of the Conference, and these we shall publish in full next week, that they may be within reach of all, for full consideration.

THE British and Foreign Unitarian Association has issued a programme of new and enlarged Work at Home and Abroad, on a scale hitherto unprecedented in the history of our religious community. The occasion is the splendid offer by an anonymous friend of the President's of an annual subscription of £1,000 provided that a further additional income of £2,000 a year be secured. The programme is framed on these lines, and the Committee of the Association now appeal to their supporters for new and increased subscription to secure the annual income of £3,000. Appeal has so far been made only to a few tried friends of the Association, and already promises have been received amounting to over £1,500 a year. The remaining £500 remains to be up, and loyal contributions from all parts of the country will doubtless speedily fulfil the hope of our generous unknown friend. The programme of work demands the most careful consideration, and to this subject we shall return next week.

THE eighth National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches has been held at Brighton during the week, attended by some 1,200 delegates and 500 personal members. The proceedings opened on Tuesday morning with a sermon by Dr. Townsend, the retiring president, after which his successor, the Rev. James Travis, of the Methodist New Connexion, took the chair. Dr. Parker was to have been the president, and at a subsequent memorial service for him and the late Hugh Price Hughes, the address he had prepared during his last illness was read. The president's address was vigorous and defiant on the subject of National Education. The gist of his condemnation of the new Act is in the following passage :—

> This Act drives our children into schools in many of which the religious atmosphere and the religious teaching are utterly repugnant to our most cherished religious convictions. We shall be recreant to the rights and interests of our children, and will deserve to be branded as renegades and cowards if we surrender to the monstrous provisions of this Act. This Act is on the side of monopoly and privilege against popular representation, on the side of sectarianism against citizenship, on the side of the priest against the people, and we say, as Dr. Fairbairn said to the Premier, "We will not submit."

THE Council sermon was preached in the Dome on Tuesday evening by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and was on "The Prophet in Prayer." The living man speaking the living word, he said, was the great force in religion. Before the prophet the priest would disappear. The future depended on their faithfulness to that spiritual ideal of religious life. Wednesday morning was devoted in no spirit of compromise to the subject of National Education. The first resolution, expressing indignation at the new Act, was moved by Dr. Clifford and seconded by Dr. Robertson Nicoll. Further resolutions were moved by Mr. R. W. Perks, Mr. Lloyd George, Alderman Thomas Snape, and the Rev. J. Scott Lidgett. A resolution demanding Disestablishment was also passed.

THE March Seed Sower contains the address given by the Rev. Joseph Wood at the inauguration of the London Guilds Union at Essex Church, on "The Heroic Temper in Common Conditions," and also the Rev. H. Gow's address on "What Young People can do for the Church." Among other interesting matter is also an article by the Rev. H. S. Perris on "Martineau on Church Ideals." In the Unitarian World will be found an article by the Rev. A. Webster on "The Characteristics and Influence of Scottish Poetry," the Rev. W. C. Gannett's brief account of Emerson, the conclusion of Dr. Lyon's sketch of the Rev. Charles Chauncy, minister of the First Church in Boston, 1727 to 1787, and part of an anniversary sermon by the Rev. J. Reid on "Unitarianism in South Australia."

THE recent death of the Bishop of Southampton (Arthur Lyttelton) left the diocese of Winchester without a bishop or a dean, while the Archdeaconry of Winchester was also vacant. The bishop had been Vicar of Eccles, and before that, for eleven years, from its foundation in 1882, Master of Selwyn College, Cambridge. By his old pupils there he is spoken of in terms of reverence.

> Of all the men I have known (writes one of them) none has seemed to me more delicately beautiful. The true secret of his power over men was the fact that he was strict with himself, and absolutely genuine. If this was not seen, he was counted cold and aloof; if it was not seen, a man saw a strong man, but did not discern his strength. It was this, I am convinced, that beyond all other things secured the highest respect for him. His versatility, acuteness, gentleness, learning, and gracefulness in everything he touched, and his penetrating insight into human nature, all used to excite at different times my wonder; but it was his robust faith and his humility, and his strictness over himself, that, as years went on, made me reverence him. . . . It was the consciousness of this ἐγκράτεια—of the man himself as ἐγκρατευόμενος—that gave us our trust in him as a spiritual teacher.

MINISTERIAL RECOGNITION.—The Advisory Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Non-Subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties make the following announcement:—The Rev. John Henry Smith, of Upper Broughton, Melton Mowbray, who desires to enter the Ministry of this Province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness. Signed, W. Blake Odgers, Chairman of the Committee, James Harwood, Secretary, London, March 7, 1903.

BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH.

Sir,—I trust that you will not consider that I am unduly prolonging this correspondence if I venture to notice two or three points in Mr. Rawlings' last letter by way of "final words."

I am glad to read that Mr. Rawlings generously acknowledges the amount and the tone of the better parts of this book. I still am quite unable to understand how it is, in view of the introduction and general tenour of the work that Mr. Rawlings can suggest that it teaches selfishness, and I must say that in one respect at least Mr. Rawlings does Mr. Blatchford serious injustice. What does Mr. Rawlings mean by "subtle suggestions of another kind" in reference to page 14? The parallel which follows in Mr. Rawlings' letter deliberately infers that Mr. Blatchford suggested theft. I can only say that I cannot read any such meaning into page 14, and, if taken in conjunction with the rest of the book—for instance, with that emphatic passage I have already quoted—it is, I think, quite unwarranted. I repeat the quotation:—

I grudge no man his wealth nor his fortune. I want nothing that is his. I do not hate the rich, I pity the poor. It is of the women and children of the poor I think when I am agitating for Socialism, not of the coffers of the wealthy.

If this be teaching selfishness, let us pray for more of it. Mr. Rawlings warns someone—I do not know whether he means Mr. Blatchford, myself, or the world in general—against exciting "violent and subversive instincts." Speaking for myself (I have no occasion to defend anyone else), I sincerely trust that I have said or written nothing which could by any interpretation be strained into an excitement to violence. With regard to the other adjective, in view of the terrible evils which are all around us, which seem to be firmly embedded in the very framework of Society, I for one should look upon a charge of having "subversive" instincts, purposes, aspirations, as a tribute—I hope in some small sense deserved. There was a time when to "subvert," for instance, the tables of some money-grubber was esteemed an act worthy of grateful note and record, outshining far in the importance of its moral protest the chronicles of half a hundred empires. If the religious and social reformers of the coming day can succeed in "subverting" some of the hoary superstitions, the venerable impostures, the deep-seated evils, the privileged oppressions of the time, I venture to think that your respected correspondent will be one of the first to say "Well done!"

I think that I am right in taking Mr. Rawlings' main contention in his last letter to be this: that the question between the book and himself is one of "persons and what is due to them," and he thinks that my suggestion that the argument of the book had much better have been carried out on the economic lines of abstract terms, is "irrelevant and vain." It is true that landlord, capitalist, and labourer are quite as truly economic terms as land, capital and labour, but they are not so clearly defined, and are much more difficult to separate into their respective economic positions. Mr. Rawlings himself in attempting to define "some persons and what is due to them," calls them "worker capitalists." Are these people manual labourers using their own tools, or are they capitalists using their own brains—and is their remuneration to be described as wages or interest?

Many persons, it is clear, are "landlord-capitalist workers" or "worker-capitalist-landlords," whichever is the more important position. They receive their remuneration in three shapes—rent, interest, and wages. In discussing an economic question it is clear to my mind that we can discuss the respective shares in production due to the abstract terms much more clearly and with much less liability to misconception than if we speak all the time of persons who may represent all three, or, still more often, two of them.

Mr. Blatchford, in urging that landlords and capitalists, as such, produce nothing, but that workers produce all the wealth, is a case in point; for though he deliberately explains that he includes landlords and capitalists who work among the workers, Mr. Rawlings will not have it, and insists that the "worker capitalist" is a producer. Of course he is; no one said he was not, in the book or in this correspondence. He is a worker. He may be something else as well, but at least he is that.

I am quite aware that many speakers and writers on the Socialist side have represented and do represent this matter as one between clearly defined classes of individuals. I have not undertaken to defend this, indeed I deplore it, but I may be allowed to urge by way of extenuation that the error did not and does not commence with them. For upon what grounds do the working landlords and capitalists for the most part base their claim upon the lion's share in the production of the world? Upon their labour? Or, upon their position as owners of land and capital necessary to labour, and for the use of which they are enabled to secure alike their social position of superiority and their wealth? So plainly is this the case that many of these gentlemen who render invaluable service to the community by incessant and toilsome labour describe their labour as voluntary, and look upon it as given not to entitle them to a share in the production of the community, but as a free gift—as indeed it often is in motive—while their claim to their income is based on the amount which other workers are paying them for the use of "their" land and "their" capital.

What is it these workers who are at the same time landlords and capitalists fear—what is it prevents them taking their position clearly, bravely and correctly in the ranks of labour? Can they suppose for one moment that their administrative capacity, their grasp of affairs, their mental training and capacity are going to be in some mysterious way of no further use to the community if they were to do so? The idea is unthinkable. On the contrary, as the raw material of labour, if it may be so described, is set freer, so would their opportunities of usefulness, of benefit, along with those of their fellow-workers, increase and multiply.

As to the landlords and capitalists who are not workers (subject to fair compensation to existing ownership), why should they receive from the toil of the community any more than the wilfully unemployed at the other end of the social scale? Under such conditions it would not be a hard doctrine which declared that if a man will not work neither shall he eat. He would have to be taught the "dignity of labour." The phrase is fortunately becoming familiar. Far from teaching selfishness, this view of social economy seems to me to teach unselfishness. For, after all, what is labour for the benefit of the community, for the service of man, undertaken in the right spirit and with the true motive, but the very fruit and witness of our love and worship of the All-bountiful Father whose Will we conceive of as working eternally for the benefit of His creatures?

THE INTERNATIONAL MEETINGS AT AMSTERDAM.

Sir,—Will you allow me a little space to refer to the travelling facilities and arrangements to be made for intending visitors to Amsterdam in September next, although it is yet too early to put anything definite forward?

The most direct route from London is viâ Harwich and the Hook of Holland (about eleven hours), and if equally favourable terms can be obtained as are offered by the Flushing Company, this route will be the one recommended.

The journey viâ Queenborough and Flushing (day journey) occupies fourteen hours, of which six only are sea-passage. A cheap eight days' return ticket will be issued on Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays at, first-class, £1 17s. 1d.; second-class, £1 5s. 6d. Travellers leave London (Victoria or Viaduct) at 9.25 A.M., and arrive in Amsterdam at 11 o'clock the ame night.

A third route available for Scotland and Newcastle district is from the Tyne to Rotterdam, but attached to the time-table is an observation which must be taken into account by would-be travellers—namely, "if sufficient cargo offers." Time of transit, about twenty-four hours. Cost, first-class return to Rotterdam, £1 10s., and about 5s. more for the rail on to Amsterdam; food on board extra. Some allowance off will be obtained if a party of ten go.

A fourth route is viâ Hull, but here the times of departure are somewhat uncertain, and it is probable that so far as convenience and time of transit go, it will be better even for a Hull resident to go viâ London, or viâ March and Harwich.

I have roughly estimated the cost of the trip, travelling and four days' stay at an hotel, at £4. The board and lodging at a good hotel at Amsterdam is about 11s. 6d. a day, but at some of the smaller hotels bed and breakfast may be obtained for 3s. 6d., and other meals may be taken at a restaurant.

As regards excursions for visitors who desire to extend their journey, as I am at present advised, it will be best to obtain a circular ticket when in Amsterdam. Our friends there will no doubt have made some arrangements in respect to this. I will, however, here put down one such circular tour from London, which, of course, will include Amsterdam: London, Flushing, Arnheim, Utrecht, Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leyden, Hague, Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Flushing, London. Cost, 1st class, £3 5s. 1d.; 2nd class, £2 6s. 4d.

Some fifty names have been sent in to me of possible visitors; to these and to others who may later on apply, I will forward information as soon as arrangements are more complete. Ion Pritchard.

A FEW SKETCHES OF DOMESTIC AND SOCIAL INDIA.

We are, I believe, in an age when we are more easily understanding one another than our forefathers did. Yet we must not forget that we are only in the beginning of this age. The best of the Hindu melodies, I am afraid, fall flat on European ears. The articles of Eastern costume and furniture seem to Western eyes rather funny and at best "picturesque." As is the case with the ideas of beauty, so also with those of propriety. And this difference of opinion is not all on your side alone. The Envoy from Morocco who had been to London for the last Coronation was reported to have said at his departure, "England is a great country; but I am glad to be going back to civilisation." This African grandee seems, then, to have as independent views about civilisation as we think we have. All this shows that the world's æsthetics as well as ethics have not yet been quite freed from the trammels of conventionality and national bias.

My present humble attempt, therefore, is likely to appear to my countrymen a mere impertinence. And I would never have run this risk but for the fact that all the time I have been amongst you, I have never had the occasion to remember that I was a stranger amidst strangers. Being so amply guaranteed of your sympathy I feel no scruple myself, nor need I make any apology to my people for speaking to you about their inner life.

A Common Type.

India is often spoken of as a mere geographical name. I fear this is not quite correct. In the vast country, which is nearly half the size of Europe, you should not expect the same political unity and the outward uniformity of life which you are accustomed to see in England—I mean the "Little England," not the Imperial one. You should also consider the enormous sweep of the most eventful history the country has gone through. No people on the face of the earth, except perhaps the Chinese, are now living their part to the same extent as the Indians. It is also true that no country in the world has assimilated so many races and religions as India has done to-day. In a word, it is no exaggeration to say that India is a complete store by itself for the anthropologist. Yet all this diversity does not justify us in reducing the name to a mere geographical significance. Throughout the length and breadth of the continent a common type of domestic and social life may easily be detected. Four-fifths of the population are Hindus proper, Jains, Shiks, Lingayets and Buddhists. But the difference of the religious beliefs and modes of worship have little bearing on their daily life. They are all socially Hindus. Even the Mahommedans, who form the remaining one-fourth, far more conform to the habits of their fellow-countrymen than to those of their fellow-religionists abroad.

If I, therefore, describe a Hindu household, in an old provincial town, free from the direct influence of Western ideas, it will fairly represent any community in India except the Parsees.

The Household.

An ordinary Indian household is like a large tree, supported on the main stock of the father and mother and branching forth into several families of the sons and grandsons, but all held together in an organic whole. The grown-up sons and grandsons earn on their own account, but not necessarily break up from the system. In other words, the further growth of the family is like that of a banyan tree which sends fresh roots from its branches down into the ground, which latter form, in time, new stocks, thus adding to the strength and spreading the scope of a huge organism. Sometimes there are separations; but they are rather a matter of contingency than of course, as here. Thus you will come across in some old place a family consisting of forty or fifty inmates living peacefully together, a veritable colony if not a kingdom of God. If ill-feelings or awkward circumstances break the system, the broken parts yet prefer to live next door to one another, forming thus in some cases the main part of a street, and eventually giving their name to that street.

As in the State so in the household the form of government is monarchical. And the monarch wields his sway modified and sweetened by the gentle wishes of his better half. The autocrat, when too old, generally abdicates in favour of his eldest son; and the eldest brother is as good as the father—nay, even his wife receives the willing homage of the house, as a mother. Of course the old ideal is not always realised at present; but where it is not realised there remains at least the consciousness of the unrealised ideal, unless even this last vestige of ancient India is dissipated in the breathless haste after the Western civilisation.

The Daughter-in-law.

The one figure in a Hindu household around which centres the most pathetic interest is the incomparable daughter-in-law, the image of suffering and self-sacrifice, the soul of feminine Hinduism. It is the daughter-in-law who gives a Hindu household its pre-eminent character. Herself meek and the lowliest in the family, apparently the most neglected, at times even persecuted, she is slowly gathering strength and preparing herself as the future guardian angel of the domestic virtues. Married before she has hardly entered her teens, petted and caressed until then by fond parents; she is now all of a sudden cast amidst strangers. There she is to please all, from the youngest urchin upwards, and never to seek her own pleasure. She is to go to bed after all and leave it before all. She must not sit while others are standing. She should not take her seat unless asked. In presence of strangers she is not to speak even to any male members of the house. She is never to insult the father or the mother, or any elder, by being seen in company of her husband; nor would the young man dare be so rude as to address his wife openly. Such is the ordeal the future queen of a Hindu home must pass through.

The Marriage of a Daughter.

One great thing which is earnestly and in many cases very anxiously looked forward to in a Hindu household is the marriage of a young daughter. One of the most popular Marâthi dramas opens with a song and soliloquy of a restless father worrying himself as to how he would get a suitable match for his grown-up child. I mean the paradox: the grown-up daughter is hardly older than twelve years. And yet anxiety is burning the father, not to mention the mother, not only in the words of the song but in everyday fact. He is wondering how his daughter will acquit herself in her father-in-law's house, whether the sisters-in-law would torment her or be friends with her, and so on and so on.

At last fate chooses, or, rather, the designing go-betweens succeed in arranging the marriage. And what words can describe the festive joy which rules for nearly a fortnight in some cases! Hundreds gather from far and near around the young bashful couple, who are scarcely conscious of their own place in the great function. I will mention one little detail which illustrates a very great truth—namely, that a Hindu marriage is a sacrament in every sense of the term. Social contract or private comfort, in any of its refined aspects, has little to do with it. It is a religious sacrifice. The practical West would disbelieve this. But all the same there is the fact, which has defied centuries, nay, millenniums, of living history in India. The painful feature of it is that it is all so one-sided; and not so creditable on the part of the stern sex as on that of the fair.

The little detail I alluded to is this. At each one of the four corners of the little platform created for the purpose, on which the nuptial tie is going to be tied, there stands a blooming banana tree, bent under the burden of a full-grown bunch of bananas. Now this tree is an emblem of self-sacrifice and of all other female virtues. Given forth one abundance of sweet things, her life career is at an end. Every bit of her body she offers for use in the domestic economy. The bride, if she lift up her head at all, could not look on a better object than this prototype for her future career. Thus a playful child yesterday is a well-behaved wife to-day.

Hindu lady and married woman are convertible terms. A Hindu woman dying an old maid is an impossibility which even fiction cannot conceive of in India.

Birth of a Son.

Another event over which great joy is felt, or, at least, great fuss is made, is the birth of a child. The advent of a son causes as much delight as that of a daughter causes disappointment. One of the very common Sanskrit names for the word son is Putra, which means one who protects his ancestors from the hell called Pu. This belief very much strengthens among Indians the ordinary human desire of being perpetuated in male issue. The joy varies in geometrical proportion according to the amplitude of the inheritance to which the son is born. Once I visited a capital of a native State to the Raj of which an heir had been born. Among other festivities I saw a procession of horses and camels, headed by the huge State elephant. He bore on his back a large silver vessel, filled with powdered sugar. A cupful of that sugar was sent in every house in the street as the procession passed on. The procession continued for a fortnight.

Social Reform.

The last century has wholly changed the face of India. Religion, society, politics, and industry are, as it were, all thrown into a great crucible, and a phenomenal fermentation has ensued. Britain has gained the lasting honour of being the immediate cause of this impetus. But the present development has proved too great for any human agency, though it be Britain, mighty as she is. The whole genius of a great historical people is being slowly, or one may say rapidly, reconstructed. And this great fact is rightly interpreted by some religious minds, pre-eminently by that of Keshub Chunder Sen, as being no less than a providential order.

To speak of social India is at this juncture to speak of Social Reform. All public leaders and agitators, whether they may profess so or not, are virtually reformers. There is not one movement in the country which is not on new lines.

At first the British Government most enthusiastically helped the great pioneers such as Raja Ram Mohun Ray and Iwar Chundra Vidyasagar in abolishing the custom of Sati and legally sanctioning re-marriage of widows. But they soon became aware of their limitations, and now they have to be neutral in this respect. Although in such matters as the national education, which is the most efficient mode of reform, they and they alone can do a great deal, they are grievously shirking their responsibility on others.

Romance.

Social reform movement in India, as other great movements of the world, has had a very romantic period in the beginning. I quote in substance two of the four most typical life-sketches which Pandit Shivanath Shastri, the leader of the Brahma Somaja, has lately published:—

"In the year 1862 there was residing at Barisal, in Bengal, a young Brahmo pleader. His father having lost his first wife, the mother of this reformer, had contracted a second marriage, according to custom, with a girl of nine or ten. This girl he soon left an unfortunate widow under the care of her ardent Brahmo stepson. Though young and attractive she was debarred by strict religious and social decorum from everything that could render her life pleasant. Her miserable condition weighed heavily on the affectionate heart of her stepson, who, in consultation with his young wife, formed the design of getting the young stepmother married. An attachment sprang up between a trusted friend of theirs and the mother. But when the plan was nearly ready, the thing oozed out. The stepmother was promptly removed from the guardianship of the dangerous reformers and kept in close custody at Banarus. But the undaunted reformers knew no rest. Not only rescue but marriage was effected. Violent scenes followed. The reforming pleader was excommunicated. His clients deserted him. Many a country wag composed popular songs celebrating the inglorious distinction of the man as 'the mother's matchmaker.' The couple, however, subsequently became distinguished members of the Brahma Somaja."

Here is another story of a Kulin girl. It was in 1870 that a Kulin—i.e, high-caste, girl of about seventeen was residing with her grand-uncle, an old and influential Brahmin of the stern orthodox type. Her two young cousins were very enthusiastic Brahmos. From childhood they had helped her, during their vacation days, in reading and writing. But the old man now deeply resented the public profession of Brahmoism by these two youths, and stopped all communications of the poor girl with them. The next year he resolved to marry her forcibly to a man who had been already married to thirteen wives. This was the religious custom of Kulinism in Bengal—viz., giving several girls in marriage to a high-caste, pious Brahmin. The girl wrote to her cousins that she had actually resolved upon suicide if not rescued. A band of young students, headed by the elder cousin, promptly formed a rescuing party. It was the awful night of Sept. 5, 1871. The mighty river Padma was then swollen into gigantic proportions. The girl escaped with her cousin through a back door, and made towards the boat. The mad youths, with threats and entreaties, compelled the boatmen to launch. Before they reached Calcutta a warrant for arrest on the charge of kidnapping and abduction was obtained from the magistrate of Dacca. Eventually, however, the warrant was quashed. The girl was left under the protection of her Brahmo cousins, and was subsequently married to a highly respectable Brahmo. She is now the happy mother of a number of happy children.

Such is the romance of the early movement. It is now at full swing. Complete success, however, depends on the education of the masses.

The Caste System and the Anglo-Indians.

I think perhaps every old woman in this country amuses her grandchildren with stories about this ugly system. I should therefore only mention that there are about 300 well-marked castes, and about as many thousand sub-castes in India; and that these are the worst obstacles in the way of the national well-being of the people. The struggle of the reformer is extremely hard in this field.

There is one side of social India with which the English residents there are concerned. These people are never slow in condemning the caste-system. But how far is their own conduct consistent with their condemnation? No caste in India is at present so really observed and so rigidly guarded as that of Anglo-Indians. Brahmins and Shudras may not not interdine and intermarry. But they are otherwise, in many respects, at home with one another. Englishmen, on the other hand, are at present as much foreigners in the land as they were centuries before; nay, they seem to insist on being so in future. Lord Roberts always insisted that India was won by sword, and by sword it must be held. Lord Roberts is a military man, and nothing better can be expected of him. But an eminent professor of history in Oxford repeats the same dictum, and even surpasses Lord Roberts by adding, "to suppose that we can ever abandon India except in defeat and disgrace is to surrender ourselves wilfully to the wildest illusion." Is it then any wonder that Anglo-Indians have formed a rigid caste of their own in that unhappy land of castes?

I would gladly have passed over this unpleasant point had not grave issues been involved in it. The issues are not national. They are international. They concern humanity. In India, and India alone, the ancient and the modern worlds meet together. It is there that old religion and old philosophy, old aspirations and old character are still preserved in their purity and integrity. It is there that modern thought and modern life are slowly sending their roots in the deep and rocky foundations of the past. If at such a crisis, almost unique in history, the English in India do not rise above their narrow political and commercial consciousness, if they do not forget the little event of conquest in view of the vast providential phenomena now evolving there, if they persist in setting up their one-sided race-superiority over human harmony and human solidarity, and if, above all, they keep on talking, in their pride, of never abandoning India, "except in defeat and disgrace," they will be consciously and deliberately hindering that Divine experiment of which they themselves have been an unconscious instrument!

But perhaps one may ask, how are foreigners to mix in a nation divided against itself? I was reading the other day an account of the memorial of the late-lamented Rev. Fletcher Williams, the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in India. I asked myself why this memorial to him, and why it was so genuinely and unanimously celebrated by Brahmos and non-Brahmos of Calcutta. I answered, because he so successfully represented England in India. And the secret of the success was that he lived among the people, moved among them, mixed with them, was one with them. Cannot others, who may not profess Unitarianism in words, do the same unitarian deeds? A Fletcher Williams in the very heart of India is, to a Hindu, worth half-a dozen Lord Robertses fighting against the wild tribes on the border. Political India is only a phase in the history of the British Empire. Whereas social India, allied to and harmonised with social England, will be a phase in the history of the world.

THE DOUKHOBORS.*

The unexpected and strange developments which have of late taken place amongst the Russian Doukhobors in Canada have been so widely discussed in the Press of all countries, and are at the present moment perplexing so many people, that a short explanation of events, founded on reliable information received direct from the centre of the movement, will not, I feel, be amiss at the present juncture. I cannot, unfortunately, give a systematic and detailed account of all that has taken place, as my information is founded upon private letters from Doukhobor friends and others living amongst them; these letters, although numerous and communicative, having been written not for the purpose of giving consecutive

* The first part on a paper of occasional information "On the Developments amongst the Canadian Doukhobors during 1902," by Mr. Tchertkoff, dated November, 1902.

The past history of the Doukhobors is described in "Christian Martyrdom in Russia," by V. Tchertkoff. Price 1s. (The Free Age Press, Christchurch, Hants, and 13, Paternoster-row, London, E.C.)

These leaflets are distributed free of charge in order to spread information concerning the cause they represent. As, however, the series cannot be continued without the necessary funds, voluntary contributions for this purpose will be thankfully received.

information of the events, but rather as the expression of the particular feelings, thoughts and experiences of each individual writer.

A Minority only Concerned.

First of all I have to state that the movement in favour of the renouncement of the use of animals, which ultimately developed into the collective so-termed "pilgrimage," far from embracing the whole of the Doukhobor population has, as a matter of fact, embraced only about one-eighth of them; the remaining majority, not feeling called to follow these in their new aspirations, having quietly persevered in their usual life of industrious agriculturists.

Consistent Vegetarians.

As far as the first phase of the "progressive" or "idealistic" movement which has taken place amongst the minority is concerned—namely, the renouncement of the use of animals, very little need be said in explanation, if we take into consideration that the Doukhobors, in general, are earnest vegetarians, believing in goodwill and love not only between men but also on the part of men towards all living beings. When the information about this move reached England one had the satisfaction of meeting in the papers, amidst the ignorant and spiteful censure always accompanying every new step towards improvement, also a clear-headed and morally-enlightened defence of this action, writers from the most various quarters pointing to the fact that the breeding and employment of domestic animals, being unavoidably connected with getting rid of their superfluous accumulation, complete renouncement of the use of animals would naturally be the logical outcome of consistent vegetarianism, which cannot have recourse to killing or selling for slaughter the unnecessary animals. Indeed, this complete renunciation of animals has already been theoretically preached, though as yet hardly ever practically realised, by some of the most cultured vegetarians of civilised countries. Therefore the hue and cry which was raised by some against this new departure on the part of workingmen more sincere and direct than their sophisticated and weaker "civilised" fellow-vegetarians was as uncalled for as such prima facie opposition usually is; the more so that there has already existed for ages whole populations who have most satisfactorily cultivated the land by means of the spade without the aid of animals.

The "Pilgrimage."

The other event representing the latest development of the idealistic movement amongst a part of the Doukhobors was, as we know, their abandonment of their homesteads at a time when they were becoming quite prosperous, and their march across the country together with all the members of their families. This unexpected conduct not only elicited ironical and defamatory abuse from all those who represent the conventional view of things, but also grief and consternation in many sympathisers with and well-wishers of the Doukhobors. And, in truth, this action of a portion of the Doukhobors was so unexpected, extraordinary and, at first sight, inexplicable that it is impossible to form any idea of its fundamental meaning and source without being acquainted with certain peculiar circumstances in which the Doukhobors have found themselves since their settlement in Canada. These circumstances have unfortunately been entirely overlooked in the Press communications, as well as by those who have commented upon the event, the papers moreover having attributed entirely false motives to the Doukhobors, and otherwise greatly exaggerated and misrepresented the facts.

Mistaken Explanations.

Thus it has been generally stated that the Doukhobors, carried away by a "paroxysm of fanaticism" or "religious craze," and expecting the advent of the millennium, started to meet Jesus at his second coming. This, judging by the explanations which have reached us from the Doukhobors in question, appears to be completely false; and the misunderstanding is easily explained by the fact that this people have historically developed for themselves on spiritual matters forms of expression so symbolical that even Russians unfamiliar with this peculiarity of theirs, or bereft of the religious experience necessary for the understanding of spiritual strivings, are themselves often misled by the quaint terminology of the Doukhobors. No wonder then that local Canadian interpreters could not help making a muddle of the whole thing. Besides this, in cases when whole multitudes are propelled by a common impulse towards certain simultaneous action its real motives and significance are seldom with adequacy verbally formulated by any of the individual participators, those of them who are acting with greatest consciousness generally being the most reticent in their determination to act and not to talk; whereas the least intelligent, merely carried away by the instinct of imitation, being apt to talk most without really grasping the true significance of the movement they are mechanically participating in, and therefore sometimes explaining it in the most mistaken and incongruous way.

It has further been affirmed that the chief object of the march was that of propaganda. This also is probably in great measure a misunderstanding, the desire to preach and proselytise being, as a general rule, very foreign to the typical religious tendencies of this people.

Complex Motives.

As far as one can at present judge, by the direct and reliable information received, the true causes of this movement were very complex and at least of a threefold character.

On the one hand the Doukhobors, after their severe trials in Russia, having been amply accommodated in Canada with excellent land and all other conditions necessary for becoming prosperous, were indeed in the way of attaining that state of material welfare which represents the ultimate goal of most immigrants; and some of them felt that this prospect of becoming wealthy was precisely that temptation or snare which threatened with the greatest danger their further spiritual development. As in the Caucasus a general moral relaxation had accompanied the prosperity which they had there attained before the commencement of the last persecutions, so also here in Canada the more idealistic Doukhobors witnessed with pain and apprehension the fact that some of their brethren who had the most strenuously striven for material welfare had, in proportion as they succeeded, begun to degenerate spiritually and morally, sometimes even becoming rapacious and desirous of exploiting to the utmost their own brethren, and also ready to compromise in respect to certain Governmental demands which their stricter brethren regarded as against their conscience. Being anxious to avoid the alternative between this same fate and the ill-feeling an independent course of action would have been likely to call forth between the others and themselves, these spiritually more progressive Doukhobors thought it safer to "move on."

This desire was, it appears, increased by the hope of reaching countries with a milder climate where the land could be cultivated all the year round, and spade-gardening without the aid of animals more satisfactorily effectuated.

At the same time some difficulties in connection with the demands of the Canadian Government had arisen, the satisfactory solution of which appeared to these Doukhobors less possible as time went on and a certain amount of coercion was brought to bear upon them.

The Government's Consideration.

I must hasten to make the reservation that the Canadian Government, both as a whole and in the attitude of its separate representatives, has all through acted towards the Doukhobors as far as it was able with remarkable goodwill, leniency and consideration. I say "as far as it was able" because, when Governmental action is concerned, there is a limit further than which officials, even with the best of intentions, are unable to go—a limit determined by the definite demands of the established law. In despotic States this law can, it is true, be ignored by the autocratic caprice of the supreme ruler; but in a constitutional country such as the Dominion, even were the Government desirous of making certain concessions, forbidden by the law, it would previously have to get these exceptional measures sanctioned by Parliament. And in Parliament, as we all know, it is not the intrinsic merits of the case, but party politics which determine the issue and generally so handicap the few really progressive steps which governments are capable of contemplating, that those in office, feeling it hopeless to undertake the job, generally content themselves with merely passing those measures in regard to which public opinion is so strong that it cannot safely be resisted. Therefore, perfectly understanding the difficult position in which the Canadian Government officials are placed, one cannot in justice cast the slightest shade upon the action of the Canadian Government in this case.

The Scruple as to Private Property.

On the other hand the Doukhobors, in contradistinction to other immigrants who come in search of better economical conditions, were removed from their own country because they were there being exterminated for conscience sake; and they naturally brought with them this same indomitable conscience of theirs with its troublesome scruples, which, when once aroused, cannot be overcome otherwise than by persuasion. Therefore regarding it as wrong, or, as they term it, "contrary to the will of God," to accept land as the private property of separate individuals, and feeling they could only recognise it as communal, the more progressive Doukhobors were morally unable to sign the acceptance of the land as private individual property which the Government desired them to do in accordance with the usual regulations. The Government, encouraged by the fact that some of the Doukhobors did not experience these scruples, and submitted to the demand, warned the recalcitrant ones that should they not comply before a certain date the land due to them would be regarded as free and put at the disposal of other settlers. The progressive Doukhobors, naturally concluding that the Government did not desire their presence unless they submitted, which they could not conscientiously do, felt the most proper course was to withdraw of themselves before the Government was put to the necessity of compelling them to do so.

Manifest Sincerity.

These are some of the chief reasons of the unexpected attempt at an exodus on the part of a certain portion of the Doukhobors. There were also other motives and considerations of a minor importance, and in general this movement possesses many more features than it is possible to examine in a short space. I hope, however, that what has here been stated is sufficient to suggest a point of view quite different to the one from which public opinion, as yet unacquainted with the real gist of the matter, has hitherto criticised and condemned the straightforward action of a group of well-meaning and conscientious peasants.

LITERATURE.

"RELIGION FOR ALL MANKIND."*

Such is the title of Mr. Voysey's latest volume of sermons; the title-page adds, "based on facts which are never in dispute." Mr. Voysey has long been known as a preacher and writer of sermons remarkable for their clear lucid style, their candid and unveiled heterodoxy, and withal for their earnest expression of the author's constant and unchanging faith. This volume is a sort of re-casting of the matter contained in the volume called the "Mystery of Pain, Death and Sin." Those who read that volume will recognise some of its pages here. But this work is more complete; it deals with Pain, Death and Sin as parts of a greater whole; we have here practically a system of Theology in the form of twenty-six sermons.

It is evident, therefore, that although it is said to be based on facts never in dispute, it might quite as aptly be described as a set of sermons dealing with matters that are subject to everlasting dispute. Besides the three-fold mystery named above we find here an essay on Human Love, one on Human Liberty, on the Hope of Immortality, on the Reasonableness of Prayer. In the preface to the volume which this one replaces Mr. Voysey had said: "I do not pretend to have done more than throw out hints and suggestions as to where the solution of the problem lies." Manifestly that is all that this volume can do; all that can be done by preacher or philosopher. Moreover, what is said can rarely be new. It must suffice if it be well said.

In religion we could not do without sorrow. We learn only by the sorrow of failure, disappointment and loss how transient and even trifling are the concerns which belong only to this life and its pleasures. We begin to see and to feel that there must be an invisible spiritual sphere for which our souls were called into existence; that this earthly animal satisfaction is not our rest, nor the haven for which the human spirit was launched on the ocean of life, not the home where we can reach the fulness of joy. It is only sorrow which can teach us to look up, to look above the dust and rubbish of earthly possessions and pleasures to an "inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away."

In one respect this quotation from the sermon on the Religious Benefits of Sorrow may be considered favourable. It has just a suggestion of that persuasive note which is not Mr. Voysey's special characteristic. He is frank and fearless, sometimes as convincing as he is confident, not exactly persuasive. Sometimes he not only fails to persuade, he alienates and irritates where he ought to soothe. His own doctrine of the Love of God is essentially Christian. It is often expressed in the very words of the New Testament. But when he describes Christianity he might have in view not the teaching of the Gospels and the Epistles, but the explanation given by some uneducated revivalist preacher. For he says the whole Gospel is built on the doctrine of hell. (Let him ask Agar Beet if that is true.) He represents the Jews as receding in horror from Christianity because it proclaimed "a God who delighted in human sacrifice." "They were horrified to hear from the lips to Jews that God had appointed and had accepted a human sacrifice as the propitiation for sin." I have failed to find verification of this alleged ground of horror in the New Testament. I do not find that there is any such objection raised, or any answer given which supposes such an objection in any part of the New Testament.

That the Jews were horrified that one who had been put to death as a criminal should be proclaimed as the true Messiah, and the Saviour of men, that I can understand. I do not believe that in any sermon or epistle of Paul, or in any other writing of the New Testament, Christ's sacrifice of himself is set forth in such wise as would suggest to a Jew a revival of the horrible doctrine of human sacrifice referred to by Mr. Voysey. The unknown writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews deals more than any other with the subject of Christ's sacrifice. Where in him will you find that God's wrath was appeased by Christ's death? According to Hebrews Christ took away the sacrifices, and established the doing of the will of God. Christ's suffering was acceptable because he was made perfect thereby. To imagine that the Jews were horrified at the notion of human sacrifice is a curious inversion. The author of Hebrews dealing with prepossessions and prejudices already in the mind of the Jewish reader says much more about sacrifice and priesthood than his own religion would of itself have warranted; exactly as St. Paul dealing with analogous prepossessions only too effectually disguises the doctrine of free and unbought forgiveness as justification by faith. But the Christianity which Mr. Voysey describes is not that of Paul or of the writer of Hebrews, it is that of an evangelical who is a generation behind his time.

It remains to say that the book is very little the worse for an occasional unfair reference to Christianity or the New Testament. The general doctrine of these sermons is thoroughly Christian. One sometimes feels that the sincerity of the writer is a little too conscious. But it is a good book, worth buying, worth reading, worth keeping. J. R.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

Archdeacon Wilson contributes to this month's Contemporary an article on "The Influence of Scientific Training on the Reception of Religious Truth." The religion of the Evolutionist, he says, involves the doctrine of the universal Immanence of God, but holding this we are in danger of losing hold of any effectual thought of the Divine Personality and Fatherhood of God. Yet, "since love is the best in us, there must be love in God."

The loving Father must be there; though our poor undeveloped minds cannot simultaneously combine His loving fatherhood with His immanence, and with the uniform working of His laws of nature.

And the article concludes:—

No scientific training and no scientific results can ever obscure our inner conviction of the need of righteousness, and of the supremacy of the moral law; and if scientific training tends to enthrone this law as supreme in our lives, we may welcome it as a great educator of the mind of man for the reception of religious truth.

In the same number there is a long article by "Voces Catholicæ" on "The Abbé Loisy and the Catholic Reform Movement," giving an account of the Abbé's remarkable book "L'Evangile et l'Eglise." On the subject of South African labour Mr. E. Jerome Dyer pleads for the introduction of native labourers from India, as the best way of dealing with what is after all only a temporary industry, leaving the natives of the soil to the more permanent pursuits of agriculture.

In the Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Lyulph Stanley, in an article on "The New Education Authority for London," gives an account of the complicated practical questions which have to be dealt with, and while the accumulated experience of the members of the School Board is to be discarded, hopes that the able official staff may be able to help the new authority over the first trying years of their work. Mr. W. F. Lord writes very unsympathetically of the novels of the Brontë sisters. Sir Robert Anderson pursues his "Crusade Against Professional Criminals." There is also a curious article on "Reincarnation" by Nazayan Harischandra."

Dr. Alfred R. Wallace writes in the Fortnightly on "Man's Place in the Universe," adducing evidence to show that the number of the stars is not infinite, and that the place of the earth amid the stellar spaces seems after all to suggest a very definite and high purpose in his creation. Mr. W. B. Yeates writes on William Morris as "The Happiest of the Poets." Mr. Stephen Gwynn's article on "England and the Black Races" deals specially with West Africa, and quoting Mary Kingsley, pleads for justice in the interest of the merchants and the natives alike.

In the Monthly Review the chief illustrated article is on "The Excavation of a Levitical City—Gezer," which is one of the most ancient towns in Palestine. There is also an interesting account by Mr. Sidney Colvin of Keats's "Ode to the Nightingale," with a facsimile of the first draft of the poem under the title "Work in a Hampstead Garden." Mr. Andrew Lang writes on "Human Personality after Death," apropos of Mr. Frederick Myers's book, "Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death."

The World's Work tells, among other things, in illustrated articles, of the city of Glasgow, the day's work in a great London hotel, and "What we should all know about Morocco." There is a fine full-page portrait of Mr. Asquith, and also of Senator Hanna, of whom an interesting account is given. In sharp contrast are the two contiguous articles on "Track Athletics" and "A Night with the Unemployed."

THE Labour Co-partnership Association, which held its half-yearly meeting at Accrington last Saturday, has as its object to "substitute in the busy world of industry united concert for antagonistic conflict, thus making the ever-growing command over the powers of nature attained by man as conducive as they may be made to the well-being of the working masses." Profit-sharing, it is believed, makes the workers more efficient by giving them a feeling of interest in the success of the whole enterprise in which they are engaged, and is thus to the advantage of employers, capitalists and workmen. If, however, it is to be for the benefit of the working-classes as a whole, it is necessary that the trades-union rate of wages should be paid: otherwise the effect may be that a part of the workers sharing in profits may win over to the belief that lower wages are acceptable if only profits are thereby increased, and so the position of the labourer become less secure than before.

THE Co-partnership Conference at Accrington discussed municipal enterprise and labour, and a very important and interesting question was raised in view of the large and increasing number of men directly employed by municipalities. Mr. W. H. Dickinson, of the London County Council, said that the extension and success of municipal work in the future would depend largely on the attitude adopted by their employés, who would soon become a considerable power in the State. A position of aloofness from the municipalities employing them would result inevitably in the reduction of their status as citizens; but they might, and should, throw themselves into the public work, striving and labouring for the common welfare, as being themselves part of a really self-governing and self-administering community. Several speakers urged the advisability of introducing the co-operative principle into municipal work on lines similar to those adopted in Paris, where co-operative groups of workmen contract for certain kinds of work.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face."—Matt. vi., 17.

THIS is a rather easy verse to learn, and though at first sight it doesn't seem to have anything to do with us and our way of living, I should like you to learn it.

Some verses are very hard to learn, you know. The other day I was staying at a house where a boy was trying to learn a Scripture lesson. To help him, I said we would learn it together. The first two or three verses were easy. Then we came to a hard place. We both struggled with it, and whenever we tried to say it, some little bit of it would fall out, or twist round and come up in the wrong place, and if we got it almost right one minute, the next it was worse than ever. How hard we did try to master that passage! But the boy only got seven marks out of ten for it next day. And I—I wake mornings trying to say those verses right, but I never do. If you are anxious to know where they are you will find them in John vi. 22 and 23, in the authorised version; but it is not worth while for you to try to get them by heart. There is so much else in the Bible better worth learning.

But this has taken us a long way from our text: "Thou, when thou fastest, anoint thy head, and wash thy face." I daresay the last bit of this does sound familiar. "Wash thy face." That is still insisted on as a necessary duty, till, no doubt, everyone of you has grown tired of hearing it said over and over again half-a dozen times in the day. But you have all come to feel, through this continual drill, that a clean face is a matter of course for every self-respecting boy or girl.

But nobody tells you to fast or to anoint your head.

Fasting is going without food, and perhaps it seems strange that this should be thought a religious duty. I daresay you have been taught that you shouldn't eat too much, or that one shouldn't eat twice as much as usual because the dinner is nicer than usual, or that one shouldn't ask for a second helping if there is not enough to go round. All that is simple good manners, though when one thinks of it, good manners are a kind of religious duty too. But to go without food for a day at a time, to go without the food you are used to and take food much poorer and plainer, and less of it, on certain days or certain weeks as a religious duty is something you are not used to.

It is true that there are many Christians who do thus fast. It is part of their religion. But you are not taught it as part of your religion.

But once it was part of everyone's religion. Not only of the Christian religion, or of the Jewish religion, but of all religions. See how the text speaks of it as a matter of course. "Thou, when thou fastest." It is taken for granted that everybody fasts, as that everybody prays, or that everybody gives to the poor:—

Thou, when thou givest alms—
Thou, when thou prayest—
Thou, when thou fastest—

Now we all know how pleasant it is to eat when we are hungry. We all know how often we get hungry. And we can all imagine how hard it must be to be hungry and not eat. And because this desire for food is felt so strongly by everyone, and so over-strongly by many, it has always seemed that we couldn't begin training our will better than by taking this appetite for food, this enjoyment of food we all feel, and learning to govern it, learning to master it, instead of letting it master us. That is the meaning, or at least one meaning, of fasting. And because it was seen that people would be apt to put off this effort to control their appetite for food, and were just like children in this, special times and days and ways were appointed for fasting, so that it should be easier to remember and practise this duty.

The root idea of fasting then, of this going without food for a time as a discipline, as a way of learning self-control and the governing of our appetite, comes to stand, as we think about it, for any going without, which we practise for the sake of gaining this self-control. It stands for all giving up of anything pleasant, of anything we want to have or to enjoy; giving up sometimes that someone else may have it; sometimes because we think some better use might be made of the money or time we were going to spend on it. To abstain from anything we like, or might have, just because we feel we ought to—that is fasting. And I am sure that in this sense fasting comes in our way very often.

Well, what I want you to notice is what Jesus says to us about this fasting. When you do it, he says, "anoint your head and wash your face."

In old times, when people did a disagreeable duty (just as in our times), they were apt to make up for it by making sure that other people should know it, and admire or praise them for doing it. And, in Jesus's time, to neglect their dress and hair, to wear a very long face, was their way of letting others know they were fasting.

To Jesus all self-display was hateful. He knew that to display our virtues is the surest way to kill them. And he says (let us put it into plain everyday English): "When you have given up some pleasure for the sake of duty, or done something that was hard and disagreeable because you ought to, don't grumble about it; don't complain of how hard it is; don't console yourself by trying to get sympathy; don't let it come out so that you may be appreciated or praised for it; but put on a cheerful face and a pleasant smile, so that nobody shall know you have made any sacrifice. Hide your effort. Hide your struggle. Don't let others see or know what it has cost you, else you will spoil it."

We all know how it spoils a kindness or a sacrifice for us if anyone "makes a fuss" over it, or boasts of it. What Jesus adds to this is that it spoils it for himself. And it spoils it for God. "Ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven."

And the other thing he adds is that if you will only make your sacrifice pleasantly, cheerfully, instead of making it harder, this makes it easier. All at once a sense of joy and gladness comes into one's heart which turns the sacrifice into happiness. And this is what he means when he says: "Thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee."

LONDON, MARCH 14, 1903.

MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

The Jubilee of the Belfast Domestic Mission, the celebration of which is recorded in our present issue, brings a reminder such as is ever welcome, of the earnest spirit which in the second quarter of last century kindled in our churches a new perception of Christian duty towards the neglected poor of great cities and an ardent zeal in ministering to their pathetic needs. We reported last week the addition of new rooms, the gift of a generous friend, to the Liverpool Domestic Mission, in further extension of the splendid equipment of the buildings in Mill-street, which afford opportunities without equal in our religious connection, for such ministry among the poor. Next Tuesday the annual meeting of the Blackfriars Mission at Stamford-street Chapel is to be held, and on Wednesday evening the annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, which is the present representative of the first Domestic Mission in London, the first effort of its kind in this country. That takes us back to 1832, when the work of Joseph Tuckerman among the poor of the city of Boston had become known in this country, and his example of apostolic simplicity and overflowing love and pity for the neglected and degraded had made its searching appeal to the heart and conscience of our people. The response came not from London alone, but from Manchester and Liverpool, Birmingham and Bristol and other cities, where Domestic Missions were established, and fifty years ago Belfast also took up the work.

It is a happy sign of the vitality of faith and earnest devotion in our churches that they do not grow weary of well-doing in this matter, but are pressing forward into new fields of duty and aiming at better equipment and more effectual service of the poor. There is no surer test of the sincerity of faith in any Christian Church than this which Jesus himself established, in his declaration, "The poor have good tidings preached to them." It was to that end our Domestic Missions were established, and have still to be maintained.

Almost unawares through the rapid growth of city population and the changed conditions of life, more and more widely separating class from class, thoughtful and earnest people were brought face to face with a problem of appalling magnitude in the evil conditions of the life to which the poorest denizens of city slums were condemned. Thousands of the people in the midst of the great and wealthy city were crowded together in the most wretched quarters, left in squalor and neglect, a prey to every evil influence, many of them living in a practical heathenism of the grossest sort, while the Churches, wrapt up in their own interests, with enlightenment, wealth, and sincere piety, had failed to touch even the fringe of the evil. Then came the answer of faith, convicted of grievous blindness and neglect, but prompted by a genuine brotherly love, speaking first in a voice here and there, and in Tuckerman as a first inspiring example to his brethren, "One earnest man at least," so he said by word and deed, "in the Master's spirit, shall go amongst them as their friend, to help them in their sore needs by wise sympathy, by the message of Christian love and hope." And soon about that simple ministry of personal helpfulness many other agencies were gathered. The Mission-house became a welcome refuge, a beacon of light in a dark and desolate place; men and women long strangers to any such healing and inspiring influence came to the house of prayer, because their friend was there, and the children came to the school. Then other helpers came to strengthen the hands of the faithful minister, to do what they could for the instruction, the encouragement, the enjoyment of the people. New links of human sympathy and wise helpfulness were established between the poorest of the poor and those who brought to them in that most practical way good tidings of the better life.

That is still the ideal of our service among those who are in the sorest need. Above all and everywhere it must be simply the hand of a friend stretched out to help, the light of sympathy in honest eyes, and unaffected brotherly kindness, eager to share the best gifts of life with those who are in dire poverty of mind and heart and soul, no less urgent than the poverty of outward things. In the one true spirit there are many ways of effectual helpfulness, and there will be few indeed who are of willing heart and cannot find some simple way of sharing in the good work; but for such as a last resort, and indeed for all alike, whether there is any practical service they can render or not, there is the giving of means, without which the work cannot be maintained.

To this giving of themselves, out of the heart of their best life, the Churches are called, with no thought of self-interest, but simply as ministers of God's mercy, in the Master's spirit, bearers of good-tidings to the poor. The service is two-fold, ministering to the inward desolation and to the outward need. On this latter side there is no better training for the social reformer and the good citizen, than to come thus into direct personal contact with the life of the people at the points of sorest pressure, to realise in the lives of those who have become friends indeed, what the temptations and the burdens are, what are the causes of this appalling waste of human life, this degradation of manhood and womanhood. Then with knowledge of the facts and an overmastering impulse of brotherly love a faithful man will know in which direction he must work, ready to spend and be spent, for the Kingdom of God's sake.

When we say that the Churches are called to this work, that means, of course, that the people, who themselves are the Churches, are called. It is a matter of individual duty, for each one to find out what is his or her own share in the common service, and then in doing it to find the great joy of fellowship in the one spirit—the spirit of helpfulness, and willing sacrifice, and love, which is greatest of all.

BELFAST DOMESTIC MISSION.

JUBILEE MEETING.

The fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of a special Ministry to the Poor in Belfast, by the members of the First and Second Presbyterian Churches, was celebrated on Sunday by services in the First Church and in All Souls', and at the annual meeting of the Domestic Mission Society in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, on Monday evening.

The annual sermons were preached, in the morning at the First Church and in the evening at All Souls', by the Rev. V. D. Davis, the Revs. D. Walmsley and W. H. Drummond also preaching special anniversary sermons at the other services of the day. There were good congregations, and at the annual meeting on Monday evening the Central Hall was well filled.

The celebration of the Jubilee of the Mission has brought a distinct access of interest in the work, and a scheme for the improvement and enlargement of the mission building in Stanhope-street is being vigorously carried through by the two churches. The house hitherto occupied by the missionary, the Rev. G. J. Slipper, is to be included in the building, and a large meeting room on the ground floor thus secured, while in the upper rooms there will be much ampler accommodation for the work. Towards the cost, donations amounting to £850 have been already promised, being £100 more than the minimum asked for by the committee before the work could be commenced, and new or increased subscriptions not yet quite up to the £25 asked for. Further support both in donations and subscriptions is confidently expected.

The Mission was founded at a meeting held in the First Church, April 26, 1853, when the chair was taken by the Rev. William Bruce, whose daughter, Miss Charlotte Bruce, is the present secretary of the society. The first impulse towards the establishment of the Mission was given by a letter read at a meeting of the Unitarian Society for the Diffusion of Christian Knowledge, March 28, 1853, by Mr. Michael Andrews, of Ardoyne. The writer of that letter, Mrs. A. G. Malcolm, was present on Monday, and took part in the meeting, as did also Mr. George Andrews, J.P., a son of the late Michael Andrews, who was the first treasurer, and, as Mrs. Malcolm insisted, the real founder of the Mission.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

At the annual meeting in the Central Hall on Monday evening, after a pleasant half-hour for tea and talk, the chair was taken by Mr. W. T. Hamilton, and among those present were Mrs. A. G. Malcolm, the Misses Bruce, Miss M'Alester, Sir R. Lloyd Patterson, Messrs. Herbert Darbishire, George Andrews, J.P., Bowman Malcolm, J. F. Mulligan, T. Ritchie, James Davidson, W. H. M'Fadden and Robert Dickson, the Revs. D. Walmsley, W. H. Drummond, V. D. Davis, R. J. Orr, S. H. Mellone, J. A. Kelly, W. Weatherall, G. Thrift, and G. J. Slipper. The meeting was opened with a hymn and prayer by the Rev. J. A. Kelly.

Miss BRUCE read the committee's report, which spoke of the founding of the Mission and its early promoters, and told of the scheme for improving the buildings. The fact of the serious falling off from the first subscription list of £159 was also noted, the list for last year amounting to only £107 17s.

Mr. ROBERT DICKSON, the treasurer, presented the statement of accounts, which on a total of £498 18s. 11d. showed the balance in hand reduced from £96 to £62. Of the total, £201 had been received in bequests and donations, and £214 15s. 6d. invested.

The Missionary, the Rev. G. J. SLIPPER, then read his report, giving full particulars of the year's work. The following passage described the general principles of the work.

> Ever since I received the call to become Missionary to the Poor I have endeavoured to work upon definite lines which were directed to the primary object of improving the social position of those amongst whom my work lies, and also to lead them to Christ.
> It is very necessary and vitally important, I think, that in a work such as ours the first aim should be to encourage habits which uplift folk and preserve to them the sense of self-dependence. It seems to me to be next to useless to ever hope to accomplish much real good amongst the poor by periodical doles and tea-parties. We must bring them to a sense of moral responsibility; we must encourage them to habits of thrift, and then with these objects well fulfilled we may confidently hope to set before them the Christian ideal.
> This is the work, then, we are striving to do in the Mission—by social intercourse and visits to the homes of the people, by the Provident Fund so well managed by the ladies, and by the services held on Sundays and during the week.
> Relief is judiciously given in cases of extreme necessity, medicine is provided in cases of sickness, but these are not the primary objects for which the Mission's work is intended. At the same time they cannot be neglected, and they require a good deal of care and thought. There seems to me to be a very great need in this city for a central organisation that could practically govern the charitable work that is put forth by the Churches. Injudicious charity is, of all things, the most harmful, and it is very prevalent amongst us.
> I should like to see all who are engaged upon Christian work among the poor sinking their religious differences and meeting at stated times to discuss the problem that they are trying to solve, and I think it would be made manifest that the result of such conferences would be most beneficial every way.

Among the activities of the Mission recorded were a newly-established Band of Mercy and a Boys' Brigade, while the Band of Hope, the Window Gardening, the Country Holiday, and other work had been steadily maintained.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, strongly urged that their standard of annual subscription to the Mission must be raised. The report he considered to be excellent, and expressed gratitude to Mr. Slipper and his many helpers in the good work.

Mrs. MALCOLM, in seconding, recalled the memories of fifty years ago, when she had suggested to her valued friend, Michael Andrews, of Ardoyne, the need for such a work, and he had taken up the idea with so much earnestness, and laboured with so much zeal, as to be the real founder of the Domestic Mission. She spoke also of the Rev. William Bruce, their first president, his colleague, the Rev. J. Scott Porter, a strenuous worker, and the help given by the Rev. C. J. M'Alester, and many good men and women of the First and Second Churches, who had laboured for the Mission in those early days. She expressed the earnest hope that many more helpers would join together to strengthen the hands of their faithful missionary.

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND supported the motion, and made a statement as to the response to the Jubilee Appeal above referred to. He said it was particularly gratifying to find that the people at the Mission themselves had raised a contribution of at least £35 to the new fund; and a member of his congregation at All Souls' had been interesting the young people of the church with such good effect that she had secured sixty new subscribers of sums from 3d. to 5s., so that the whole addition to their income would amount to £5. He commended that example to others. It was a great thing to begin early to direct the thoughts of their young people to such good work.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS also supported the motion and said that he had felt it a great privilege to be allowed to preach on behalf of the Mission on the previous day. It was a happy augury for the future of their two churches, no less than for the Mission itself, that they were throwing themselves with so much zeal into that new effort. The work as described in Mr. Slipper's report was admirable, and he wished him and all who were helping God-speed in it.

Sir R. LLOYD PATTERSON moved, and Mr. ROBERT DICKSON seconded a resolution empowering the committee to proceed with the Improvement Scheme at once, in view of the response which had been made to the Jubilee appeal, but directing the new committee to pay special attention to the need for a further substantial increase in the subscription list.

The Rev. DOUGLAS WALMSLEY then moved:—

That this meeting, looking back over fifty years of Domestic Mission work among the poor of Belfast, and rejoicing in the manifold good the Mission has accomplished, renews its allegiance to the broad charitable and Christian spirit in which the work was first undertaken, and in which it has since been maintained; it expresses its conviction of the continued need of missionary effort to combat "ignorance, vice, crime and misery, to win souls to Christ, and promote the Glory of God"; and assures Mr. Slipper of the warm and sincere sympathy with which it follows his labours for the true welfare of the poor.

He rejoiced, he said, at the tone of confidence and hopefulness which had found expression in that best meeting of any he had known in connection with the Mission; it was an augury of continued success in their work. Those who founded that Mission were men of convinced mind, with strong opinions of their own on religious and theological questions, and they could speak strong and earnest words in defence of those opinions; but in that Mission they had no thought of sectarian advantages, all they cared about was that the poor, the miserable and distressed should be reached and helped; and that broad, unsectarian spirit, he need hardly say, was fully maintained in their work at the present time. In Belfast they had nothing in the way of charity organisation. He wished that Mr. Slipper's suggestion could take effect, and that the goodwill of the town as a whole for the distressed poor could be gathered up and not wasted in ill-directed and often hurtful efforts, so that the best results might be secured; but meanwhile he pleaded with those who received applications for help not to give alms at the door or in the street to those of whom they knew nothing; that inevitably encouraged imposture and was a fruitful source of mischief; he asked them rather to refer such cases to Mr. Slipper at the Mission for inquiry and judicious help, and to put the means at his disposal for a wisely directed charity.

The Rev. S. H. MELLONE seconded the resolution with a few words of earnest sympathy.

Mr. GEORGE ANDREWS supported the resolution, saying that it enunciated principles dear to them all. What they desired was simply to do good to those who were in need. The Mission had done good work in the past, and its scope was now to be widened. For this they must all help to provide the necessary means. As a visiting justice he saw much of the criminal class in their gaols, and had been deeply distressed by the hard case of those who were imprisoned for a first lapse, often the result of drink, and the terrible difficulty such people had in making a fresh start when they were discharged from the gaol. It was a work of the truest charity to help such fallen ones, to give them the fresh chance they were often honestly anxious to have, and he commended the matter very earnestly to the committee, to see if some effort could not be made in that direction.

The new committee was then appointed, on the motion of Mr. BOWMAN MALCOLM, seconded by Mr. CLELAND, and the meeting closed with the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. D. Walmsley.

THE NEW EDUCATION ACT.

LANCASHIRE.

Some of the most vigorous opposition to the passing of the Education Act was shown in Lancashire, and the Manchester and District Passive Resistance League is organising a determined stand against the willing payment of that portion of the rate which includes religious teaching. The President, the Rev. Dr. Leach, has publicly given five reasons for not rendering voluntary obedience to the new Act, viz., because:—

1. It enters into the region of conscience, into which Parliament should never go.
2. It takes rates as well as taxes to teach Popery, Sacerdotalism, and other unacceptable doctrines.
3. It compels payment for teaching Nonconformist children doctrines which declare their religion false.
4. It excludes Free Churchmen from all head teacherships in several thousand schools supported by public funds, but without public control.
5. It imposes on teachers religious tests which have been abolished from Corporations, Universities, and Parliament.

Thousands of persons have determined to refuse voluntary payment of the proportion of the school rate allotted to religious instruction, throwing the responsibility upon the local authorities of collecting it as best they may under compulsion.

This movement, which is a strong and earnest one, is yet by no means co-extensive with the opposition to the reactionary principles set forth in the Education Act. Most Unitarians in the province, and very many members of other Nonconformist Churches, decline to commit themselves to a "course of action" which they deem subversive of democratic government. The Act is, after all, the decision of the people's representatives, and if it is not good the people will ere long have an opportunity of returning other representatives to Parliament to undo the evil. If non-payment of the rate is justified now what would it be if the Nonconformists had their will and established a general system of so-called "unsectarian" teaching, which is as hateful to the Catholic or the High Anglican as sacerdotal teaching is to the Free Churchman? Why pay taxes for obnoxious teaching, as we have all been doing, and draw the line at rates? What would have been thought of Catholics or Anglicans who refused to pay the School Board rate, as they might have done, on very similar grounds to those now urged by some Nonconformists? And what greater untruth to Unitarians could be taught in Church schools than that which they have been obliged to tolerate in many Board-schools?

Many of us feel very strongly that to refuse to pay the rate is bad tactics, having regard to future eventualities; and that it is too late in the day to raise the cry of offended conscience by way of justification for such an attitude, considering the way in which unholy compromise has been allowed to rule in public schools for over thirty years. "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." Those who, against their traditions of freedom, descended to effect such a compromise bartered away their birthright for what has proved to be a mess of pottage. "Verily they have received their reward." Some of them sound a very different note now; as e.g. the Rev. S. Pearson at the recent meeting of the Passive Resistance League, when he said:—

> They were all willing and anxious to separate the secular elements of education from the religious elements, leaving the religious elements to the Churches and families and the secular to the State.

That was the sane teaching of thirty years ago, and it is in this direction only that ultimate salvation for our Education System will be found.

Meanwhile, what is the right course for all true friends of Education to adopt? Counsels are many, and opinions differ widely. I can only give my own for what it is worth. But I believe it to be the opinion of the majority of our co-religionists in this part of the kingdom.

First of all, let us welcome the Act in so far as it is an attempt to co-ordinate the different kinds of Education and unify the local authority. It is clear gain to have all the schools—"Voluntary," so-called, and Board, "Provided" and "Non-Provided," as the Act defines them—placed under the same controlling authority. True, that governing body is not constituted at present just as we should like it to be. It is not thoroughly representative of the ratepayers as it will have to be some day. But the reactionaries have played into the hands of the progressives, as some of them are beginning to see, by handing over the Voluntary schools to the County or Borough Councils and allowing the representative element a place in their management. It remains for another Government, in days, let us hope, not too far distant, to carry the system to its logical completion.

In the next place, while most of us deplore the destruction of the directly-elected School Boards, which have done better and more unselfish work, take them all in all, than any other public bodies in the country, the schools are still under the control of elective corporations, and the people have in their own hands the question of how they shall be constituted. Let no vote be cast for any member of the County or Borough Council who is known to be adverse to thorough popular control of the schools, or who is himself educationally unfit. In the selection and support of candidates let suitable qualifications in this respect be a sine qua non.

Then let the schemes for the constitution of the Education Committee be framed as liberally as possible, where friends of progress can make their influence felt. Let Sectarian representation upon these Committees be discouraged altogether, recognising only as suitable for co-optation persons with a real interest in Education and a proper qualification for controlling it, whatever their religious denomination may be. The Cheshire County Council (Conservative though it be) has set a splendid example in this respect, ignoring all denominational representation. And let those ladies and gentlemen who, having the welfare of the children most at heart, are invited to join the Education Committee take up the work even at some cost of sacrifice, for the sake of the great end in view.

What is to be done with the British schools, many of which are associated with our churches? This is a problem which has greatly exercised the minds of the managers, and about which there are decidedly two opinions, as there will apparently be two courses of action. Some—the minority, I think—distrusting the local authority in the matter of religious instruction, prefer to keep their doors open as at present, maintaining their connection with a Voluntary Association. Others—the majority, I believe—boldly resolved to entrust their schools to the Education Committee, feeling that the time has come for a truly National System of Education, when "Voluntaryism," whether denominational or undenominational, should cease to be. Let there be no hindrance to a general system of public schools on the part of progressive Educationists, they say. I confess that, not without some hesitation and trepidation, I incline to this latter course, which, I believe, is likely to be commended to our congregations in Lancashire and Cheshire by the Committee of the Provincial Assembly. Only a few days remain to make the decision upon which so much depends. But let no school be handed over unless satisfactory terms are arranged and accepted by the local authority. Otherwise there may be fresh instances of the British school being closed only to have its scholars drafted into a Denominational school, perhaps enlarged for the very purpose. In the last resort, if there should be a great betrayal, and a triumphant Sectarianism should sweep into its schools the children of those who hate its spirit, it is open to us to reopen our schools and claim recognition after a year's successful work.

The foregoing is perhaps enough to indicate the set of feeling and intention among Unitarian friends of Education in Lancashire, so far as I am able to gauge it. But, while we take the new Act with as good a face as possible, determined to make the most of the good things it contains and minimise its evils as far as we can, we must bate no jot of heart and hope and determination to mend the mischief at the first opportunity, and educate the nation to demand a real and complete popular control of the schools. We have not yet arrived at a solution of the Education problem in England; and the Government, strongly entrenched behind the great majority given them for a very different purpose, have yet to learn that in destroying the School Boards and giving the control of all the elementary schools to the County and Borough Councils, they have gone much further than they had intended in the direction of a really National system of education wholly paid for and wholly controlled by the community.

A few words as to the constitution of the Education Committee under the scheme of the Lancashire County Council may be acceptable:—

The Committee is to consist of 72 persons, of whom 56 are to be members of the Council (including the Chairman of the Council and the Chairman of the Finance Committee), 2 are to be women directly appointed, and 14 other persons are to be appointed after recommendation from various bodies. These consist of Owens College, Manchester; University College, Liverpool; Mining and Technical College, Wigan; Royal Lancashire Agricultural Society, the existing School Boards, the Elementary School Teachers, the Secondary School Teachers, the Association of Non-County Boroughs. Each of the foregoing is to have one representative. The denominations are to have 6 nominees, 3 from the Church of England, 2 from the Nonconformists, and 1 from the Catholics.

Here in Bolton we are politically and educationally behind the times.

The scheme for our county borough provides for 41 members (to be reduced to 39 soon), 24 of whom shall belong to the Council. The other 17 are to consist of 1 woman selected by the Council, 2 nominees from the Church of England schools, 1 each from the Catholic schools, the Wesleyan and British schools jointly, Victoria University, the Grammar School, the Church Institute, the High School for Girls and the Church Institute jointly (a woman), the Primary School Teachers, the Higher School Teachers, the Educational Committee of the Co-operative Society, and the Trades Council; and until November, 1904, 4 representatives of the moribund School Board. Then they are to be replaced by "other persons of experience in Education, not exceeding 2," with special reference to technical instruction.

Poor School Board! this is the Council's reward for its faithful labours! This singular provision shows the animus of a reactionary body against a progressive one; for this our School Board has been on the whole, in spite of its strong sectarian majority. And the undue favour shown to the denominations in the representation is one more sign of the spirit in which we are locally governed. But what could be expected of a Council of 96 in a busy place like Bolton? There is plenty of work to be done here by way of conversion.

And, meanwhile, proud Preston, which, to save its rates, refused to have a School Board, now has to face a 9d. rate to begin with. And St. Helen's and other boroughs, which trusted to Voluntaryism to save their pockets, have now the mortification of paying heavily from the rates for schools which belong not to the community, but to the denominations. Who will pity them? C. J. STREET.

THE BACONIAN THEORY OF SHAKESPEARE.

SIR,—Mr. Gow has raised what some of us consider the most interesting literary question of the present day, and in a manner which compels reply, for he adopts the Papal style, and designates as false the theory opposed to his own.

In his first paragraph Mr. Gow disposes of the bi-literal cypher argument. This is not a difficult task, and I entirely agree with him in that.

In the rest of his article he seems to put evidence and reasoning in a secondary place, and to rely mainly on tradition.

The case of the Baconians seems to me a very strong one.

In the plays four particular features stand out from many others: The familiarity of the writer with Court life, his immense erudition, his knowledge of France, and his intimate acquaintance with English law. Those who have read the life of Francis Bacon and studied his recognised works know that these points are the special characteristics of the mind and writings of that wonderful man.

Mr. Gow says: "No coward or cold-hearted betrayer of his friends could possibly have created plays which are permeated with the fundamental principles of morality and beauty."

This sentence astonishes me, for it shows that Mr. Gow surely cannot have fully understood the character of Francis Bacon, or else cannot have read his books, for his recognised works abound in the expression of the highest sentiments.

It seems hardly necessary to point to parallel cases. How the author of the Psalms was a murderer and an adulterer, how the Roman poet sang, Video meliora proboque deteriora sequor, and one might also quote St. Paul.

Francis Bacon, so far as his brain and writings are concerned, stands out among his fellows like Gulliver in Lilliput, and his ceaseless activity would have afforded him time to write the plays; moreover, the parallel passages in the writings of Bacon and in the plays are numerous.

Mr. Gow mentions the fact that the play of Henry VIII. first appeared some years after Shakespeare's death. It seems to me that the well-known speeches of Cardinal Wolsey could only have been written by a man who had passed through the similar experiences which Bacon could look back upon at the end of his life, and that this play formed a fitting work to close the great and chequered career of that most remarkable man.

After contemplating the mighty genius of Francis Bacon, the facts known about Shakespeare form a strange contrast:—

That he was brought up in a country town; that he left school when quite young to help in a shop; that he married early and had a family; that he went to London and made money on the stage and by bringing out the plays; that he returned to Stratford; that his signature was that of a man who was evidently unaccustomed to using a pen; that his family were illiterate; and that he died as the result of "a merrie bout" with his companions.

From this I do not wish to have it implied that I believe Shakespeare had no part in writing any of the plays. On the contrary I think the account of the Forest of Arden, which existed in Warwickshire, and the veiled reference in "the Merry Wives of Windsor" to the Lucy family of Charlecote, afford evidence that Shakespeare assisted in the compilation of at least two of the plays, and it may therefore be assumed for the benefit of Mr. Gow's theory that he had something to do with others of them; but the more one considers this wonderful series of plays the more plainly one seems to discern the master mind of Francis Bacon pervading the whole.

E. BASIL LUPTON.

Leeds, March 2.

ANOTHER letter on this subject we have received from Mr. George Stronach, of Edinburgh, who concludes that Mr. Gow has taken his ideas of Bacon's "morality" from Macaulay, and has neglected to read the Lives of Bacon by Spedding and Hepworth Dixon. As to Shakespeare's character, he points to the unedifying portrait in Sidney Lee's "Life of Shakespeare," and asks whether such a one does not compare very unfavourable with Bacon.

We must warn our readers that we cannot afford space in these columns for an extended correspondence on this tempting subject.—ED. INQ.

THE JUBILEE OF UNITARIANISM IN AUSTRALIA.

THIS may practically be called the Jubilee year of Unitarianism in Australia, and a few facts relating to the movement in general may not be out of place. The suggestion which led to the formation of the "Australian Unitarian Christian Association," and ultimately to the Sydney Church, was indeed made in 1850, and the Adelaide congregation did not come into existence till 1855, but the first public service of Unitarian Christianity was held in Melbourne on Jan. 30, 1853, when Dr. Stanley, on his way out to the charge of the Sydney Church, took part in the inaugural meetings in Melbourne. Some nine months later, Nov. 6, 1853, public worship began in the Macquarie-street Church, Sydney, which the "Association" had bought from the Wesleyans. Dr. G. H. Stanley was its first minister.

Melbourne may thus fairly claim to be the oldest Unitarian Church in Australia. This position she holds in virtue of the fact that there chanced to be in the city a small group of earnest and influential gentlemen and an accredited Unitarian minister, the Rev. Maxwell Davidson, who had come out as a private tutor to Mr. John Duerdin's son. These met at the house of the last-named gentleman on Nov. 29, 1852, organised themselves into a society, raised the necessary funds, and appointed a minister and secretary on the spot, thus probably establishing a "record" for despatch.

The preliminary meeting of the founders of the Adelaide congregation was called by advertisement for July 11, 1854. Some twelve persons were present. The Rev. J. Crawford Woods, B.A., then at Newport, Isle of Wight, was, on the recommendation of the B. and F.U.A., appointed to the charge of the infant society, and the first public worship was held on Oct. 14, 1855. Mr. Woods' settlement proved extremely happy. His excellent qualities of heart and mind soon endeared him to his people and won him and the church many loyal friends and warm supporters. During his pastorate of some thirty-three years he earned the respect and confidence of the whole community, and the church became influential in the town and powerful in benevolent activities. Mr. Woods carries with him into his retirement the affectionate good wishes of many friends.

In June, 1857, a Unitarian congregation was formed at Ballaarat, the great gold-mining centre. Unfortunately little is known of its history, and its records cannot be traced. The society held together for some six or seven years, and a minister was appointed for six months during one part of its history; but the result was not equal to expectation, and the appointment was not continued. The services, however, were maintained with lay help. I cannot ascertain exactly why or when they were finally discontinued and the society disbanded. Ballaarat is the second largest town in Victoria, and has a population of over 40,000, and there ought to be room for a strong Unitarian church in it.

The year following the initiation of the Ballaarat movement (1858) witnessed an effort on the part of the Melbourne Church to found a suburban congregation. The task was entrusted to the Rev. William Bowen, who had retired from active duty, and was living in Melbourne with his son, Dr. Aubrey Bowen. A curious incident, well reflecting the theological temper of the times, is connected with this experiment. A small disused Presbyterian church was, in a fit of absent-mindedness, leased to Mr. Bowen, and in it a fair congregation was gathered together. But when the fact of the lease became known to the General Assembly of the colony, the trustees, one the Hon. John Hood, who was a party to it, had a rather bad time of it. Divines and elders worked themselves up into a fine frenzy at the "desecration" of their temple; and one of their number, the Rev. J. Hetherington, was appointed to preach a sermon in the "desecrated" building which should "purify" the wood and stone of it from any lingering germs of heresy. The purification was duly effected and the medium thereof published in due course. The disinfectant, somewhat extravagantly used, consisted of sulphur, malice, uncharitableness, bigotry, and falsehood in about equal proportions. If these things can "purify," then thereafter was this poor little Presbyterian church swept and garnished when repossessed by the seven other spirits. Bowen, however, lost his lease, and the removal into new quarters had a disturbing effect on the congregation, from which it never seems to have recovered. The services were continued for eighteen months longer, when Mr. Bowen abandoned the effort. St. Kilda was at that time sparsely peopled, now it has a large population, and a fresh experiment might have a different result from that of forty years ago.

"On Dec. 24, 1865, a second place for Unitarian worship in South Australia was opened by the Rev. J. C. Woods, B.A., at Shady Grove—over twenty miles from Adelaide. The building was a present from Mr. J. Monks to the Unitarian denomination, and this gentleman gave, in addition, eight acres of land for a cemetery for the use of Unitarians." So writes the Rev. J. C. Woods, from whom I also gather that the services at this place were conducted for years by the late Mr. Francis Duffield, of Cobden Grange, and since his death by Mr. F. C. Smith, formerly a lay-reader in the Church of England. Mr. Duffield, who is described as "a remarkable man," was a younger brother of William Duffield, who did so much to found Strangeways Church, of which he was for some years the minister.

Brisbane, like Perth, is the capital of a large State, and several Unitarian families are known to reside there. At neither of these places is there any Unitarian church. Many years ago, indeed, the Rev. Mr. Fawcett tried to found a church in Brisbane, under what conditions or with what prospects I know not. I cannot learn who this Mr. Fawcett was. Mr. H. Burkitt, of Coorinda, Brisbane, who seems to have known him, says that he had been in practice in Adelaide as a barrister. I saw in the Sydney Minute-book an account of an appeal from him to them for help to carry on the services, but unfortunately they were not in a position to do this, and the movement lapsed.

Such, in briefest outline, is the story of "origins" and "foundings" of Unitarianism in Australia. The movements at Hobart Town, Tasmania, and Auckland, N.Z., form no part of this present narrative.

The very baldness of the story is likely to suggest unpleasant reflections. Several attempts have been made to extend the influence of our churches into different centres of Australian life, and have completely failed. Why is this? The apparent inference is that our Gospel is not wanted, and meets no need in these southern lands; the people turn a deaf ear and pass on. Hence our churches have no future beneath the Southern Cross.

I fear this idea has got hold of many of the best and most loyal members of our societies out here, and probably some in England feel its force. My own conviction is that if all the facts connected with these movements that failed were known, they would prove that the failure was due to an absence of method in setting about the work. Nothing exactly was aimed at and hit. One can find no traces of any preliminary inquiries, private conferences, public discussions, and such other means as are necessary to give a new society a fair start either in Brisbane or Ballaarat. In both cases men were chosen as ministers who had no special training for the Unitarian ministry, and no special aptitude for the delicate and onerous tasks a new society in a recently-settled land imposes upon its minister. Our churches out here have suffered grievously at the hands of adventurers. Mr. Fawcett was not an adventurer, but an honourable man; and the gentleman who for a short while had charge of Ballaarat was irreproachable as to character, but neither were really suitable men for the position. Success under these conditions would have been more wonderful than failure.

If our work is to spread and thrive, new ground must be broken by men specially qualified for the task, and be supported by such official authority as we have to give, and such financial assistance as will give the missionary a fair chance. Compare Brisbane and Auckland, or the present movement in Auckland with the earlier one in the sixties, and it will be found that the difference between success and failure is largely a difference of method. The method adopted by the B. and F.U.A. in the case of Auckland shows, I think conclusively, what can be done by organisation and something like official encouragement.

Political Federation is now an accomplished fact with us; some of the Churches have also followed the example of the politicians, but so far there is no desire for federation in our scattered congregations. The effort we in Melbourne made some three years ago in this direction met with no encouragement, and does not appear to have been seriously considered except by a very few. In my judgment the establishment of some central, representative and responsible body is the sine quâ non of any forward movement. I think most of us now feel that had such a body as was then proposed been called into existence, we should have been spared our present shame and humiliation.

The true lesson to be learned from this story of failure is not one of utter discouragement, but that wiser methods and special men are required for the special work before us.

The story of the congregations at Sydney, Melbourne and Adelaide has been told by Mr. H. Turner, H. Gybes Turner, and the Rev. J. C. Woods, B.A., respectively, and the ground need not be covered again as the main facts are well known.

The fifty years have been fruitful in change; loss and gain; and much faithful service on the part of many ministers and laymen. Commodious and even handsome churches have been built and paid for, and the regular work of a church done with more or less fidelity and zeal. The Press has been used to a small extent to circulate occasional sermons of more than passing interest, and the tracts supplied so generously from "home" have been scattered far and wide, and doubtless borne fruit. It is, however, one of our misfortunes that we have never made any large use of the Press as a powerful auxiliary to our regular work. Melbourne and Sydney have indeed issued one or two monthly papers, but these, save in one instance, have not aspired to be more than organs of a congregation. "Modern Thought," founded and edited by the Rev. George Walters, aimed at being much more than a local organ; by the co-operation of many friends in the three chief capitals it was hoped that the new periodical might be made to represent the progressive movement over the whole continent. The paper did not live long enough to become a power. Nothing of the kind has been attempted since. It is very unfortunate that we have not been able to make a larger use of the Press.

The influence exercised by our churches has thus been severely local and limited to the silent operation of those subtle forces that radiate from small centres where men and women are banded together by a high principle and follow faithfully after a noble ideal of the religious life. It is impossible to speak too highly of the small and faithful bands of men and women who have stood loyally by an unpopular cause and vindicated it against its many assailants. The result may not be all they or we could desire, but these have not been insignificant nor without influence of the highest kind. The best part of a church's life is that good diffused which, escaping the trammels of officialdom, sweetens and purifies the atmosphere of faith. The tone of orthodox church life here is still narrow and exclusive in its temper, but it is not what it was when Hetherington preached his "purification" sermon forty years ago. And to this result we have contributed our fair share. And for what we have been permitted to do, we thank God and take courage.

The note of warning sounded by the story of these last fifty years issues from the record of the defective provisions made at Sydney and Melbourne for the culture of the religious life of the young. Spasmodic attempts have been made at Sunday-school work, especially in Melbourne, but faith and courage and the sense of congregational responsibility in this matter have yielded to the serious difficulties that have beset the work. Rome is not built in a day, and the kingdom of God cometh not with observation. We in Melbourne are doing what we can to remove this defect, and I am not without hope that patience and steady work will be rewarded with a fair measure of success. The harvest indeed is plenteous, but the labourers are few. May the Lord of the harvest send us many worthy labourers!

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

ALAS! union is not effected by the adoption of a name, and there is hardly more real union among our twenty-four churches now than there was when the West Riding Unitarian Mission Association was the only bond which joined some of us together in a common work, while by its local name it necessarily excluded others. The fault is in part due to the human nature of which Unitarians have more than their fair share; if a congregation cannot stand by itself it is glad to find those who will allow it to lean upon them for support, but if it can stand it is seldom much disposed, too often resolutely opposed, to taxing its resources and restricting by ever so little its own freedom for the sake of others. So we have to deplore the isolation of churches which are in the most favourable situation for active co-operation in all that is being attempted or done among us. And then outside the little group, of which Leeds is the most convenient if not the actual centre, are as many churches which, with the best will, cannot take that full share of the work which they and we desire. Sheffield, Doncaster, Rotherham, Hull, Scarborough, Whitby, these all lie too far off for us to be justified in expecting of them the continual help at committee and congregational meetings which we have a right to look for within the narrower circle. All the more do we value whatever recognition of the common claim comes to us from them, and earnestly we entreat of them to bear in mind that they do belong to Yorkshire and to the Yorkshire group of churches, and have a duty to the so-called "Union," to do their part to make it a reality, and a source of strength to us all.

We no doubt have our faults at Leeds, faults we are quite aware of, and perhaps faults which others see to which we are ourselves blind. But this I can assert, for Mill Hill and for its ministers past and present, with the most absolute assurance—that we have never cherished an idea of setting ourselves in a position of superiority or authority over other churches. We are generally compelled to take the lead because others will not or cannot, but we never presume to give the word of command, Follow; all we venture on is to invite our brethren to come on with us. Indeed, if we were otherwise inclined we know full well that Unitarian congregations are not to be ordered or bought, that if they are to be won it must be by a full recognition of that independence on which they rightly pride themselves. I am sure that any other policy would result in division, discord, and distrust, and make impossible for a long while to come that union which some of us have long had at heart, which we shall keep on hoping and working for in spite of every discouragement.

Our last venture has been the adoption of the Seed Sower as the monthly chronicle of our churches. Thirteen congregations have up to the present adopted it, and contributed notices of work they are doing and contemplating for the outer sheets. I earnestly hope the minority—it is just a minority—which at present stand aloof will join us soon. It is good for us all to know what others are doing; I have myself received many a hint from the Calendar of other churches. "Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works" is an old injunction which ever holds good; and if I don't mean to imitate my brother at Malton who is taking for his subject next Sunday "The Bible and Shakespeare," nor my neighbour at Selby who is taking "The Story of the Pilgrim Fathers," it is yet interesting and helpful to me to know what they are studying and preaching on. So all the items about children's services, Bands of Hope and Mercy, sewing societies, ministers' adult classes, and the like serve at once to inspirit me and keep me humble, according as I learn that others are doing the same work I am trying to do myself, or am made to see how much is being done by others beyond what I am able to manage.

But the test is about to be applied to us. Are Yorkshire Unitarians really united in spite of the distances which part us and our determined spirit of independence? The answer will be given by the grand bazaar which we are going to hold at the end of November. Lancashire and London have set us the example, and their success has given us the much needed encouragement. Here in Leeds we are not quite agreed up to now about the desirability of raising the money which we must have in this way rather than by subscription. If the bazaar could be at Bradford or Sheffield there would be no objection, but it must of necessity be at Leeds, and it will be the first time in two hundred and thirty years that the Mill Hill congregation has been connected with a bazaar otherwise than as patrons or subscribers or buyers. But we want £5,000, indeed to do all the work needed we should say £7 000. We are in debt as a union, but that a little begging would clear us of. We want to do more and better work, not to start new churches—we think it will be time enough to talk of that when the churches we are responsible for are brought to a state of efficiency. We want a minister at large. We want increased accommodation at more than one place which is hampered for room. We want more frequent lectures and meetings. we want—Oh! I would that our wants were far more than we at present are conscious of! They come as the work grows, the more we do the more we want to be doing; and it is a misery to be stopped from good work by the knowledge that, while it costs nothing to do nothing, it is almost impossible to do any good thing without a supply of money which is not forthcoming.

Well, we have talked of a bazaar for some two years, and now at last are gladdened by the sudden enthusiasm with which it has been taken up here in Leeds. Sir James Kitson has consented to be our President, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot treasurer, Mrs. Talbot and Miss Dodgson secretaries, and help is being proferred on all sides.

Oh, there's nothing like a bazaar for getting money! It's a lot of trouble; it imposes an immensity of work, generally on those who are already over-burdened; it has its risks of dissension; it may possibly be a disappointment in the end. All the same I would rather have the bazaar with its labour and hazards than have a cheque for the sum required put into my hands. The cheque would mean that some one man or several men were generous givers and interested in the cause. The bazaar means a large number of men and women, young and old, rich and poor, scholars and teachers, all united in the same work for the same object. Poor Mill Hill! I feel inclined to say, never yet to have had a bazaar of its own!

We are in for it now, and I am sure it will do us all good, all our Yorkshire churches, for I cannot believe that anyone will stand apart from the work when fairly started.

We shall shortly issue an appeal for National support, and shall thankfully receive any help in goods or money or any other way it may be offered us, as acceptable not only for itself but as a sign of brotherly good-will from our brethren in the faith.

There have come into my hands this past week two financial statements, one from Huddersfield, the other from Holbeck. In reading them I have been led to ask whether it would not be possible to form a correct estimate of the condition of a church merely from a study of its accounts. Not by any means that a balance in hand is evidence of prosperity; it may be the very reverse—evidence of indifference, of resources with no care to apply them to the best purpose. But if the accounts are full, minute, careful, it must be because there is uprightness and carefulness and genuine interest among those who manage affairs. And so much I can say of those two churches. The Huddersfield report has always seemed to me a very model of what the annual report should be from a small and struggling church, which cannot afford the cost of a whole book giving a yearly account of its doings and expenses, such as they issue at the old meeting in Birmingham. It is hard work at Huddersfield making ends meet, but they do it; all praise to those who manage it, and to the minister who, amid many trials and with small remuneration, has the support of a true minister's wife, a minister's daughter, we hope in the course of years to be a minister's mother too.

Holbeck rejoices in having raised over £400 in the course of the past year, and looks forward to the installation of the electric light, when the bazaar to be held this month has brought in the necessary funds. Pew rents have been given up and a subscription list substituted. All will go well here if only Mr. Harvey Cook keeps up his health; I am glad to hear that the latest medical opinion is completely reassuring, and hope he may long devote his enthusiasm and energy to the work.

From Scarborough most encouraging accounts come; the congregations are increasing and larger than they have been for many years. Elland does better without a minister than with. But it does not follow because some small places exceptionally situated can get on without a minister that others can. We are all anxious about the Sheffield pulpit; it is important for Yorkshire that it should be filled by an able and earnest man, worthy of so important a congregation. Pudsey is well worth the labour of a zealous and intelligent minister, who desires to meet zealous and intelligent people to work with him.

At Halifax, Mr. Millson, laden with the burden of years devoted to good and eminently successful work at Northgate-end, has found a youthful and vigorous assistant in Mr. Richards. Mr. Rawlings is leaving York at the end of July; is it too much to hope that they may find a successor to him who will be able to do what, with the best will in the world, he has not achieved, and reunite this ancient Presbyterian foundation with the group of churches whose history and principles are akin with its own? Union is strength, and our union implies no restriction on liberty. Charles Hargrove.

EXCURSION TO HUNGARY.

Sir,—With your usual courtesy, will you kindly allow me to announce that many of our friends desirous of making a Hungarian tour are in favour of postponing the excursion till next year?

Beside this, there are difficulties in the way of combining attendance at the Amsterdam Conference with the longer journey which I had not foreseen; and therefore, somewhat reluctantly, I am driven to the conclusion that postponement is inevitable.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Aberdeen.—Anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, on Sunday, March 8. On Monday the annual congregational soirée took place in the Northern Friendly Society's Hall. There was an attendance of over 300. Mr. R. Muir was chairman, and in a brief address spoke of the condition and prospects of the congregation. Addresses were given by the Revs. H. Williamson and A. Webster. The programme included solos, part songs, a violin solo, and an exhibition of physical exercises by a team of girls. The meeting was very hearty and successful. The church property did not sell when it was offered, but an offer has since been received which may lead to a sale.

Astley.—The sixteenth and concluding lantern service of the season was held on Sunday, when the following illustrated songs were rendered by members of the choir:—"The Holy City," "Daddy," "The Children's Home," "A Dream of Paradise," and "The Lost Chord." The attendance throughout has been very good.

Boston.—The congregation of Spain-lane Chapel were greatly cheered and encouraged last Sunday by the visit (on behalf of the B. and F.U.A.) of the Rev. James Harwood. His discourses were much appreciated, especially his setting forth of the principles of our Liberal Faith. On Monday evening Mr. Harwood gave his lecture, "A Visit to India," which was very interesting on account of the insight it gave into the social features of Indian life—the separating or sectarian effect of caste and the evil of early marriages.

Braintree.—In the course of a vigorous campaign of the Anti-Gambling League in Essex, a meeting was held on Wednesday week in the Braintree Lecture Hall, which was crowded, large numbers of people being unable to gain admission. The resolution of the evening, condemning betting, was moved by the Rev. R. H. Fuller, M.A., of the Free Christian Church, in a vigorous speech, seconded by the Congregational minister, and carried without a dissentient vote.

Bridgwater.—On Monday evening last, in connection with the Social Union, the Rev. A. Lancaster, of Moretonhampstead, gave a lecture on "A Visit to Copenhagen, Finland, and St. Petersburg," illustrated with lime-light views. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick, who presided, proposed a hearty vote of thanks to the lecturer for his extremely interesting lecture.

Chichester.—The teachers and scholars of the Sunday-school invited the parents and friends to another social entertainment on Thursday, March 5, when a most enjoyable evening—with a programme of recitations, readings, and music—was spent.

Exeter.—On Monday evening the children of George's Chapel Sunday-school gave a very successful entertainment. A play called The Dancing Princesses was admirably rendered, and was followed by songs and recitations. In the course of the evening there was a Sale of Articles made by the Children's Working Party, all of which were disposed of.

Heaton Moor.—The Rev. Priestley Prime is giving a course of sermons on Sunday evenings, addressed especially to business men, urging the importance of the business virtues, punctuality, order, regularity, and reliability in church affairs, and public duties, and the need for an inspiring religious purpose to guide and test all business operations, the application of great ideals to small circumstances, and amidst all the purposes for which men labour and scheme, remembrance of the meaning and purpose of life itself. The Young People's Guild in connection with this church arranged a lantern lecture, which was kindly given by the Rev. Charles Peach, on March 4, on "The Great Hucklow Holiday Home and Derbyshire Scenery." Both lecture and illustrations were received with great interest. Mr. Prime presided. The money profit and some voluntary gifts go to the Holiday Home and kindred objects of the Sunday School Association.

Horsham.—The third of a series of four free winter evening lectures was given on Wednesday evening by the Rev. H. M. Livens, of Brighton. The subject was "Chaucer," and the treatment of it was much enjoyed by a good audience. The preceding lectures have been "The English Lakes," the Rev. F. K. Freeston; and "Shakespeare and Life," the Rev. J. J. Marten; and for March 18, "Abraham Lincoln," by the Rev. G. Preston, is announced.

Kilmarnock.—The Rev. A. Irvine Innes lectured in Clerk's-lane Free Church on Sunday week on the subject of "Compulsory Military Service," the proposal of which for this country he vigorously denounced. The lecture is printed in full in the Kilmarnock Herald, of March 6, which devotes a leading article to the subject, objecting to the treatment of such a subject in the pulpit, though agreeing with some of the lecturer's points.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting of the Avondale-road congregation was held on Tuesday, when reports were given by the hon. secretary of the church, and the officers of the institutions affiliated with it—viz., Sunday-school, Sunday Scholars' Guild, and Band of Hope. The hon. treasurer's statement showed a deficit, notwithstanding efforts made in various ways to increase the income of the church.

London: Stepney.—On Tuesday evening the members and friends of the Band of Hope gave a most enjoyable concert in aid of the lantern fund. Quite 100 parents and adult friends, in addition to fifty or sixty children, were present, and the evening was greatly enjoyed.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday, March 4, the annual winter Sunday-school treat took place at the Concert Hall. One hundred and sixty-eight persons sat down to tea, of whom seventy-four were children, and about seventy people were admitted after tea. The chair was taken by Mr. A. J. Ellis, who distributed the regular attendance medals and prizes. Excellent short addresses were given by the chairman, the treasurer, Mr. M. A. Ruck, who said the finances were in a sound condition, and Miss Ellis. The Rev. S. S. Brettell, after speaking with gratitude of the good work done during the year, presented a pair of bracelets to Miss Ellis as a mark of appreciation of her good work in the school and the congregation. He made the presentation on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Peters and family, adding that all present would share in the spirit that prompted the gift. A very successful entertainment followed, consisting of action songs by the children, a harmonica duet by two members of the Bible Class, an operetta, The Sleeping Beauty, by the boys and girls of the school, and a farce, A Very Awkward Mistake, by teachers and friends. A Sale of Work, arranged by the Sewing Circle, was held at intervals during the evening, and realised a useful sum.

Padiham (Appointment).—The Rev. J. E. Jenkins, of Sheffield, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of Nazareth Chapel, and will enter on the charge in June. On Sunday last two practical sermons were preached in the chapel by Mr. Simon Jones, of the Manchester Home Missionary College, when collections were taken on behalf of the N.E.L. Mission Fund.

Poole (Appointment).—Mr. James Burton, M.A., for many years a master at the Liverpool Institute, and a member of the Renshaw-street, and latterly the Ullet-road congregation, has accepted an invitation to become the minister of the High-street congregation in succession to the late Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A., and will enter on his duties in July.

Portsmouth.—In connection with the visit into the Southern District of the Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury, a well-attended tea-meeting was held at the High-street Church, followed by a public meeting. Mr. G. Cosens Prior welcomed Mr. Street as the author of a series of articles which greatly helped him in his earlier life, when he was moving towards the broad beliefs of Unitarianism. Mr. Street prefaced his lecture on "The Religion of Life and Service," by defining a Church as a group of people, given to pure thinking, and living sweet lives in order to bring forth the fruits of good conduct and personal holiness. Some people called him a Unitarian minister, but he preferred to be known as a minister of religion. He did not care for sectarian controversialism, but, when the need came for it, they took their stand. Unitarians stood for something higher than theology, which might after all be wrong. No man was cosmic-minded enough to grasp the full sweep of God's truth, and man's theology might be only a glimpse of the truth. Mr. Street took as his text James i. 27, and as a supplementary text, the words of Emanuel Swedenborg, "All real religion is the religion of life, and the life of religion is to do good." Religion, said the lecturer, should be the binding together of human lives, and the binding of all that is human with that which is Divine. Nowadays Churches seemed to be using weapons of defiance against each other, and keeping each other at a distance, instead of showing a spirit of love and of real religious life and service one to another.

Raloo (Ordination).—On Monday, Feb. 23, Mr. John M'Cleery, a licentiate of the Presbytery of Antrim, was ordained by the Presbytery of Templepatrick to the pastoral charge of the Non-subscribing Presbyterian Congregation of Raloo. The opening service was conducted by the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, of Glenarm, and the Rev. Alfred Turner put the usual questions from the Remonstrant Synod's Code of Discipline, in the course of his reply to which Mr. M'Cleery affirmed that it was his intention to preach the simple Gospel of Christ. The Rev. F. Thomas offered the ordination prayer, the ministers present laying their hands on the head of the kneeling candidate. The Rev. James Hall then delivered a charge to minister and congregation. At the conclusion of the service the ministers and others lunched together, Mr. S. Magill, vice-chairman of the Larne Urban Council, presiding. After the toast of "The King," the Chairman proposed "The Newly-Ordained Minister," and the Rev. J. Kennedy proposed "The Congregation of Raloo." Mr. M'Cleery took the arts course in the University of Glasgow for four sessions, and studied theology in the Free Church College, Glasgow, for four sessions, having as professors George Adam Smith, A. B. Bruce, Dr. Candlish, Henry Drummond, and Dr. Lindsay.

South Shields.—On Wednesday, March 4, a Sale of Work was opened by Mrs. Baxter Ellis, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Church, the object being a fund for cleaning and redecorating the church. The Mayor (Councillor J. Grant) presided. The vote of thanks was moved by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, and seconded by the Rev. F. Wood, of Sunderland.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE hope to publish next week another of Dr. J. H. Poynting's scientific articles, on the subject of "The Pressure of Light."

REPORTS of the meetings of the Midland Christian Union, the Manchester District Association, and other societies occupy so much space in our present issue that we must hold over the report of the Mansford-street Church and Mission until next week.

THE annual meeting of the London Sunday School Society was held at Essex Hall on Saturday week, under the presidency of the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, when in addition to the committee's report, the appointed visitor for the year, Mr. Frank Talbot, gave a very satisfactory account of the work of the various schools. The officers and the committee were then appointed, with Mr. John Harrison as president, and addresses on the subject of Guilds and Clubs connected with Sunday-schools were given by the Revs. R. H. Greaves and J. H. Wicksteed.

MOST welcome news of the continued great success of the Hibbert Journal reaches us. A third impression of the second number is in the press, and of the first number three editions were called for within a month of publication. The matter was then distributed, and it is now being re-set for a fourth edition.

WE understand that the new volumes which Mr. Charles Booth and his staff of helpers have had in preparation for five years past in continuation of his great work on "Life and Labour in London" will be published on Tuesday next by Messrs. Macmillan under the general subtitle "Religious Influences." Six of the volumes consist of detailed description of the organisation and results of religious and philanthropic effort in the various districts of the metropolis, while the seventh reviews the general questions raised during the inquiry, a chapter or section being devoted to each important denomination or movement. Mr. Booth attempts to measure the value not only of the work of the various Churches but also of other social and philanthropic influences, including those of local government and police; and he has obtained masses of information on housing and health, amusements and habits, prostitution and crime, marriage and thrift. Many novel and interesting suggestions are made, and no doubt some comments on denominational and philanthropic work will arouse controversy. Special information has been obtained from about 1,450 clergymen, ministers, and missionaries, and some 350 schoolmasters and charitable workers; and the seven volumes contain in addition to sketch plans twenty large scale maps in which each street is coloured according to the social condition of the inhabitants.

DR. BRADLEY, who had been Dean of Westminster for twenty-one years, having succeeded Dean Stanley in 1881, and retired after the Coronation, passed away on Friday week, being in his eighty-second year. Educated at Rugby under Dr. Arnold, and at University College, Oxford, he became himself a great schoolmaster. He was at Rugby for twelve years under Arnold's successor, and in 1858 was appointed head-master of Marlborough. In 1870 he returned to Oxford as Master of his old college, and remained there till his appointment to the deanery. At Marlborough he had great influence. Tennyson sent his son there, saying, "I am sending him not to Marlborough, but to Bradley." For Westminster he did a great work of a practical kind, in restoring its shattered finances. His successor, Dean Armitage Robinson, preaching last Sunday in the Abbey, spoke affectionately of his venerable form as embodying the very spirit of the place, and added:—

It was his great age which had mediævalised his appearance, for no man was less mediæval or ecclesiastical in mind. He cared far more for history and literature than he cared for theology and ceremonial. He was no religious controversialist like his famous predecessor, whose banner was in every fight; but he continued in a peaceful way the liberal traditions of Dean Stanley. He was no less eager in the study of the Church and its monuments, and by their accurate historical investigations he and his family have laid us under a perpetual obligation.

The Bishop of Worcester was the preacher at the evening service in the Abbey, and paid a warm tribute to the late Dean as a scholar, a gentleman, and a Christian.

Those who knew him in later days (the Bishop said)—retiring, devout, tender—would not have associated with him strong authoritativeness or vehement action; but the gentle, retiring old age which faded into the peace and rest of God—where we commend him to His love and mercy—was the crown of an earlier manhood which had been to a remarkable degree strenuous and commanding—for he was one of the greatest of the schoolmasters of the last generation who inherited the traditions of Arnold.

The funeral was on Tuesday, in the Abbey.

The Congregational Union has suffered a great loss in the death of its secretary, the Rev. W. J. Woods. He had been in failing health for some time, but it was not supposed he was so near his end. Although he had sent in his resignation, he was carrying on the duties of his office until his successor had been appointed. Whoever now succeeds him will find the difficulties greatly increased by the impossibility of consulting one who had the threads of many important matters and negotiations in his hands. Mr. Woods, although not a great secretary like his predecessor, Mr. Hannay, had served the Congregational Churches faithfully and well, and if there were impatient spirits who clamoured for a stronger lead they too will acknowledge the zeal and ability which he always displayed. It is to be feared that the burdens of office, together with the hostile criticism which actually suggested his removal, had much to do with the shattering of his health. The reins were in his hands at a troubled time, and he did not find it easy to make the old and the new Congregationalism pull together. We are glad to think of him in his younger days, when, the son of a minister, he and his more celebrated friend, "J. B.," went forth from the same church in Leicester to enter as students at New College. Of a bright, sunny disposition, he won for himself many friends, and both as a preacher and a pastor made a considerable mark. His loss will be widely and deeply felt.

THE late Dr. Parker's presidential address to the Free Church Federation, read at the Brighton meetings by Principal Vaughan Pryce, was a painful business for all concerned—distressing to his best friends, and a cruelty to his reputation. It not only showed signs of failing powers, but in attempting to deal with such a subject as the "Higher Criticism" Dr. Parker was as much off his own lines as Harnack would be in discussing Japanese art or the English novel. To say that it was an address totally unworthy of the importance of the subject would be a very mild judgment. It is quite clear that Dr. Parker knew very little about the matter—no more than the ordinary pulpiteer of fifty years ago knew about the geology against which he railed. That the feeble witticisms of the address should have provoked the audience to merriment was not the least painful feature of the occasion. One would have thought that more respect for the dead prophet would have preserved a decent silence. Dr. Parker's friends would have done well to have suppressed his address. Principal Pryce, who does know something of the Higher Criticism, must have had many a twinge as he read on. Why did he not judiciously mislay the manuscript?

At a recent gathering of Sunday-school teachers at Douglas a Wesleyan minister in a paper on the Reform of the Sunday-school made some interesting suggestions. "Young People's Institute" was preferred to the name Sunday-school; more attention should be paid to singing; a teaching expert should be engaged to train the teachers; attention should be paid to doctrinal teaching by means of the Catechism; reading-rooms and gymnasia should be established in connection with each school.

The University of Edinburgh has offered the honorary degree of D.D. to the Rev. John Shaw Banks, President of the Wesleyan Conference. An enthusiastic disciple recently wrote of him: "In modern theological literature Mr. Banks seems to read everything and to remember everything."

An experiment is being made in municipal trading at Catania in Sicily, of a kind scarcely thought about by our most advanced municipalities in England. A well-equipped modern bakery was purchased last December, and additional bakehouses are being erected; at present one-fourth of the demand for bread is satisfied by them; and it is expected that before long the whole supply will come from the municipality. Those who carried on the trade previously act as agents for distribution of the bread and receive a small commission. The advantages already realised by the public are a small decrease in the price and the abolition of adulteration; while the work is done under more healthy conditions, and wages are higher than formerly. If these advantages prove to be permanent and increasing, without any money loss to the city, it is probable that the system may be adopted in many places in Italy. With the citizens as owners of their own bakeries and regulating the supply of the most necessary articles of food, it might be found more difficult for great capitalists to gain profit by manipulating the supply of grain. Speculators in the necessary food of the people, from whom Italy has severely suffered in quite recent times, would probably hesitate if they had the representatives of the citizens actually engaged in the trade on behalf of the citizens, in direct opposition to their selfish operations.

How few are our real wants! and how easy is it to satisfy them! Our imaginary ones are boundless and insatiable.

THE EDUCATION ACT.

SPECIAL REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

The Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers and Congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire have issued a report on the steps to be taken by the managers of British schools and friends of a truly National Education, under the Education Act, and managers of any schools connected with congregations in the Roll of the Assembly are invited to apply to the secretary, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, The Parsonage, Gee-cross, Hyde, for advice in case of difficulties in the working of the Act.

The Assembly at its last meeting condemned the Education Bill, which, with certain amendments, has since become law. Those amendments, the present report declares, left the Bill subject to the same unfavourable verdict. The whole animus of the Act is condemned as denominational, the purpose of its authors evidently being to aggrandise the denominational and to undermine, if not to destroy, the public and national system of Elementary Education. Under the present Board of Education, the Act is being worked to the same end, "with the ecclesiastical rapacity which the Bishop of Hereford so truly characterised in his courageous speech in the House of Lords."

"It is not surprising that, in these circumstances, two movements have sprung up, with great power behind them, among the Nonconformists—the traditional and convinced opponents of denominationalism supported by public funds. The one movement is the refusal to pay rates for denominational schools, the other gives a new access of strength to the cause of disestablishment. The latter is natural and justifiable. The successful campaign in Parliament of the representatives of the Church of England militant for rates for "wear and tear," for rents of teachers' houses, for endowments, and school fees, to relieve them of the only charge left to be met by the managers of their schools, that for up-keep of the school buildings, has convinced the Nonconformists that they have to fight over again the battle against a virtual church rate, and has done more to unite them for an onslaught against the Church establishment than any event in recent years. The fall of the Church, as established, is thus brought perceptibly nearer.

"But it is questionable whether the refusal to pay rates, the programme, as it is called, of 'passive resistance,' is justified or wise. The law of the land, under a constitutional government like that of England, is no tyrant's decree. Its essence is that it is the rule of the majority, and the minority for the time being must obey the rule of the majority, unless orderly government is to cease. But while it obeys it, it must set itself to become in its turn the majority, when its highest interest will be served by its having previously set an example of obedience to law. It will the more readily exact the same obedience, when the time comes for laws of its own making. Where reform ceases, revolution begins. But where reform is possible by constitutional means, no other weapon should be used. To use any such weapon is to render unstable the future reign of the reformers themselves, and to substitute faction fights for the peaceful and orderly rule of the people. The true policy for reformers in a constitutional country is to observe the law, with a firm determination to amend it, where it is unjust, and then to secure the same obedience to the amended law as they rendered to it unamended."

The Committee therefore oppose the organised passive resistance programme and urge determined effort to amend the Act. They are confident that the people will ere long demand "that schools supported entirely by their rates and taxes shall no longer be managed by denominations, but that the denominational education, in whose interests the Act was passed, shall give place to a system controlled by representatives of the people to the complete exclusion of clerical and ecclesiastical domination."

Meanwhile the friends of education must make the best use they can of the Act. Advice to make the Act unworkable is condemned as mischievous. The Board of Education are doing what they can to induce Voluntary schools to remain "non-provided," and by every means available to further Voluntaryism throughout the country. The Committee, believing in popular control, advise that the Associations of British schools should be wound up on "the appointed day," and that the managers of British schools should transfer their schools to the local authorities.

"But possibly there are those among supporters of British schools to whom their undenominational teaching and management are dear, and who fear their transfer to local authorities with the insufficient protection of the Cowper-Temple Clause. The answer is, 'Follow principle without fear.' Trust in the people is a principle with which one cannot play fast and loose, going with it as far as suits one's purpose, and no further. 'Hand over your schools to the Local Authority,' say the Committee, 'and take your part in making that Authority such as to deserve your trust.' Indeed, this popular control of education is vital. What is wanted most is popular interest in education, and it can only come from popular responsibility for it."

These are some of the chief points in the report, which we regret that we cannot print here entire. We strongly recommend all who have a practical interest in the matter to procure from Mr. Dowson a copy of the report.

The following are its concluding sentences:—

"The Committee have confined themselves to the question of Elementary Education, as that on which the principles of the Assembly have a special bearing, and do not propose to deal with Secondary Education under the Act.

"They conclude with an earnest appeal to the members of the Assembly to take a lead in their various localities in making a use of the new Act that shall do much to confound the intentions of its authors, and to prepare the way for the time when denominationalism shall disappear, to make way for an education truly national."

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE thirty-sixth annual meeting of the Union was held at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, on Tuesday, March 10. The President, Mr. W. BYNG KENRICK, took the chair at the business meeting at 11 o'clock. There were present the ministers of Old Meeting, Newhall-hill, Fazeley-street, Coseley, Cradley, Dudley, Evesham, Kingswood, Lye, Kidderminster, Shrewsbury, Stourbridge, Stratford-on-Avon, Tamworth, Walsall, West Bromwich, Whitchurch, and Wolverhampton; and delegates from the same, except Cradley, Kidderminster, West Bromwich, and Whitchurch, and from Small Heath in addition; 77 per cent. of the ministers of the district and 47 per cent. of the appointed delegates were present. Many of the delegates absent from the business meeting were, however, present at the conference in the afternoon and the service in the evening.

The Treasurer, Dr. RUSSELL, in presenting his report, asked the members not to be misled by the fact that they had £1,180 accumulated capital, because the greater part of this sum was ear-marked for certain purposes. They had at the present time only £200 capital available to meet excess of expenditure over income. It was true that last year's accounts showed that the income exceeded the expenditure by £46. This was, however, due to the receipt of £160 in special donations (including £100 from Mrs. Nettlefold), which could not be reckoned on for the future. Apart from these special donations, the expenditure of the Union exceeded the income by £115, so that, with the capital available, they could not, under present conditions and the most favourable circumstances, continue the work they were doing for more than three years. After that, unless they had largely increased sources of income, they would have to cut down their grants to the aided churches by £100, by almost one-third. It was true that the amount of subscriptions received in 1902, £156 (and £63 from congregational collections), was greater than it had been for many years; but the amount was altogether inadequate for the work of the Union. He had during the year sent special appeals to between 200 and 300 members of the various churches, but as a result had only received £3.

The Secretary, the Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH, read the Committee's report.

After mentioning that the majority of the pulpits in the Midlands are now filled, and welcoming the newly settled ministers, the report states that during last year the Union arranged a series of special week-night services at nine of the churches, and that the services had been generally successful and helpful. The assistance given by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the services of the visitor and the members of the Lay Preachers' Association are gratefully acknowledged. It is stated that a loan of £250 free of interest has been made to the Wolverhampton congregation, to help them in putting up their recently opened temporary church, and the general state of the finances of the union is commented upon on lines similar to those of the Treasurer's statement.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, said he thought that the fact that all the pulpits in the district were now occupied was a subject for legitimate congratulation. But to fill churches was more difficult than to fill pulpits. There was need of more co-operation among the churches, and he appealed to the members present for more co-operation. One of the chief aids to increasing the congregations was complete and thorough earnestness on the part of the leading members. Hard work was necessary to inspire earnestness and enthusiasm, and this from within would accomplish far more than any committee could do from the outside. A second means by which congregations would be increased was by finding satisfactory work for the new members to do. The older members of the congregations should by sacrifice of their time help the minister in organising such work. So many found it difficult to throw off a natural prejudice against co-operating with anybody, but such work would materially assist in strengthening the congregations.

His final comment on the year's work he expressed with some diffidence. He had not been long connected with the Union, and had no adequate knowledge of its past history. In no way was he in a position to dictate a course of action to its members; but he offered suggestions for consideration and comment in subsequent discussion. His views were, he knew, not in accord with those of all the members, but all could agree to differ with good temper. What the Union wanted was, he thought, a definite policy. He did not know how it had been in the past, but no doubt the Union's work in the past had been on definite lines, and it had received adequate support. But to-day there was not adequate support. Could they evolve a policy which would command adequate support? (1) Equality of self-sacrifice on the part of ministers and laymen was necessary. From his own experience he knew, and from his reading of the history of the Unitarian movement from the beginning he found a fine record of self-sacrifice on the part of the ministers. They had won intellectual freedom, but they had bought it at a very great price. The members of the congregations had also purchased this freedom at a great price in the past. But he rather doubted whether as a result of this greater freedom, won at such cost, self-sacrifice on the part of the members of the congregations had not now diminished. It was the laymen who made up the congregations, and, speaking as a layman, he thought they ought to be prepared to make greater sacrifices. If they, the laymen, were in earnest about their churches, and felt strongly about their religious principles, they ought to make this sacrifice, and it would be well with the congregations. (2) He advocated more co-operation among the churches. But co-operation means compromise to a certain extent. No body of men could do any work together without compromise, and the Union would not go far unless they agreed to co-operate on the lines of compromise in non-essentials. They needed greater union among the churches; more interchange of thought and more visiting of different churches by the laymen. He knew this visiting was difficult to arrange; they were all business men, and where could they find a leisured man within thirty miles of Birmingham? But he thought the sacrifice of convenience and the time necessary for such visiting was a sacrifice they were called upon to make.

The resolution having been seconded by Mr. H. E. PERRY (Wolverhampton), there followed a full, very helpful and inspiriting discussion in which the Secretary, the Revs. J. C. Street, J. Wrigley, J. B. Higham, G. St. Clair, A. H. Shelley, and Messrs. Evers, Mather, A. W. Worthington, Fletcher, and A. Homer took part. The general tone of the discussion was one of confidence, resolution and good cheer. Had an enemy been present he might have said it was optimistic, but all friends were confident it was of good omen.

The SECRETARY pointed out that the ordinary income of the Union had never been sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditure; they had always needed special subscriptions, sometimes to the amount of £200, to balance accounts. They did not believe the Union was coming to an end. It had got to go on, and it was going to go on. Were they going to begin again de novo he should advocate that no church not self-supporting should have a minister of its own, but that an itinerant ministry should be founded.

Mr. WORTHINGTON said that though George Dawson spoke of the Union's balance-sheet as a petty cash account, it did good work. Indeed he knew few cases in which a little money went so far and did so much good. They ought not to think of what they did for their churches as self-sacrifice; but should have joy in the doing.

The Rev. J. C. STREET was not dismayed at the Union's financial position, but was convinced there were sources of income not yet tapped. If they showed they were ready to do good work they would get the money.

The motion for the adoption, printing and distribution of the reports was carried, and on the proposition of General PHELPS, seconded by Mr. E. HILL, the officers and committee were appointed for the ensuing year, with Mr. W. Byng Kenrick as president, Dr. J. W. Russell treasurer, and the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth hon. secretary.

The meeting then adjourned to the Great Western Hotel, where ministers and delegates were entertained to luncheon by the Old Meeting congregation. After the toast of "The King," proposed from the chair (Rev. J. Wood), Mr. Geoffrey New proposed "Our Hosts," and Mr. Wigley, senior warden, responded.

THE CONFERENCE: MR. WOOD'S PROPOSALS.

In the afternoon a Conference was held, when an address was given by the Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, touching first on the coming centenary of Priestley's death, and as a fitting Birmingham commemoration proposing the foundation of a Priestley Theological Lectureship, and the raising of a further special fund to strengthen the work of the Union in support of the churches of the district.

The Priestley Centenary.

On Monday, Feb. 6, 1804, Mr. Wood said, there died at Northumberland, near Philadelphia, a man whose name stands first in point of time, and certainly among the first in point of eminence, amongst the distinguished men who have given lustre and renown to Birmingham.

Birmingham, indeed, was guilty of martyring him almost as much as if it had burned him at the stake, for Joseph Priestley never really recovered from the cruel work of the Birmingham riots. But it ought also to be said that Birmingham has never ceased to be ashamed of that act of wicked persecution and senseless vandalism, and has never ceased to honour the man whom it then drove into exile.

But it was not Birmingham alone that was to blame; the scientific world of London shared in the disgrace; and the men of science also had since made ample amends, as witness the glowing eulogy pronounced by Professor Huxley at the unveiling of the Priestley statue in Birmingham.

The centenary of Priestley's death ought not to be allowed to pass without due commemoration, least of all in Birmingham. A new biography was to be published in London, and doubtless Leeds and Warrington would not be behindhand in some public tribute to the man who had adorned their annals; but it was chiefly with Birmingham that his name was associated, where he had lived and ministered for eleven years, his longest pastorate and his longest residence in any one place. In Birmingham especially should the centenary be commemorated, and by men of his own household of faith, bound to him by everlasting ties of gratitude for his religious teaching, his moral courage, his uncompromising adhesion to truth as he saw it, his example of untiring labour for the public good, his service to the churches. It would not be to their credit if they let the occasion pass, so that the enemy might say of them, "Now there arose a new generation which knew not Joseph Priestley." They must make the year 1904 memorable by doing honour in some decisive way to Priestley's name and Priestley's work.

A Priestley Theological Lectureship.

And a distinct call came to them from the manifest desire on the part of large numbers of thoughtful people for light and knowledge on religious subjects. That had been proved in a striking way by the keen interest shown in the weekly mid-day theological lectures given in Birmingham by the Bishop of Worcester before Christmas, and in the large numbers, especially of young men, who came to the course of Sunday evening lectures he himself had given, taking up the discussion of those questions in reply to the bishop. Their mission was very largely to the unsettled portion of the religious public, which had broken away from old moorings, and had not yet found a haven of rest. It was for them to show that amid all the changes of thought and the new knowledge of the present day, religion was founded upon a rock, and there were things of which men could be sure. What he suggested, in the first instance, in connection with the Priestley commemoration was the founding of a Theological Lectureship which might do for their immediate district what Professor Carpenter had recently been doing to so much advantage in some of the larger towns throughout the country. It was a great work, and largely their mission, to teach men to distinguish between the framework of probable or improbable opinions and the essence of spiritual faith, i.e., the great things of God and the soul, and questions of morality and devotion which are independent of changing opinions on Biblical questions, doubtful miracles, varying historical theories and philosophical systems. For such work they must have men specially qualified by learning, by training, by intellectual power and religious sympathy to deal with the problems of troubled souls. The men could be found, but they must also find the necessary funds, and his suggestion was that they raise £2,500 for the endowment of such a Theological Lectureship, which would be sufficient to provide three courses of lectures annually in various parts of the district. No work would be more congenial to Priestley's mind, for dearly as he loved science it was to religion that he gave the best affection of his heart and the best service of his life. They could not honour him in a better way than by founding such a lectureship to bear his name.

The Welfare of the Churches.

A further suggestion he made arose out of what they must regard as somewhat of a crisis in the affairs of the Midland Christian Union, a crisis which every consideration of prudence, honesty, fidelity to the cause, responsibility for others' welfare, brotherhood and fellowship compelled them to face. It was clear from their treasurer's statement that unless they gave the Union a great lift it would in a few years be, he would not say extinct, but in a very desperate condition. In the work they had already undertaken they were pledged to an expenditure far in excess of their income. It was deliberately done, for they felt it better to draw on their little capital than to allow the new movements to die down for want of help; but unless they obtained in some way an increase of income, in three years they would have spent all their available capital, and would have to cut down their grants by £110 a year. It ought not to tax their resources too much to raise an additional income of £110, but the difficulty hitherto had been to persuade their laymen to take sufficient interest in the work of the Union. It was not niggardliness on their part, as could be seen from the generous way in which their two missions were supported. The fact was that the feeling was very prevalent that it was not worth while to go on supporting feeble churches which for the past twenty-five years had made no progress. His own feeling was that these churches had never had a fair chance. If better trained men and ampler means had been placed at their disposal the whole appearance and effectiveness of the churches would have been greatly improved, and they could hardly have failed to make real progress. It would not be sufficient for them to raise an additional £120, merely to maintain the work at its present level. Many would agree with him that to do so was almost useless. It was not creditable that they should have ministers in any of their churches, for which the Union was partly responsible, with stipends of £100 or £110 a year. It was not fair to ask an educated man to accept such a position. Undoubtedly they ought to see that no minister in their midst had a stipend less than £150 a year. What they wanted for the next few years was therefore not an additional £120 but £250 a year, to enable them wisely and with some prospect of success to carry on their work.

These then were the two proposals, the theological lectureship, and the enlargement of the work of the Union in the assistance of struggling churches. What he suggested was a Priestley fund, to be devoted to these two objects, and they ought not to contemplate raising less than £5,000. He reminded them of what had been done in the Manchester district and elsewhere. Those who objected to a bazaar could make their donations direct, but a bazaar enlisted the help of large numbers, and every congregation in the Union should have a stall, or if any did not feel strong enough for that, one should join with another to provide a stall. If their churches were to prosper they must realise that it could only be through self-sacrifice. If they were bent on bringing blessing to others they would find their own life strengthened and enriched.

The President desired to associate himself with many of the opinions expressed in the admirable address to which they had just listened. They had great reason to thank Mr. Wood. He certainly thought they ought to give the various aided churches a fair chance of being successful. And having done that, they ought to see that they got results; he did not mean financial results only; the amount of subscriptions cannot be the one and only criterion of a congregation's success. They should look also for a large increase of membership, and for the general atmosphere of enthusiasm and earnestness which should be looked for in every church. All these the aided churches might perhaps obtain, if the Union had the opportunity of being a little generous for a few years. He moved a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Wood for his admirable paper, and proposed that a committee be appointed consisting of the minister and three delegates from each congregation, and the officers of the Union ex-officio, to discuss and report on the proposals made.

Mr. Herbert New seconded. The paper read added another debt of gratitude to the many the Union owed Mr. Wood for help in its work. He had a great admiration for Joseph Priestley, and thought they would be wanting in duty if they did not celebrate the centenary of his death.

Rev. George St. Clair thought they ought to agree to Mr. Wood's proposals from beginning to end. The Unitarian body, if any, ought to be propagandist.

Rev. J. C. Street thought it was a small thing for that district to raise £5,000. The N.E. Lancashire Association had raised five times £5,000, had built new churches, many of them now self-supporting, and new spirit and life had been put into the district. Manchester had asked for £10,000 and had got £12,000, which was now spent, and was now bracing itself up to a new effort for more. The suggestion for a theological lectureship did not appeal to him. What he cared most about was the proposal to secure ample means for the aided churches.

Mr. Geoffrey New said Evesham had not yet decided about the bazaar, but it had decided to support the movement. He suggested that the paper should be printed and circulated among the congregations of the Union that all might understand clearly what the proposals were, and the reasons for making them.

The Secretary, after consultation announced that Mr. Wood would allow the paper to be printed at the cost of the Union.

Mr. Hopkins, the Revs. C. D. Badland, J. B. Higham, J. H. Matthews, and delegates from Stourbridge and Wolverhampton continued the discussion, and the motion was unanimously carried.

MR. STOPFORD BROOKE'S SERMON.

After tea in the schoolroom, evening service was held in the Old Meeting Church, which was filled, except for a cross bench here and there. The Rev. Stopford A. Brooke was the special preacher, the first part of the service being conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood. The text of Mr. Brooke's sermon was the vision of the dry bones restored to life, from Ezekiel 37. It is only an imperfect summary of part of a great sermon that your reporter can give, for it was not long before, under the preacher's spell instead of reporting, he was seeing marvellous visions and receiving the inspiration of a prophet spirit of to-day speaking of the prophet spirit in all history. The vision, the preacher said, was the vision of a people's resurrection. When was it seen? It was seen in the centre of sadness, when news came to the mystic prophet on the Euphrates after the first overthrow of the kingdom of Judah, that Jerusalem was desolate as a widow's heart, her temple burned, her people slain. When all was lost, he saw the victorious vision. That is the prophet spirit. Knowing the permanence of good, and rejoicing in the sunshine of the future, he looks beyond the present and loses its pain. Only the evil has perished, the good survives. Beyond this desolation there is a new world; new life, new work, and sunshine and joy. Such is the temper of a prophet, immortal and immortalising, and when this temper spreads from him to the heart of a whole people, that people, though at the last gasp, are saved. Though others despair when a great cause seems defeated, the prophet has the common sense which comes from faith in God. He discerns between the evil which must pass away and the good which is eternal. That which comes to ruin in the fall of any cause is the false and selfish in it. But that which is true and loving in it cannot be lost. The hour of seeming death is the hour of resurrection. Of the application of the life-giving power of this prophet spirit to the temper of the nations of Christendom to-day, and to the desolate places of the inner life of every individual, no condensation can be given; but hearers of the sermon will remember a wonderful passage introducing the former, and beginning: — There are spiritual captivities for nations. Other armies than those of emperors and kings attack the soul of a people. The king of them all is Covetousness, and his queen is the Pride of Life. Their daughters are many — Corruption, Cruelty, Luxury, Lust, Idleness, Satiety, Hopelessness, Violence, &c. — a host of dreadful creatures who feed on the vitals of a people. To slay their father is to slay them all. To let him live in power is to scatter and blast the nation.

Lastly, Mr. Brooke said:—The vision symbolises a greater resurrection than either that of a dead nation, a dead soul, or a dead life. It symbolises the spiritual resurrection of all Humanity. There have been many partial representations of that great close which have occurred in the course of history. And the greatest as yet was that which followed on the spiritual resurrection of Jesus. The world was covered then with dry bones of dead religions, dead philosophies, dead ideas of national life, dead art, and dead literature. But when the new spiritual ideal came upon them, accompanied by a lovely, simple, and loving human life, bringing with it healing to the sick in soul, rest to the troubled and weary mind, fatherhood to the poor and sorrowful, forgiveness to the sin-laden, a new life to women, communion with God to a godless world, infinite hopes to the neglected and the indifferent—a life in which the ideal took actual form, and a death which was salvation and triumph—then religion, philosophy, national life, art, literature, knowledge, social and political ideas, time after time heard the winds of the spirit, gathered their bones into life, felt their breast heave with the new airs, and their heart beat, leaped to their feet, an exceeding great army risen from the dead. It was a Resurrection for the whole known world.

And though that wondrous new world died again, as Israel died, yet many such resurrections have come since then upon humanity, in whose dawns it has been bliss to be alive, and when to be young was very heaven. Many more there will be, from century to century, as the great world moves on from revelation to revelation. I believe we are not far from one in England. I have watched it slowly growing; I have heard, afar off, the sighing of the Wind of the Spirit. I shall not see it, but many of you will. I shall be glad of it when I hear thereof; but you, who will pass through all the trouble, will be more glad than I, who have watched its travail, but will not share its rapture. But however many there be, each will do its progressive work, and set humanity onward to that great close when, out of the accumulated value of the whole series of revelations, each of which will cause a resurrection of mankind, the final resurrection of all humanity shall emerge in unbelievable glory, and all the dead shall have become alive and all the lost be found. There shall be then a great cry of rejoicing in the vast communities of the spiritual universe—triumph and love in the heart of all the just, when the Father shall fall on the neck of Humanity, his recovered Son, and bid him welcome to his home; and the word which the risen Christ shall say will be no more only—"I have risen," but "my Humanity whom so long I have carried on my heart has risen with me."

THE heart grows rich in giving;
All its wealth is living grain!
Seeds which mildew in the garner,
Scattered, fill with gold the plain.
Is thy burden hard and heavy?
Do thy steps drag wearily?
Help to bear thy brother's burden;
God will bear both it and thee.

DR. MARTINEAU ON DOCTRINE AND UNITY IN WORSHIP.

SIR,—While looking over some old family letters yesterday, I found one dated March 1, 1852, from Dr. Martineau to my uncle, the late Rev. Joseph Crompton, part of which seems to me so relevant to the recent correspondence in your columns that I transcribe the passage. My uncle had just resigned his position as minister at the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, and, with some friends who seceded, was about to form a new congregation. After some comparison between Mr. Crompton's position and that of his brother-in-law, George Dawson, of Birmingham, Dr. Martineau continues:—

"The notion of the spiritual neutrality of dogma is the heirloom of our churches and of no other; and by the very act of announcing it a man comes over to us; and it is vain trifling to attempt to class himself apart. The most dogmatic Unitarian living would assent to this principle in any form in which you could state it. It is a mere question of degree—how much stress should be laid upon the points at issue between Trinitarians and others. All of us agree that they are not so important that salvation hinges on them, or the possibility of a character at one with God. No one of us denies that they are not so unimportant as to deserve entire neglect; the truth is always a momentous reality, and I am persuaded that you despise, not less than myself, the sceptical cant which in our days affects to suppose that there is equal truth in all religious or unreligious doctrine. . . .

"The old Presbyterian principle is surely misrepresented altogether, if it is interpreted to mean that people of various religious persuasion on prominent doctrines ought to be simultaneously combined in the same worship. Such an idea is so manifestly chimerical that it would be vain to search for any sanction to it among our sensible forefathers. Their principle was that, in the constitution of a Church, there ought to be no hindrance to the successive development of different doctrines, as one generation insensibly modified the faith of its predecessor. But doubtless the body of members, for the time being, must, as a condition of joint action and feeling, have a very prevailing sympathy with each other in their distinctive theological convictions; and must be prepared, in all simplicity and earnestness, to state and defend these before the world; only reverencing the liberty of their successors, and not binding their own doctrines in perpetuity on the society. . . . It is the binding of creeds on the future operations of thought—the attempt to regulate the minister's preaching beforehand, and deny him the privilege of freely giving the results of his meditations, whatever they may be—the determination to make the continuity of a society contingent on sameness of opinion, this it is that violates freedom. But a simple Declaration of present belief, as a fact, and a fact of sacred importance to its living members, is, in my judgment, not only innocent, but an indispensable result, on fitting occasion, of any earnestness and depth of faith. Far from discouraging it by disparaging accusations of narrowness, I should be disposed to treat it with a grave reverence, as a natural expression of veracity and piety."

The words italicised are so marked in the original letter. S. S. Dowson.

Geldeston, March 6.

"BRITAIN FOR THE BRITISH."

Sir,—Two personal questions, and these only, induce me to reply to Mr. Robinson's last letter.

1. He asks: "What does Mr. Rawlings mean by 'subtle suggestions of another kind' in reference to page 14? The parallel which follows in Mr. Rawlings's letter deliberately infers that Mr. Blatchford suggested theft."

There are two points in one here. First, as to the parallel. Mr. Robinson has entirely misunderstood my application of it. Its purpose was solely to illustrate the difference between accepting a proposition on the one hand for the sake of argument, and on the other hand for guidance in conduct. I introduced it with the words, "No, the case is by no means one of mere argument." These words and the parallel were part of a reply to Mr. Robinson, not to Mr. Blatchford, who, in my opinion, appeals to "selfishness" for other ends than refutation of opponents. To be sure, as Mr. Robinson urges, he often appeals to nobler motives. But the conclusion is not that he does not mean what he says (as so many contend with regard to parts of the Bible), but that he is inconsistent—the reason being, as I think, that, in his anxiety to stir up feeling, he becomes lax as to the means.

With regard to the "subtle suggestions," I must, after all, quote at least a few lines:—

> Who buys all these expensive luxuries? They are not for you, nor for your wife, nor for your children. You do not live in a £200 flat. Your floor is not covered with a £50 Persian rug; your wife does not wear diamond rings, nor . . . . She does not sit in the stalls at the opera, nor ride home in a brougham, nor sup on oysters and champagne, nor go, during the heat of summer, on a yachting cruise in the Mediterranean. And is not your wife as much to you as the duchess to the duke?

Now the sentences I have italicised are the only indication of the kind of moral Mr. Blatchford wishes to suggest by his picture of luxury. And, be it remembered, this is the closing passage of an appeal to "selfishness." In my opinion, it is at least "subtly suggestive" of a base ideal, quite other than that of "plain living and high thinking," and I have heard working-men defend the passage in that sense.

2. When I wrote of exciting "violent and subversive instincts," I, of course, made no reference to any words of Mr. Robinson's. I was speaking of Mr. Blatchford's doctrine of the relation between morals and wages. And even his intentions I did not impugn. I was thinking of the natural effect of his doctrine on the minds of those who may accept it, and especially on the more ignorant and revengeful. The word "subversive" has a recognised meaning appropriate to such a case.

In the rest of Mr. Robinson's letter there is little to which I need refer. I agree with him that it is well to speak of land, capital and labour (instead of the personal terms), so far as may be necessary for brevity of language and clearness of thought. But, after all, this is only a means to an end, the end being a knowledge of the rights and duties of persons.

The last three paragraphs of the letter deal with classes which I have only referred to incidentally. I have not discussed the rights of landlords and capitalists whose work is voluntary, but only of those whose work is, or has been, a recognised part of industrial life—e.g., that of the active employer. With regard to the former, I confine myself to saying that their claims are, in my opinion, more difficult to determine than those of the latter, that Mr. Robinson's view with regard to them is too faintly sketched to be arguable, but that I should not dream of expecting justice for them from men who bungle so badly as Mr. Blatchford in plain economic questions, for I must still maintain (a point which Mr. Robinson still disputes) that Mr. Blatchford's recognition of the obvious rights of the worker-capitalist (i.e., the capitalist as active employer) is altogether perfunctory, and has little influence upon his practical conclusions.

For the rest I am glad to find that there is so much in my last letter which Mr. Robinson is able to pass over in silence, and I appreciate warmly the courtesy and fairness which have been combined in his letters with earnestness.

H. Rawlings.

OBITUARY.

SAMUEL GREG RATHBONE.

The second and last surviving son of the sixth William Rathbone, of Liverpool, younger brother of the late William Rathbone, of Greenbank, Samuel Greg Rathbone, passed away on Friday week, at Bassenfell, near Keswick, where in failing health he had lived in retirement for some time.

Born in 1821, in Cornhill, Liverpool, he nobly maintained the high tradition of his family in public service of a remarkable order very modestly and most unselfishly rendered. With his brothers William and Philip he attended the Rev. John Brunner's school at Everton, and then entered the office of his father's firm. Save for eight years spent in China from 1843, in the interest of the firm, his life was devoted to Liverpool.

In 1862 he was elected without opposition a member of the Town Council, and was returned five times in all, unopposed, though a pronounced Liberal and a Unitarian. In 1873 he retired from the Council to give his whole strength to the work of the School Board, of which he then became a member, and without opposition was elected chairman, in succession to Christopher Bushell, the first chairman.

Of Mr. Rathbone's public work while in the Council the Liverpool Daily Post, in a leading article, speaks in these terms:—

> He was a calm, lucid, and emphatic speaker, of clear insight, always sound in his facts, always capable of irrefragable argument. His gifts of administration were also eminent. Mr. Samuel Rathbone addressed himself with zeal and assiduity, and also with impartiality, to whatever it was wise for the municipality to undertake. He impressed the force and weight of his character on local public affairs. His position, though always held unpretendingly as a matter of ordinary business, was dominant and unchallenged; and his labours at that time and those of like-minded men, alike in the Council and among the permanent order of things, did much to establish that better state of public affairs into which the local government of Liverpool has since, with few interruptions, progressed.

It was on the School Board that Mr. Rathbone's great work was done. With the utmost conscientiousness he gave himself to every detail of the work, and had a remarkable grasp of all the facts. Mr. Mundella once spoke of him as among the highest authorities on elementary education in England, and he served on the Royal Commission of 1881. His was the inspiring influence which for twenty years was dominant in Liverpool, in the working out of an extended and enlightened curriculum, in the establishment of the Pupil Teachers' College, which was, in the first instance, due entirely to his enthusiasm and his private liberality, and in the establishment of day industrial, and truant schools, in which Liverpool, prompted by the example of Mary Carpenter at Bristol, led the way. As to Mr. Rathbone's work as an educationist, we quote again from the Liverpool Daily Post:—

> A warm tribute must be paid to what is perhaps the most splendid fact of all—that wherever any requirement of the local education system fell short or was hampered for want of means that the School Board rate could not afford, there the personal munificence of Mr. Samuel Rathbone was poured forth, never wastefully or casually, but upon the best plans, with absolute assurance of utility, and with the certainty also of establishing precedents which could not but be abundantly valuable. Mr. Samuel Rathbone, while always unremittingly intent and serious, was in every relation and conjuncture of life one of the most delightful of men. He was in intercourse as charming as he was instructive and stimulating. The chivalry of his devotion to his brother William was touching and beautiful to behold. He was a great and a good man, and his greatness was the source of much goodness in our institutions, and probably in many characters ennobled by his fine example.

Mr. Rathbone, like his brother William, received in 1894 the honour of the Freedom of his native city. In 1891 he had retired from the chairmanship of the School Board, and two years later from the Board itself.

The funeral took place on Thursday, from Greenbank, the service, after private cremation, being held in the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, conducted by the Rev. John Watson, D.D., whose ministry during the latter years of his residence in Liverpool Mr. Rathbone had attended. The interment was in the Toxteth Cemetery.

MRS. WILSON.

Of failure of the heart's action at midnight on Sunday last, at her home at Moseley, near Birmingham, Mrs. Wilson, the widow of the late Rev. John Wilson, minister of the then Lawrence-street Domestic Mission, died. For some time past she had been ailing, but on Sunday seemed to be as well as usual. In earlier life, as Miss Harriet Martin, she had been Infant Schoolmistress of the Spicer-street Domestic Mission day-school, of which the late Rev. C. L. Corkran was manager. Marrying Mr. Wilson, who had accepted appointment as one of the missionaries of the Beaufort-street Domestic Mission in Liverpool, she went to that northern centre of beneficent activity. When her husband took up work in Birmingham she threw herself heartily into it, and for many years, in company with the late Miss Sara Russell, did an immense amount of good, endearing herself to the poor of the district. On the death of Mr. Wilson she was compelled to devote herself to the interests of her family. Her eldest son, Mr. John Wilson, is Private Secretary to the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, and has only just returned from South Africa; her second son was the late Rev. Alfred H. Wilson, who died a few years ago while minister of the Bell-street Domestic Mission, Marylebone; and her third son is Mr. H. G. Wilson, M.A., of Stoke-on-Trent, an Inspector of Schools and an occasional lay-preacher. One of her daughters is the wife of the Rev. F. Summers, and is thus actively engaged in the work at George's Row. In her last years Mrs. Wilson had been a member of the Old Meeting Church, Bristol-road. The interment was at the Old Cemetery, Birmingham, on Wednesday last, when the Rev. T. Pipe officiated.

THE REV. T. W. FRECKELTON.

THE following tribute from an old friend we are glad to publish as a supplement to the memorial notice in our issue of Feb. 21:—

I count it as one of the great blessings of my life that the late Thomas Wesley Freckelton was my close friend for nearly thirty years.

Of that friendship in its deepest currents it would be impossible for me now to speak, but it is only meet that I should thus pay a last sad tribute to the memory of one whom I regard as a great and noble man.

Those who have had the privilege of knowing him as their pastor know how beautifully he filled that place—how thoughtful, how gentle with those in trouble, how helpful to those in distress. And those who knew him as a preacher will have memories of burning words, always on the highest plane, often rising to an impassioned eloquence and full of prophetic insight. But the few—among whom I count myself—who knew him through and through, and had the high privilege of calling him their friend, have an inspiring and stimulating legacy left them in the knowledge of his manhood and the beauty of his life.

What he always set out to do and what he did was to keep his soul alive. No compromise, no faltering, no turning to the right or left, no counting the cost, no considerations of prudence, but straight on in the way he chalked out for himself. It was a hard way, and with that keen perception of his he never blinked its dangers or its difficulties, but there was no swerving from the path that he thought was the right one. He was just as sensitive to maintain his proud independence in matters of every-day life as in his thought and ministerial action, and through storm and stress, and often by the lowliest and holiest means, this he maintained.

As a companion he was delightful. By no means devoid of humour and full of rich experiences of life—the fervour and intensity of his nature poured itself out in fireside talk, and especially in rambles through the fields and the lanes. It was beautiful to see how responsive he was to nature in every phase—his delight in young animals, birds, the budding trees, his keen look out for phenomena—geologic or otherwise—all these things brought out the stores of his knowledge and the sweetness of his nature. They were accepted and gloried over as the constant revelations of the Great Father, and in them he found a constant and a great joy. To me also it is a great joy to have shared in his joys and to know by a loving message from him at the last that he treasured the memory of our friendship and the happy hours we have spent together.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"Nice People."

WE all know plenty of them, don't we? We generally choose what we consider "nice people" for our friends, and if two people become acquainted, and afterwards find one another what they consider "not nice," the acquaintanceship generally dies a sort of natural death. But, used in that sense, what qualities go to make up this "niceness" that we all like, all speak of in words of approval or praise, all feel a wish to have, and a wish that other people should feel that we have, and like and praise in us, as we like and praise it in others? If we were all to try to say exactly what we mean by that word "nice," there would be a very great variety of definitions, for most of us would describe it just a little differently from everyone else, but I think some of the qualities needed to make a "nice" person would appear in all the definitions. In the dictionary the word has a great many meanings, and some of them don't at all apply when we think of the word as we use it to describe people we like.

Now, let us see some of the qualities which our friends—men or women, boys or girls—must have, if we are to consider them "nice." Of course they must be honourable and truthful, and try to be faithful in discharging their duties, but the list of good qualities must not end there. Kindness, unselfishness, tact, brightness, and consideration for others all help, and are all necessary to make up a really "nice" character, and when we find such a combination in anyone we know, what pleasure it gives us to be in their company; how much better and brighter we feel for even the half an hour's intercourse with them!

You know how, when people get out of health and weak, the doctor sometimes gives them a tonic—something to strengthen them up again, and make them feel brighter and better. And you have noticed, on a foggy morning, with no sun visible, how everything looks grey and dull, and some people get quite depressed with it. Then, when the sun breaks through the mist, what a wonderful change seems to come over everything! The world looks quite a different place.

A really "nice" person is like a tonic to a sick man, or the sunshine bursting out on a foggy day; and to be a moral tonic, or spiritual sunshine, is to fill a place in the world, which we may well try with all our might to fill. Only we must remember those three necessary qualities—brightness, unselfishness, and consideration for the feelings of others.

I heard once of a very inconsiderate act that was done by some people, and a little girl seeing it, asked the question afterwards—"Would nice people have done such a thing?" Well, if all the people in the world who have ever done anything not "nice" in any way had, in consequence, to be described as "not nice people," I am afraid I could not have begun this column as I have done, for most of us—I might say all of us—have often failed in unselfishness, or tact, or consideration for others. But there are two causes of such failures—two causes of all the wrong-doing in the world, and it is very necessary to remember this when we ask, or would answer, such a question as was asked by that little girl.

> Evil is wrought by want of thought
> As well as want of heart.

I think those lines should help us in two ways. First, to be very charitable in our judgments of others, and remember that what we blame in them may have been done in pure thoughtlessness, and be very much regretted afterwards; for even the nicest and best people fail sometimes. And it should teach us also to be very careful in what we do ourselves, realising how we may hurt others as much by our "want of thought" as by our "want of heart."

How are our friends to know that our apparent unkindness or rudeness was not from a heartless wish on our part to be unkind? The only safe way is for us all to try to follow the advice given many years ago by Dr. Martineau in one of his sermons, "To judge the faults of others in their causes, and of our own in their effects." That will make us lenient and charitable in our thoughts of others, and more careful of our own conduct, and we shall see more clearly how very many "nice people" there are in the world, and it will help us to grow like them in their "niceness." O. M. RAWLINS.

EVERY man is conscious that he leads two lives—the one trivial and ordinary, the other sacred and recluse; one which he carries to society and the dinner-table, the other in which his youth and aspiration survive for him, and which is a confidence between himself and God. Both may be equally sincere, and there need be no contradiction between them, any more than in a healthy man between soul and body. If the higher life be real and earnest, its result, whether in literature or affairs, will be real and earnest too. But no man can produce great things who is not thoroughly sincere in dealing with himself, who would not exchange the finest show for the poorest reality, who does not so love his work that he is not only glad to give himself for it, but finds rather a gain than a sacrifice in the surrender. The sentimentalist does not think of what he does, so much as of what the world will think of what he does. He translates should into would, looks upon the spheres of duty and beauty as alien to each other, and can never learn how life rounds itself to a noble completeness between these two opposite but mutually sustaining poles of what we long for and what we must.—James Russell Lowell.

LONDON, MARCH 21, 1903.

ENLARGED WORK.

We are consumed by an overwhelming curiosity to know who the generous friend is, who stands concealed behind the veil of inexorable anonymity, marked only as the President's friend, and offers to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association the splendid subscription of £1,000 a year, provided the faith and energy of our people can furnish an additional income of £2,000, for the furtherance of the good work.

Curiosity, perhaps, is hardly the word to use; certainly it is no idle curiosity of which we speak. When one is eager to thank a friend for a great gift, with full and happy satisfaction, one longs to take his hand and look him in the face; and that is what we feel about this friend of ours and of the cause, both on account of his own most generous gift, and of that faith in our people which made the challenge, confident that it would be accepted. But we are baffled, and must be content not to know, and are obliged to respect his reserve. We can only offer through the President to his and our unknown friend the acknowledgment, which it is not easy to put into words.

What has happened to us is that a new breath of energy has swept across our field of work, wakening to a happy confidence that greater things can be accomplished. The answer to our friend's appeal is not doubtful. More than three-quarters of the other £2,000 is already promised, and if in such a case the last hundred or two generally prove the most difficult to get, we do not anticipate at this moment any such hesitation, but rather expect a reckoning up of how much over the £3,000 will come into the treasury. The really serious question is how this great opportunity can be most wisely and effectively used.

We publish to-day the appeal and the full programme of new and enlarged work issued by the Committee of the B. and F.U.A., and at the same time the passages from the report of the Committee of the National Conference, to be presented to the Liverpool meeting next month, showing a further need for extended operations and the consequent enlargement of resources. At the same time, as will be seen from our reports, the Midland Christian Union is making a new effort to raise a large capital sum and secure a considerable increase of income, while the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, the East Cheshire Union, and other District Associations have large schemes for increase of resources and the extension or strengthening of their work. These all require to be considered together, and the final working out of the programme of the B. and F.U.A., as regards efforts at home, will doubtless be determined by the desire to co-operate in the most helpful manner with the District Associations and the National Conference.

It will be seen that the appeal for a larger conception of our duty as Unitarians and the measure of service we can render is based, to a considerable extent, on the evidence of the widespread interest aroused by the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, and the inspiration derived from the Whitsuntide meetings two years ago. There is undoubtedly great scope for the more effective deliverance of our message in the Colonies, and in many ways, as suggested in the programme, we can extend the hand of sympathy and abundant helpfulness to our brethren of kindred spirit in different countries of Europe and in India and Japan. But while this foreign work very naturally and rightly appeals to the imagination and can make great demands on our resources, there is even more urgent need for strenuous efforts at home. For if our message is to be effectively delivered in distant countries, it must be beyond question that we who dare so to speak are ourselves effective in our own immediate field of duty. The word will not be with power, unless it comes out of a life that is strong in the spirit of faith and fruitful of devoted works. Thus the Association which is charged with the "diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity" must be ready to serve by every means within its power the churches which are the homes of that religious life.

The foreign work in support of liberal religious thought and life is exclusively in the hands of the Association, but the home work is in co-operation with the churches, which have an independent life of their own, and are united for common work in District Associations, and in the National Conference, which is aiming at greater effectiveness, as the representative assembly of our body of Free Churches as a whole. It is eminently to be desired that there should be complete harmony of co-operation between these various bodies. They are the instruments of one people, of a common religious life, with a common trust placed in their hands.

The great aim of the National Conference is to deepen the sense of a common Church life in our fellowship, in which there shall be a true unity of spirit, and a more ready and effectual helping of the weaker members by the strong. If the Conference decides to appoint a paid secretary, and the services of a gifted minister can be secured, he will undoubtedly be able to render very great services in this direction. With this appointment in view, it would seem to us desirable that Section 4 of the B. and F.U.A. programme for Home Work should be reconsidered. Section 3 implies only the occasional visits of ministers whose services would be welcomed by the congregations, but considering the scarcity of men of the highest gifts, and the many claims of the churches, it is doubtful whether it would be wise to create a new office, which would engross the whole time of such a one.

On the other hand Section 1 makes admirable provision for such lecturing as the Midland Christian Union have in view in their proposed Priestley Theological Lectureship. They will perhaps consider how far the need is met, and more of their resources might go to the distinctive work of the Union, in the strengthening of the churches.

The whole of the programme is of the greatest practical interest, and we commend it, together with the suggestions of the National Conference Committee, to the earnest consideration of all those who have at heart the welfare of our churches and the cause of liberal religious thought and life.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

NEW AND ENLARGED WORK.

In order to enable the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to enlarge its operations, a friend of the President has made a splendid offer. He promises to subscribe £1,000 a year, if £2,000 in addition is subscribed annually by others.

The widespread interest aroused by the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, and so strikingly evidenced on occasion of the 1901 meetings of this Association, has shown that Unitarianism is capable of ministering to the intellectual and religious needs of people in all parts of the world. In many lands men are eagerly seeking a broader, truer, more helpful religious faith than the creeds and traditions of the past can offer; and the Unitarians of England are face to face with an opportunity which it is urgent to seize and would be inexcusable to neglect.

The chief foreign work of the Association is at present connected with India, and is dependent on a special fund which will soon be exhausted. In addition to this a few grants, in money or in literature, have been made to Belgium, Denmark, Hungary and Italy, with some assistance to Australia and New Zealand, and a grant in aid of a student from Japan. The total expenditure for foreign work in 1902 from the general fund was only £408. This sum is altogether inadequate to meet growing demands. From all parts of Europe, from Africa, from Asia, from Iceland, from the British Colonies, appeals for sympathy and aid have come. All over the world there is an earnest, eager call for the strong and effective presentation of an affirmative, rational, uplifting religious faith such as Unitarians can give.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association earnestly desire to do the following things:—

Foreign Work.

1. To prepare, publish and circulate a series of the best modern Unitarian pamphlets in Danish, Dutch, French, German, Italian and Spanish, as well as in some of the chief languages of India, Japan and other lands.

2. To make occasional grants, as fitting opportunities arise, for the spread and encouragement of Liberal religious thought and work in all parts of the world, among non-Christians as well as Christians.

3. To provide assistance in founding new churches, and in securing the services of ministers, in Australasia, South Africa, and wherever else evidence of local interest and self-help is forthcoming.

4. To induce a minister of eminence and capacity to visit Australia, New Zealand, and Tasmania, to preach and lecture in the chief towns for a period of three or four months; and, if the experiment prove successful, to arrange visits to other countries by specially qualified ministers. Other denominations have sent their most distinguished men on similar missions with conspicuous advantage, notably so in the case of Dr. Clifford, commissioned by the Baptists.

Home Work.

There is urgent need of increasing the efficiency of existing centres of Unitarian teaching and worship in the United Kingdom. The new times demand new methods, a larger outlook, and more sustained and vigorous work. Moreover, there are nearly a hundred towns in the British Isles of 20,000 inhabitants and upwards, which have no centre of Unitarian thought and life and worship. In England and Wales there are sixteen counties without any public representation of our principles and faith.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association desire to do the following things:—

1. To provide for the delivery of courses of lectures on Biblical and theological subjects, addressed to educated and thoughtful people, similar to those so successfully delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter. In addition to Mr. Carpenter himself, other men of scholarship and ability, with the gift of engaging the attention of thoughtful audiences, might be induced to take part.

2. To arrange for series of popular religious services in public halls and theatres, with the view of reaching the unchurched masses, particularly in large cities and towns. Mr. Hopps and others have already shown what good work can be done in this direction, and other specially qualified ministers, it is hoped, would be found willing to assist in conducting these people's services.

3. To arrange with some of the ablest and most effective ministers in our connection occasionally to visit existing places of worship, to preach, and, if invited, to confer with the congregations about their work.

4. To appoint a travelling Missionary whose time and energy would be employed in propagandist work in towns and villages where at present there is no centre of Unitarian teaching or worship.

5. To prepare and publish a new series of Handbooks of Religion, dealing with important questions of philosophy, the Bible, theology, and practical religion, for circulation at home and abroad.

6. To prepare and publish biographical and historical works illustrative of the growth and progress of Unitarian thought, beginning with the "Life of Dr. Priestley," the centenary of whose death occurs early n 1904.

7. To prepare, publish, and circulate a new series of "Home Pages" for working men and women—brief, simple, attractive presentations of religious thought and life, written from the Unitarian point of view.

8. To make grants of books and pamphlets on a more liberal scale than heretofore, particularly to public libraries, clergymen, ministers, students, and religious inquirers at home and abroad.

The Committee, impressed with the urgency, magnitude, and variety of the claims upon them, are eager to put into practical form these and other proposals for enlarged and more effective work, without reducing their expenditure on any of the operations in which the Association is now so usefully engaged. But for this purpose greatly enhanced resources are absolutely requisite.

The total present expenditure of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is exceedingly small compared with that of the American Unitarian Association, which last year spent nearly £20,000. An increased annual expenditure of fully £3,000 a year will be required in order to accomplish the new and enlarged work now contemplated. The Committee earnestly appeal to the Unitarians of Great Britain and Ireland to accept and to respond to the challenge so generously made, believing that no higher service could be rendered to the enlightenment of mankind and the cause of religious truth.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.—In the University intelligence published in Wednesday's papers we were very glad to see the award of the Hall-Houghton prize for Junior Greek Testament to Mr. John Ewart, M.A., and congratulate Mr. Ewart on the distinction he has gained for himself and for his college. For the Senior Greek Testament there was no candidate.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.—Mr. J. H. Leigh will be glad to hand over to the treasurer of the London Domestic Mission the entire proceeds of any tickets purchased by subscribers to the Mission for his readings of Macbeth and Much Ado About Nothing on April 7 and 18 respectively. It will be a great convenience to Mr. Leigh if applications for seats are made not less than a week before the date fixed for the performance to Miss Sowerby, 11, Bryanston-street, Portman-square, W., or to the Essex Hall.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

PASSAGES FROM THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE, TO BE PRESENTED TO THE CONFERENCE, AT THE MEETING IN LIVERPOOL, APRIL 23.

VERY early in its proceedings the committee found it necessary to take into consideration the important subjects of finance and the organisation of its own work. During the first years of its existence the Conference was involved in little more expenditure than the printing and other charges for the preparation of its triennial meetings. These costs were met in a private manner by the generosity of a few friends to whom the treasurer applied as occasion arose. Nor was the work so heavy but that it could be adequately discharged by the honorary officers. But by a very natural process the operations of the Conference have during twenty-one years grown in importance and extent, so that the work is much more onerous than at first, and the committee feel that the time has arrived when the Conference must consider the appointment of a paid secretary. The standing committee now meets quarterly, and is further compelled to appoint sub-committees to deal with the various subjects referred to it by the triennial meeting. Consequently a considerable correspondence is involved, and a large and regular expenditure entailed for the travelling expenses of the committee, as well as for printing, &c. Further, it is felt extremely desirable that the Conference should occasionally visit the less wealthy districts of the country, and in such cases it must be prepared to guarantee a portion of the expenses incurred. The whole position was considered with great care, especially the case for the appointment of a paid secretary, and the president and Mr. Wood were requested to draw up a report upon the functions of the proposed office. That report pointed out that whatever the expenses of the Conference, they should be borne more generally by the churches than is now the case. As to the work of the committee and its adequate discharge, together with the need for a permanent official and the duties of his office, the following extracts from a circular subsequently drawn up by the committee, the issue of which was deferred, will perhaps assist the Conference in coming to a decision:—

"The work delegated to the Committee by the Conference at its successive triennial meetings becomes more and more varied, extensive, and responsible, calling for more time and attention than it is reasonable to suppose honorary secretaries can give. At the last Conference meeting three most important questions were referred to the Committee, or to special committees then appointed—namely, (a) the Superannuation Fund, (b) the Promotion and Federation of Guilds, and (c) the Supply of Students for the Ministry. These subjects have necessitated numerous and prolonged meetings, many journeys, and a vast amount of correspondence involving many weeks of merely clerical labour on the part of the President and others.*

"It will, therefore, be seen that very practical reasons have urged the Committee to the conclusion that if the whole business of the Conference as it now stands is to be efficiently discharged there must be an official whose duty it shall be to take up, prepare, and co-ordinate the work of the various committees, arrange the business details of the Conference, and undertake the clerical work required. Indeed, the Committee feels that unless a secretary is appointed who can give himself to the work of the Conference, the usefulness of the Conference will be unfortunately limited, and the consideration of many pressing questions will have to be abandoned.

* Several other important subjects have been dealt with by the Committee in addition to those delegated to it by the Conference.

"But further, looking forward to the mattters that must engage the attention of the Conference during the next few years, such urgent and important questions as ministerial stipends, the strengthening of our weaker churches, how to secure the co-operation of all for the good of each, and above all the quickening of new life and the promotion of a closer unity in our churches, the Committee feels that the services of a trusted and capable ministerial secretary, who shall give his whole time to the duties of the office, will be absolutely essential.

"An important part of the duties of such an office would lie in his function as pastor-at-large. There is an ample field for a minister of tact, experience, and energy who shall bring encouragement to the struggling churches and be himself a personal link between the several groups united in the National Conference.

"There are many signs that the principles of thought and life for which our churches stand are spreading; but their organised expression makes no corresponding advance. In the meantime, changes in the population, the vicissitudes of families once holding honoured places in our congregations, and other circumstances, are seriously affecting many of our scattered homes of faith and worship. It would undoubtedly be a help and encouragement to them to receive the services of a pastor-at-large who should represent the National Conference, and thus convey to them the support of membership in a common body, and quicken their devotion to a common cause."

After long and careful deliberation, the Committee passed the following resolution:—"That the Committee approves of the general policy of the report with respect to finance and the appointment of a paid secretary, and recommends it to the Conference."

It may be added that if a minister of sufficient experience and standing could be appointed to the office, his counsels would be widely sought in the crises of Church life. Not only the smaller but also the larger churches would welcome his visits, and he could do much to bring the strength of the strong to the help of the weak.

The Committee therefore trusts that the Conference will itself make an appeal to the churches for an adequate and permanent income, and that, if the necessary funds can be raised, it will sanction the appointment of a ministerial secretary, who shall also act as pastor-at-large.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL MEETING.

These meetings have had a special interest this year. There is probably more interest and activity in the work of the Association than there has been at any previous time. It is moving with the times; indeed, it has always done so, only the present times are making far more pressing demands upon such organisations. Churches are liable to fall victims to many evils; but there are two which seem to be more common than the rest—namely, selfish isolation and indifference to the struggles and needs of neighbouring churches, through exceptional prosperity of their own; and a depression of spirit due to empty pews and the querulousness of poverty, and that consequent state of affairs regarded as failure. Churches, like individuals, can think far too much about themselves to be healthy. It is the object of the Association to keep them active and interested; to bring them into frequent and friendly intercourse, for interchange of opinion, and for common religious worship. A scheme for extended usefulness, involving monthly meetings at the respective churches in rotation, has been worked most successfully during the past winter, the attendances growing larger on each occasion; so that there were grounds for hoping that the annual meetings would prove a record both in interest and in attendance.

A MEETING FOR MEN.

A new feature also was to be introduced. On Friday evening, March 14, a Men's Meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, with the President, the Rev. Charles Roper, in the chair. The object was to get frankly discussed the subject of "Organisation and Co-operation in our Church Life, and the Relation of that Life to Civic and Social Uprightness." The meeting was unique in the history of local Unitarianism. Despite the inclemency of the weather there were eighty-five men present, all in earnest about not only stimulating their own spiritual life, but also about securing purity and perfectness of life in the community at large.

In opening the business of the meeting, the Chairman said that everything to-day was subject to criticism, and that there was no reason why religion should be an exception. On the whole the churches were poorly attended, while the majority of those who came were women. Did it mean that our form of religion was effeminate, containing nothing to attract the strong man who mixes in the daily concerns of life, and who wants to see the value in everything to which he gives allegiance? The history of their Unitarian forefathers was an inspiring one; and they were anxious not merely to live on their merits, but rather to maintain traditions right royally by exemplifying in their own lives, both privately and publicly, the religious and moral principles which they profess.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson introduced the subject of "Organisation and Co-operation in our Church Life." He referred to our Presbyterian forefathers, and how they stood for civil as well as religious liberty. The democratic element was, however, absent from their Church life. Great changes have taken place, socially and otherwise. To-day we must welcome all new-comers and make them feel at home, giving them a full share in our Church life. Some of the old trust-deeds made it impossible for working people to become full members. He was an advocate of free seats, and believed it was the only way to draw people in and make them feel that they were wanted. There was need for thorough reorganisation. The new-comers must be on equal terms with the hereditary families, and government must be representative. All officers should be elected year by year, so that each one of the capable young men of the congregation should know all about the working of the church. The women ought to have more to do. Why should not a woman be church secretary? They are more deeply religious than men, and can inspire both men and churches with life if they are given the chance. More young people passing through Sunday-school should be enrolled as members, but this was not primarily the minister's work. Certain members should be set apart to welcome strangers, and also to call upon absent fellow-members with a view to drawing them in again. Churches should also be knit together; smaller ones would be inspired by co-operation with larger ones. The interests of our congregations are far too local, and they are not sufficiently concerned in the general cause. Laymen should be more willing to serve on committees connected with district associations and domestic missions.

Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson opened the discussion, and was followed by the Revs. W. E. Atack, J. Ruddle, W. R. Shanks, and Messrs. John Heys and R. C. Law.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant introduced the complementary subject of "The Relation of that Life to Civic and Social Uprightness." He spoke of the prevalent vices that sapped the moral and physical life of so many men and women; and which seemed to mock at all the work done in our Sunday-schools and similar institutions. Yet the feature of the age was a growing civic patriotism. The facts of the Woolwich Election were encouraging, inasmuch as nearly 90 per cent. of the voters rose to the height of their responsibility and went to the poll. The course of legislation tends to throw more and more of the government of the country upon the people in their local centres, and he hoped the churches would see in this fact their growing opportunity. It was needful to translate the idea of brotherhood into practical life as between employer and employed—light and love into the facts of life. The time for the Church as such to rule Society is past; men keep the reins of government in their own hands; but the Church must be a perpetual reminder to them that there is something more to live for than the amassing of wealth and the establishing of armies and navies. The only Church that can continue to do good must claim the work of the individual soul; that all souls are dear to the Father's heart; and that one soul may curse or sweeten a whole neighbourhood. It would be wrong for the Church to organise itself to do exclusively any one sectional piece of work; but it should be the one place where things that divide are set aside, and all meet as loving children of the Father God.

The discussion was joined in by the Revs. J. A. Pearson, Priestley Prime,

Messrs. W. Simpson, R. Robinson, Councillor Pritchard. If space had permitted we would gladly have reported all the speeches in full. The value of the meeting was felt to be great, and there was a unanimous desire that such gatherings should be held more frequently for the fuller discussion of Church problems.

THE ANNUAL SERVICE.

On Saturday afternoon a service was held in Cross-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. John Page Hopps, who preached an eloquent sermon on being "Fellow-workers with God." The sermon is to appear in full in the April number of The Coming Day, and also in pamphlet form for wide circulation.

The problem of to-day, the preacher said, is the Personality of God, and the need is the resolving of that Personality into a working inference which shall dehumanise Him and regive Him to us as an immanent God, an omnipresent Spirit Presence, "the inmost uplifting Life of all things."

Having shown how in the marvellous order of the world, in things both of the outward and the inward life, God is always working, and we are called to be fellow-workers with Him, the sermon concluded:—

"Here then is your work as churches, as ministers. It is nothing lower than this—the helping God to quicken and uplift man as a living soul. This is the meaning of religion, and this it is that we ought to make the beginning and the end of all we do—to help men to 'become partakers of the divine nature' in fuller and higher degrees. Tennyson says, 'Our wills are ours to make them Thine.' So may we say, 'Our world is ours to make it Thine.'

"The Church we call 'the Church of Christ' must learn that well if it is ever to get back to him: and, in order to learn that one thing, it must unlearn many things. In truth, remembering how much that is artificial, and merely spectacular, has gathered about the Church of Christ, one is tempted to think that we may eventually have to change it for a Church of God, with its larger conception of the unity of the human race, and its wider inclusion of all God-lovers who are striving for the uplifting of His children. This, in truth, is the Unitarianism we need:—the unity of the Universe with all its worlds, its heavens and hells: the Unity of the God Ideal of Energy, Harmony, Purpose and Power; the Unity of the Human Race, as a God-born Brotherhood, destined to be one in mutual helpfulness for the good of each in the good of all: the unity of all nature's laws, whose diversities of operations in different climes tend to the realisation of that great scheme of mutual helpfulness, in the working together of all for the common good; and the unity of all the myriad modes of service, ever tending, from lowliest grades to highest, to help God make His world what he would have it be.

"In the presence of that tremendous ideal, how poor, how hindering, how impertinent, are many of the things that are now so dear to Christendom! Think of the unmeaning ceremonies, the perfunctory rituals, the mere æsthetic prettinesses of so-called 'Divine service,' the threadbare creeds, the artificial ideas of salvation and of the way to get it: and then suddenly face this Ideal—the winning of the world for justice, the heart's sunshine, goodwill, and peace, and happiness, as fellow-workers with God. Who can doubt on which our choice should fall?

"Think what would happen if the dream came true—if all men surrendered themselves to the divine Ideal—if kings and statesmen, courtiers and judges, writers and speakers, capitalists and labourers, buyers and sellers, lived right up to it. We talk of Heaven. Why this would give it to us here and now. Think of your churches, of your schools, of your classes, of your charitable societies, of your social gatherings, of your humblest committee meetings, in the light of this tremendous Ideal; and how all will be transformed! No more listless prayers and sermons: no more careless and selfish passing by on the other side: no more cold and empty places: no more thin criticisms and paltry personalities: no more dull hearts and laggard steps: no more shrinking from a shower: no more strolling into service late, as though one were of doubtful mind, or grudged five minutes to God and the Ideal! All gone, like a bad old dream! Why? because we should see we are not alone, and are not our own: because we should know that someone wants us, that someone claims us, that someone is working in us, with us, for us, and that we are inspired: because we should grasp the mighty plan, and see that our trivial duty belonged to the tremendous whole: because we should feel as the sentry does when, at his lonely post, he knows how much may depend upon him: because we should be aware of God in the lowliest thing we do, not knowing what great thing may come of the lowliest duty done.

"Brothers! return to your old familiar posts, trodden perhaps hard, and not unstained with tears. It will not, it cannot be, in vain, for you are working together with God. But, win or lose, strive hard to make the Great Ideal true!"

Cross-street Chapel was well filled, and the singing was led by a united choir from most of the churches, under the conductorship of Mr. Oliver Heys.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

Tea was served in the Memorial Hall, and in the evening a public meeting was held in the same building, presided over by the Rev. Charles Roper. This also was a record gathering, the Hall being well filled.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said the work of the Association was permanently increasing, and its character was changing. There was plenty of energy and enthusiasm; what was wanted was more money. He spoke of the grit and ability of treasurer and secretaries. No association could have more efficient or more enthusiastic officers. Grants in aid of the ministry had been made to five churches, while at Bradford the whole of the minister's stipend was provided. Towards this, handsome assistance was rendered by the B. and F. U. A. The Rev. J. E. Carpenter's Lectures on the Bible had been immensely appreciated, and had especially helped some orthodox friends who were nervously feeling their way to brighter and clearer light in religious problems. The Forward Movement Churches were advancing in strength and usefulness. Concern was felt about the future of the Strangeways Church. The character of the neighbourhood has so seriously changed that it seems impossible to profitably continue Unitarian effort there; the congregation therefore contemplated a policy which might mean the early closing of Bridge-street Unitarian Church, in order that the resource it represents may be utilised to greater advantage elsewhere. In this regard, and as a principle, the President thought they were setting a valuable example to all those who control buildings from which the population has removed, or become so changed in character as not to need such service as the church had to offer. Successful Sunday Evening Services conducted in Lower Mosley-street School by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith were made possible by the generous support of the Cross-street Committee. Good work was being done at Bradford. Over 300 scholars were in attendance on Sunday afternoon; and additional classroom accommodation is urgently needed. Reference was made to the great influence for good which was exerted by the Postal Mission; and also to the "scheme for the extended influence and usefulness of the Association." There is such a heartiness about its monthly gatherings at the various churches that it is not surprising that the attendances are persistently increasing. As a consequence he looked hopefully to the time when, resulting from all this, their united work as Unitarians in that city and district should grow immensely, and that not only should their Sunday devotions be more numerously attended, but also that there should be a purer and more upright civic and social life in their midst. Leaving the report, and referring to the men's meeting on the previous evening, Mr. Roper said: It had been felt for some time that the men of our churches were not, generally speaking, taking that downright serious interest in religious matters that is expected of them. We are not satisfied to see our churches less than half-filled, as they are in some cases. Why is any Unitarian indifferent about Sunday worship? and why are there so many men standing outside all Church organisation who are avowedly Unitarian and not Trinitarian? If all those who hold the same beliefs as we do joined us on Sundays, our churches could not possibly hold a tithe of them. The complaint men make is that the nexus between the Church and the practical life of the world is not sufficiently evident. The prominence which members of our churches still maintain in all useful public activities is remarkable testimony to the effect our religious faith has upon practical life; and we want to utilise the force of example and association for all it is worth. In short, though we be called dreamers, our object is to bring about what our brethren in the orthodox Churches would not hesitate to call a revival. The work is, indeed, begun already; and thus far we are encouraged by the results. Let us as members of individual churches be loyal to each other and to our ministers; let us be loyal to this Association, and supply it with the sinews of war generously; and let us meet together on frequent occasions to discuss the methods of corporate activity, and to cultivate what I will venture to call a Unitarian Conscience, not merely with regard to matters of theological belief, but mainly with regard to those great public problems which affect the social and moral well-being of our fellow men and women.

Mr. W. Canning seconded the adoption of the report, and pointed to the fact that the most important and subtle work done could not be embodied in a report or expressed in statistics.

The Treasurer's statement of accounts was adopted on the motion of Rev. H. J. Rossington, seconded by Mr. T. E. Taylor.

Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, representing the B. and F.U.A., spoke of the scheme of additional work, and the splendid response already received to the appeal for funds; and said that the Committee would gladly welcome suggestions as to the wisest ways in which such an additional income as £3,000 can be spent. He believed that Unitarians were at the flood, and had the help of a more favourable wind of public opinion.

The Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans represented the Midland Christian Union. He spoke of what he thought led to true success in Church life. A minister must put his ministry first in all its aspects. He feared our colleges were a little to blame for their lack of ministerial zeal. Have they made the students realise the great importance of their work? or have they narrowed down their effort to the making of scholars merely? We must have faith in our message and methods. One of our most important duties is the shepherding of the young. Sunday-schools should be a part of the Church. He described the very interesting and successful work he himself is doing at Kidderminster.

Mr. Richard Robinson spoke as representing the Liverpool District Missionary Association, and the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, of Sale, spoke as a minister of one of the District Churches. The latter's address was a rousing one, and dealt with some of the weak points in our Church life.

The proceedings were enlivened by musical items, and the usual votes of thanks were accorded.

These were the most successful and inspiring of similar gatherings which have been held for a long time, and we sincerely believe they are the augury of a real revival of interest and work in the Church life of this district.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE MISSION.

The annual meeting was held at Heywood on Wednesday, March 11. Service was conducted in the Britain-hill Church by the Rev. R. McGee, of Colne, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, of Manchester.

After service the business meeting was held, Councillor W. Healey, J.P., in the chair.

The report of the committee stated that the scheme for securing independence to the aided churches, and setting free the funds of the Mission for further work, was now ready to be brought before the public. Particulars were also given as to the work of the aided churches, and of the Postal Mission, conducted by Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington, and as to ministerial changes, which were recently reported in a Provincial Letter in these columns. In conclusion the committee pointed out the need of generous financial support, and commended the work to the churches in the Union.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. J. J. Wright, the report was adopted. Subsequent resolutions offered thanks to the officiating ministers at the service, sympathy with the Rev. T. Leyland in his ill-health and retirement from his ministry at Colne, and thanks to the Heywood congregation for their hospitality. The officers for the ensuing year were also appointed, with Mr. Thomas Harwood as President and Chairman of Committee, and the Revs. R. T. Herford and J. Moore as secretaries.

After the meeting tea was served in the schoolroom.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the church. Councillor William Healey, J.P., presided, and there was a fairly large attendance.

The Chairman in his opening address said the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission had done a great deal of good work in the past, it was doing a great deal at present, and he hoped it would do a great deal in the future. He had been connected with the church in which they had met ever since he was a boy. He first went to the old Mossfield school in 1858, and when the existing chapel was built he joined it, and had attended service there ever since. Referring to education, he said they had had a great deal of controversy about this question. He was pleased to say that in Heywood they had adopted a representative system, and were not prepared to accept any denominational or sectarian system. Unitarians were sometimes scorned and sneered at, but Unitarianism was getting into other churches and making them broader in their views. If they could only exercise their influence in this direction there was hope that the religion of this country would be broader and more tolerant.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal said that their work was not confined to their own chapels. The congregation that confined its work to its own chapel and to its own institutions was not in a healthy condition. Many Unitarians had been of great service to their country. If they took the men who had made Manchester they would be found almost to a man to have been members of Cross-street Chapel. He trusted that notwithstanding any scorn that might be thrown at them, they would be faithful to their doctrines. There would be differences, but surely there was something deeper than these external differences. They had a great mission before them, and he trusted that they would sow seed which their descendants would reap, as they had reaped the result of the seed sown by their fathers. He believed that they were going to have for some years to come a very serious contest in England. It was curious to see how many of the things that they thought settled long ago had come up for re-discussion. He had never dreamt that they would have to fight again a contest for Free Trade. He thought that had been settled once and for all in 1846, but apparently it had not. They would also have to fight on the education question, and he hoped they would continue the contest until they won.

The Rev. John Fox, of Leeds (formerly of Heywood), said it was in Heywood that the first movement took place which ended in the formation of the mission. The Heywood church was older than the mission. It was now thirty-seven years since he came to Heywood as the Unitarian minister. That was the day of small things. Members of wealthy congregations had very little idea of the struggle which small churches had to go through. His church was no exception to the rule, for they had experienced very hard times indeed. The church had, however, gradually grown until it was now a fine church. He hoped that in the days of success it would not forget the North and East Lancashire Mission.

Short addresses were also delivered by the Revs. G. Knight, of Manchester, and H. S. Tayler, of Dukinfield.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD STREET CHAPEL.

The annual meeting was held in Stamford-street Chapel on Tuesday evening, Mr. David Martineau in the chair.

The report of the Committee (read by Mr. A. A. Tayler) recorded another year of useful and successful work, but announced the resignation of the Rev. Frederic Allen, with grateful acknowledgment of "sincere and painstaking efforts during the years he has devoted to the work of the Mission," and also of the invaluable help rendered by Mrs. Allen and their son, Mr. F. Edwin Allen. The report also strongly emphasised the need for more help in the work of the Provident Bank, one of the most important branches of the Mission work.

The Rev. F. Allen then read his fifth annual report, which gave particulars of the many branches of beneficent work steadily maintained by the Mission. The foundation of it all, he urged, must be religion, and the attendance at the Sunday services had increased. The results of the Provident Bank work showed a falling-off from the previous year, when they had reached the highest figures in their record. That was partly due to removals from the neighbourhood, due to the clearing away of whole streets, and partly to the unsettlement of the Coronation year. If the supply of visitors was maintained there was no fear that falling-off would continue. When the bank was established in 1886, they collected only £8 12s. 7d., and in the following year £125. Last year the amount was £889 11s. 8d., from 1,275 depositors. There were in that district still 9,896 one-room dwellings, a lamentable source of physical and moral deterioration, which pressed upon them the great urgency of the housing problem. Mr. Allen then noted the good work done by their country cottage, the Mothers' Meeting, the Social Institute, the Boys' Brigade and the gymnasium, the happy evenings for the children, the annual flower show, and other branches of the work. In conclusion, he said that when in January, 1898, he resigned his charge at Chatham, he was aware that a difficult task lay before him, in re-organising the united work of the Mission and chapel, a work that would require much thought, care, and patience. Looking back now they could see that the work had gone forward, all their institutions were in a healthy state, and it was a satisfaction to him to feel that he had been able to accomplish something for the glory of God and the service of man.

Mr. S. S. Tayler then presented the report of the Sunday-school, Miss Pickett that of the Young Women's Club, Mr.

George Ling of the Social Institute, Mr. A. W. Harris of the Band of Hope and Mercy, Mr. F. E. Allen of the Boys' Brigade, Mr. R. Dunn of the Unity Social Club, and Mr. H. Hann of the Unity Football Club.

Mr. C. F. Pearson presented the Treasurer's accounts, which, on a total of £457 8s., with subscriptions amounting to £268 17s., showed the adverse balance reduced from £44 6s. 3d. to £41 6s. 8d.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, recalled the first efforts of the Blackfriars Mission in the New Cut, and expressed his confidence in the progress of the good work. Results showed how hard and well Mr. Allen had worked; they were greatly indebted to him and to the many helpers gathered about him. They must enlist more workers, and that could only be done by personal appeal.

The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed seconded the motion. That meeting, which brought together friends from the most distant parts of London, was an encouraging sign of interest in the work and proved that something was being accomplished there. He had been struck, on a recent visit, by the signs of progress and by the good tone among the boys of the Boys' Brigade. Their religious work was not all to be done on the Sunday, though the religious atmosphere of that day was a great help. They had to get religion into their week-day pursuits, and that was effected by the personal influence of those who were religious in the spirit of their life. It was not enough to have plenty of things going on during the week, the religious spirit must make itself felt in all the institutions. It was a great mistake to suppose that a social gathering could not be made religious in its influence, and even the football club gave opportunities for the discipline of character, demanding co-operation, self-respect and the wise husbanding of strength; it was a moral and therefore also a religious opportunity. In all their work they had the help of beautiful and high ideals, the example of noble and strenuous characters. The religious spirit cherished in their own life and character would have its influence on everything they undertook. He rejoiced not only in the good that had been done in the past, but in the great opportunity which lay before them.

On the motion of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the Committee and officers were then appointed.

Dr. H. Foster Morley, in moving a hearty vote of thanks to the Rev. F. Allen and all helpers in the work, expressed his sense of the indefatigable and unselfish service Mr. Allen had rendered. He would take away with him not only the thanks of all friends of the Mission, but still more the thought of the silent gratitude of many whom his ministry had helped.

Mr. I. S. Lister, seconding the motion, spoke of the great value of ambulance work in connection with the Boys' Brigade.

The motion having been heartily carried, Mr. Allen acknowledged it, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. Pearson and seconded by Mr. Percy Preston, brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Ainsworth.—Special services were held in the Presbyterian Chapel last Sunday. The Rev. M. R. Scott was the preacher, and anthems were rendered by the choir. The collections, which were for the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, realised £4 15s. 2d.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—The annual meeting of friends and subscribers to the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission was held on March 16, in the Mission Buildings, Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., in the chair. The report read by the Missionary, Mr. J. B. Robinson, told of another year's faithful and strenuous work in the service of God and humanity, performed in one of the poorest districts of the city. The various activities, of which the Mission is the centre, both on the religious and on the social side, had been carried on during the past twelve months with a gratifying measure of success; the Sunday services had never been better attended, regular week-evening services had been introduced, which were much appreciated by an encouraging congregation; and among new features a reading-room for boys and young fellows deserved special notice, because it had evidently met a want, the influence exerted by this institution being the most desirable substitute for that of the street corner and the public-house. The Committee's report, read by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer (secretary), spoke in highest appreciation of the Missionary's devoted labours, congratulating Mr. Robinson especially upon the way in which he had succeeded in raising the spiritual efficiency of the Mission, by teaching a simple, earnest, and helpful Christianity. Reference was also made to the friends the Mission had lost during the past year by death, prominent among whose names was that of the late Miss Estlin, one of the truest saints of God, and that of Mr. John Curnock, a faithful and generous supporter of the Mission, whose death had occurred early that very day, and with whose sorrowing relatives the meeting, through its chairman, expressed the most heartfelt sympathy. Allusion was finally made to the need of increased financial support, the treasurer's accounts showing a serious adverse balance, due partly, as the treasurer explained, to temporary and partly to permanent causes. The Chairman then successively moved the following resolutions, which, on being seconded, were passed unanimously by the meeting:—"The adoption of the reports presented, and their circulation in print; an expression of cordial sympathy with Mr. Robinson in his devoted labours, with a wish of God-speed in the ensuing year; thanks to the local ministers and the Rev. J. McDowell for supporting the Mission as its preachers on the preceding Sunday; and the appointment of officers and committee for the coming year." It is pleasing to be able to add that before the meeting came to an end the deficit reported by the treasurer, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, had been all but wiped off by the generosity of friends, this final "note" being a most encouraging one to all interested in the progress and well-being of this truly beneficent agency for the elevation of the poor.

Chichester.—Last Sunday anniversary services were held in commemoration of the reopening of the chapels, now more than twenty years ago. For the last seventeen years the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott has been minister. The Rev. A. J. Marchant, of Deptford, preached both morning and evening, and both attendances and offertories were good. Mr. Marchant was cordially thanked for his services at the close.

Clifton.—The Lecture Hall of Oakfield-road Church was inconveniently crowded last Sunday night, when Dr. Warschauer had announced an address to be delivered after evening service, dealing with some criticisms of Unitarianism made by Professor Beet, the distinguished Wesleyan divine, in the course of a sermon preached in Clifton a week previously. It appears that Professor Beet, in trying to show the necessity of dogma, had instanced that of the Trinity, which, according to him, was necessary to give us the conception of God as Love; and he had gone on to say that the God of Unitarianism was not a God of love. These statements Dr. Warschauer set out to examine in detail, inquiring first of all into the validity of the plea that the Trinity was necessary to be accepted if we were to think of God as loving. That plea reposed on the old and fallacious doctrine of the necessary antithesis between subject and object—a doctrine thoroughly discredited in philosophy, though apparently still doing duty in orthodox theology. Secondly, Professor Beet's assertion broke down in the light of history, for the Old Testament certainly told us of the loving kindness of God, though its writers as certainly were strict non-Trinitarians; and in the Gospels they found Jesus teaching the love of God, the Father, without ever once referring to the Trinity for proof—a strange omission, from Dr. Beet's point of view. But moreover, the lecturer continued, he felt not at all disposed to admit that the God of orthodoxy, the God who consigned the majority of the human race to endless Hell, was entitled to be regarded as the God of love; rather was such a Deity a God of wrath and vengefulness. And finally, to say that the God believed in by Unitarians was not a God of love, was not only a perversion, but the direct inversion of the truth, such as could be explained only on the ground of "ignorance, sheer ignorance." Had Professor Beet never joined in singing "Nearer, my God, to Thee," and did he not know that the author of that hymn was a devout Unitarian? Had he never read any of their devotional literature? The love of God was the first and last article of Unitarianism, while the condition on which admission to the Wesleyan Church was based was the expression of a desire to "flee from the wrath to come." It was simply deplorable that a man of the eminence of Professor Beet should fan the dying embers of bigotry and prejudice by his reckless utterance. An animated discussion, in which our Wesleyan friends were well represented, ensued, the main result being to bring out the wide prevalence of heterodox and even Unitarian views in so-called orthodox circles and communities, while at least one member of Professor Beet's own communion frankly avowed that many of the professor's hearers had been pained and saddened by his unwarrantable statement about Unitarians and their belief.

Crumlin: co. Antrim.—A Social Club was started here on February 2, and has since met weekly. The membership, which began with fifteen, has risen to fifty-four, and comprises all denominations. The first social was held on Saturday, the 14th inst., when there were over 100 persons present.

Denton (Resignation).—The Rev. Charles E. Oliver has resigned the charge of the Wilton-street congregation, and does not propose to undertake any further ministerial service for the present.

London: Lewisham.—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter lectured here on Monday last on "How to Read the Gospels." There were over 120 people present, many of whom were perfect strangers to this church. The lecturer was followed with close attention, which resulted in his being asked some earnest questions. Mr. Carpenter charmed his audience, not only by the quality of his lecture, but by the fulness and candour of his replies to questions. In thanking him for his very valuable lecture, members of the audience expressed the hope that Mr. Carpenter would come again. This suggestion was immediately seized upon by the meeting, and something like a promise was obtained from Mr. Carpenter for next autumn.

London: Limehouse.—Among the recent successful evening entertainments at Durning Hall was one given by Miss Jennett Humphreys and a choir of her training from Bell-street Mission, assisted by other friends. The next entertainment was a lantern lecture by Mr. Arthur R. Keating and Mr. Cartwright, entitled "Tramps in Britain." On Monday, March 16, a party from Essex Church gave a concert, and, by the desire of Lady Durning-Lawrence, friends from Stepney were invited, and several of the teachers were present. Mr. Toye welcomed the visitors from Essex Church and Stepney, the Rev. F. K. Freeston responding. A feature of the evening was the presentation of a valuable gold watch to Mrs. Hoskins by Lady Durning-Lawrence, in the name of her friends and the teachers of Durning Hall, in recognition of long and faithful service. Mr. Hoskins responded on behalf of his wife. The children's choir sang two part songs, and the band gave selections. Mr. H. Samuels, M.P. for Limehouse, is to give a concert on Monday next, March 23.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—The annual meeting of the Band of Hope was held on Wednesday week, and proved the most successful of any of its predecessors. Mr. J. Barker, of the Manchester School Board, who was the chief speaker, and gave an admirable address, said it was the best Band of Hope meeting at Oldham-road for forty years. The Rev. W. Reynolds presided. There were 150 present, and the average for the season, not including the annual meeting, was sixty at the weekly meetings. A most pleasant P.S.A. was held last Sunday afternoon in the church. The minister delivered a special address; Miss Mabel Reynolds and Mr. W. Gratrix were the soloists, and an orchestra of professional musicians, conducted by Mr. George Stephenson, gave excellent renderings of classical works. The body of the church was well filled, and the gallery also held a fair quota of attentive listeners, 350 people being present.

Newark-on-Trent.—On Sunday evening Mr. W. H. Shrubsole, F.G.S., gave a very fine discourse in the Free Christian Church on "Religious Thought in Hungary, Past and Present." He sketched the tragic history of the noble people of that country, and then outlined the course of their religious thought throughout the Christian centuries, and concluded with an account of the present state of the various sects. The discourse was listened to with great interest by a congregation which nearly filled the church. The service was conducted by the Rev. E. R. Hodges. Mr. Shrubsole and Mr. Hodges also took part in the P.S.A. meeting in the Town Hall. The latter was invited to read the Lesson, after which Mr. Shrubsole gave an instructive address on "Kindness." On the following night he lectured in the Corn Exchange to a very large audience on "Holiday Rambles in Hungary," in the course of which he gave some remarkable facts concerning Unitarianism and its institutions in that land. The lecture was well illustrated by lime-light views, and enlivened by selections of Hungarian music.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The first annual concert of the Unity Musical Society was held on Tuesday evening, the 17th inst., in the Church of the Divine Unity, under the conductorship of Mr. E. J. Chapman, church organist, and proved a great success.

Redhill.—The first of a short series of Sunday evening services was held in the Market Hall on Sunday last, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie delivered an address on "The Message of Unitarianism to the Present Age." Large posters announcing the services are exhibited in prominent positions of the town and neighbourhood, and about 600 cards of the services, with a leaflet explanatory of Unitarianism, had been sent by post to the principal inhabitants, besides a public announcement in the local paper. The response was not very satisfactory so far as numbers were concerned, but an audience of twenty-one persons was deeply interested in the exposition of Unitarianism, as given by Mr. Bowie. Out of this number eighteen were men, nearly all of whom were anxious to obtain pamphlets dealing with the various aspects of Unitarian teaching. A special feature of the service was the heartiness with which all joined in the singing of the hymns. It is hoped that the enthusiasm which characterised this first service will spread to others, and that a larger attendance will be witnessed at the future services.

Sale.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held at the end of February. There was a fairly good attendance, and a kindly and sociable feeling prevailed. A highly satisfactory and promising report was read by the secretary. The small deficit reported by the treasurer was cleared off during the evening. The committee was unanimously re-elected. After an interval for refreshments the minister, the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., gave an able and interesting address dealing with the work of the past year, stating that the various classes and guilds were in good working order. The Sunday afternoon class was most encouraging.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The programme for the first half of the present year of the Religious and Ethical Society, which meets in the Chapel Vestry on Sunday afternoons, shows a list of most interesting subjects to be discussed, having opened on Jan. 4 with a statement of "What Unitarians Believe about God," by the Rev. H. F. Short, and closing on June 28 with Tennyson's "In Memoriam," to be introduced by Miss Parkin. Among the subjects for coming Sunday afternoons are "Success," "Robert Browning as a Teacher," "Goethe," "Some Wonders of Creation," "Unitarianism, a Young Man's Religion," "The Poets' Ideal Woman." Only on Whit-Sunday no meeting will be held. The meetings are open to all who care to attend.

CADBURY'S COCOA

The MEDICAL MAGAZINE says:

"The favourite Cocoa of the day. For Strength, Purity, and Nourishment, there is nothing superior to be found."

Cadbury's is Cocoa and the Best Cocoa only.

The LANCET says:

"We are glad to find that Messrs. Cadbury draw attention to the fact that there are strong grounds for objection to the addition to Cocoa of certain foreign substances. This resource is quite unnecessary, and indeed, pernicious, having regard to the fact that Cocoa alone is an excellent food as well as a stimulant, having a salutary action upon the nerve centres."

HEALTH says:

"The perfect purity of CADBURY's Cocoa—a strong point with the makers—constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence and the secret of its universal popularity."

Has stood the Test of Time.

Entirely free from all admixtures.

Absolutely Pure, therefore Best.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE new volume of sermons by the late Dr. Martineau, advertised in another column, will be received with eager interest and thankfulness by a very wide circle of readers. April 21, the day on which the National Conference meets in Liverpool, is his birthday, and two years hence we shall celebrate the centenary of his birth.

WE are to publish next week in a full back-page advertisement the first list of subscribers towards the new income of £3,000 a year for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which is being raised in answer to the challenge of a friend of the President's, who himself subscribes £1,000, as we have already stated, on condition that the whole of the further amount is made up. The other new and increased subscriptions already promised range, we believe, from a guinea to £250, and we would urge an immediate response to the appeal, which has now been widely issued, that the first list may be as comprehensive as possible.

DR. FREDERICK WILLIAM FARRAR, the Dean of Canterbury, died on Sunday evening, being in his seventy-second year. He had been suffering for some time from creeping paralysis, but was present at the Cathedral service last Saturday morning, and was driven out in the afternoon to see the King's School sports. As the Sunday evening service was proceeding in the Cathedral the news was brought that the Dean had passed away. Born at Bombay in 1831, the son of the rector of Sidcup, in Kent, he was sent to school at King William's College, at Castletown, Isle of Man, which he afterwards described in his popular school story of "Eric." Thence he went to King's College, London, and distinguished himself there and subsequently at Cambridge. He became a very popular schoolmaster at Marlborough and Harrow, returning in 1871 to Marlborough as Head Master, in succession to Dr. Bradley, the late Dean of Westminster. In 1876 he was appointed Canon of Westminster and Rector of St. Margaret's, and there remained until, in 1895, Lord Rosebery made him Dean of Canterbury. He was one of the most popular preachers of his day, and a strenuous worker for social reform, particularly in the cause of temperance. His "Life of Christ," published in 1874, not a work of critical scholarship, but for religious edification, became even more popular than his school stories, and had an immense circulation. This was followed by other works on Early Christian times. In 1885 he delivered the Bampton Lectures at Oxford, taking as his subject "The History of Interpretation." One of the most signal services he rendered to the religious life of his time was his preaching as Canon of Westminster and his publication of the well-known sermons on "The Eternal Hope."

BISHOP RYLE (we quote from the Guardian) preached a most striking farewell sermon in Exeter Cathedral on Sunday night. He pointed out that the Catholicity of the Church would never turn upon secondary accessories of worship. Such things as incense were not essential in worship, and Confession was left to the discretion of individual members. The Bishop, concluding, said :—

> My short record of work in your midst is nearly finished. It has been very brief and very imperfect, and full of blemishes. May God pardon it for Christ's sake. You will very quickly forget it, and I should be very glad for you to forget all save this—that you have had for two years living amongst you a very young bishop, full of weakness and imperfection, but the object of whose rule in the diocese was to uphold neither party nor section, but in a deep consciousness of failure and defect to strive with all his force incessantly to promote in this part of the Church of Christ faith that worketh by love.

THE Methodist papers all mention with regret and much respect the death of the Rev. Walford Green, D.D. His life was typically Methodist. Converted at an early age, seventeen, he becomes at once a worker and begins "to call sinners to repentance"; he is made a local preacher, goes for a short time to college, becomes a foreign missionary, returns with sadly impaired health, and devotes himself as soon as may be to the ministry in his own country; in due time is made President, and has now departed at the age of seventy, leaving pleasant recollections in the minds of those who worked with him. A characteristically Methodist expression was that told by his colleague, the Rev. M. Hartley, in his funeral sermon. He said Dr. Green was in the habit of saying to him sometimes when they met, "I have found a new text, and it is a beauty!" That is the Methodist preacher to the life. It is his work in this world to preach, to exhort, to call sinners to repentance; to think of a fresh way of stating the old truth, a new text to light it up, that is a joy unspeakable.

A CURIOUS piece of contemporary history is the account of the opening of the proceedings of the United States Senate one day recently by General Booth. We read of the great excitement caused by the event, of the perfect silence amid which the General began; we are told that the prayer was the longest that had been uttered in the Senate chamber; that it occupies nearly a column of the Congressional Record; finally, that it was resolved that the prayer just delivered be included in the official record of the day's proceedings. As an item of news this piece is now out of date. As a curious instance of the difference of religious tradition, and religious atmosphere between this country and the United States, it is still fresh and suggestive. And, further, it raises the question whether the Christian doctrine of prayer, the doctrine of prayer as taught by the Founder of Christianity, has ever been quite accepted in either country.

THE Chair of Moral Philosophy at St. Andrews, which Professor William Knight is vacating, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Bernard Bosanquet, formerly fellow of University College, Oxford. The new professor, who is the son of a clergyman, was born at Alnwick in 1848. He has devoted much time to University Extension lecturing and social work, especially in connection with the Charity Organisation Society. Among his publications are "Logic, or Morphology of Knowledge," "History of Æsthetic," "Knowledge and Reality," "Essentials of Logic," "Civilisation of Christendom." To the volume on "Aspects of the Social Problem," which he edited, Mrs. Bosanquet also contributed a number of papers. He is also the editor of the translation of Lotze's "System of Philosophy," and of other works of German philosophy. One of the most popular of his books is the "Companion to Plato's Republic for English Readers." The appointment, says the Athenæum, "will give much satisfaction in University circles in Scotland."

The difficulty under the changed conditions of our generation of retaining the Class Meeting, which was so much to Methodists of earlier days, is indicated in the following:—

The Grahamstown District Synod of South Africa has recommended the Conference to appoint a committee to collect opinion and to report to the Conference of 1904—(a) Upon the advisability or otherwise of retaining the class membership in the South African Church; and (b) As to what methods can be adopted for rendering the class meeting more generally acceptable and more profitable to the Methodist people, as well as for the revival of other means of grace, such as the lovefeast, which have formerly been in extensive use in the societies.

THE OLD PRESBYTERIAN PRINCIPLE.

Sir,—While expressing my sincere thanks to Miss Dowson for the letter of Dr. Martineau, which she has made public through your columns, may I be allowed to ask of your readers, and especially of those who have been intimate with the great teacher, a question to which I have never yet obtained a satisfactory answer?

"The old Presbyterian principle . . . was that in the constitution of a Church there ought to be no hindrance to the successive development of different doctrines, as one generation insensibly modified the faith of its predecessor." I am minister of a congregation which boasts of uninterrupted descent from the old Presbyterians of the time of Charles II. I am proud of my position in a roll of ministers who were all as free as they desired to be, and used that freedom to make steady advance in the discernment of religious truth. I should be prouder still could I be assured that they were conscious of the value of the freedom they possessed as making possible the gradual development of doctrine from generation to generation, so that I could boast of belonging to the only Church which has conceived of Revelation as continuous from the beginning and ever onwards. Up to the present I have been able to find no evidence to upset my impression that Calvinist, Arminian, Arian, and Unitarian ministers, each in succession, till within the last sixty years, believed in a definite revelation closed eighteen hundred years ago, and differed from one another only in the interpretation they put upon it.

I may be mistaken—I hope I am—and for help to assure myself of error I put again the question I have asked in vain before:—

What evidence is there that "our Presbyterian forefathers" contemplated a legitimate development of doctrine and purposely refrained from imposing on their successors a doctrinal trust in order that there might be no hindrance to such development?

My predecessor, Mr. Sharp (a man whose wit and learning, piety, and liberality, is proved by his volume of sermons entitled, "Divine Comforts," London, 1700), concludes a very noble plea "for the common interest of religion as of infinitely more concern than any of our little bones of contention" with the questions which he deems alone essential — "Are the main Substantials of Christianity retain'd? . . . In summ, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, in their plain and obvious sense, received, submitted to, as the perfect Rule of Faith and Manners? Here fix." Was this not the principle of all the Presbyterians? Did they not stand by the letter of Scripture just as Papists did by the teaching of the Church; the latter, even more than the former, prepared to welcome "a successive development of doctrine" so long as it always kept rigidly to the lines laid down in advance? "All the land is before you, the wide field of research lies open to your studies, only remember that never by one hair's breadth must you swerve from humblest obedience to. . . ." Bible or Church, does it matter much which it be so far as real freedom of inquiry is concerned?

Did not Dr. Martineau and others, in their veneration for the great and good men who were the founders of our churches, attribute to them sentiments and principles unknown in their day, and hardly possible of comprehension by them? I shall welcome an answer, even if it should take the form of exposing my ignorance of old Presbyterianism.

Chas. Hargrove.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

REDUCED FARES FOR IRELAND.

The Rev. A. Ashworth, 41, Ashley-avenue, Belfast, writes:—

"At the desire of the Belfast Ministers' Meeting I took up this matter and am now able to say that Mr. Charles Fenton has secured the concession of tickets for the double journey—Belfast and Liverpool—at a single fare and a quarter, available by any one of the following routes: (1) Via Fleetwood, third-class and saloon, 17s. 3d. (instead of 21s. 9d.); (2) Belfast Steamship Company direct to Liverpool, saloon, 15s. 7½d. (instead of 21s.); (3) via Larne and Stranraer, first-class and cabin, 37s. 6d. (instead of 50s.), third-class and steerage, 18s. 9d. (instead of 30s.). First and second-class tickets, Fleetwood or Liverpool steamers, at proportionate reduction. These tickets permit of passengers making the outward journey the day before the Conference begins—that is, on the evening of Monday, April 20, and performing the return journey the day after the Conference is concluded—that is Saturday, April 25, or the tickets are available for outward or return journey on any day between those two days except in the case of Stranraer. No steamer leaves Stranraer on Saturdays, and passengers electing this route by the cheaper ticket must return not later than Friday night, April 24. Ministers, delegates and others wishing to secure tickets at the reduced fares require to be provided with a special voucher or certificate to give to the booking clerk. This can be had from Mr. Fenton or from me. Passengers must perform the return journey by the same route by which the outward journey is made."

Mr. Ashworth also adds the times of boats and trains, which, however, may be found in the Time Tables.

If thine eye be not sunny, thou canst not see the sun.—Goethe.

THOMAS PARGETER'S OF (FOXCOTE) CHARITY.

On the 16th of March the trustees of this Charity held their thirty-sixth annual meeting at the offices of Messrs. Harding and Goode, Waterloo-street, Birmingham, the Rev. J. R. Hardinge Matthews in the chair. The other trustees present were the Revs. Henry Eachus, Henry McKean, E. D. Priestley Evans, J. Bellamy Higham, L. P. Jacks, A. H. Shelley, and A. H. Thomas. The Rev. J. Hardinge Matthews was appointed Chairman for the ensuing year, and Mr. F. H. Jordan (of Lloyd's Bank) was appointed treasurer. The Revs. J. Bellamy Higham and A. H. Thomas were appointed auditors; Mr. Charles Harding and Mr. C. Copeley Harding were respectively appointed secretary and deputy secretary to the Trust. The vacancies arising owing to deaths of annuitants during the past year were from time to time filled up from a very large number of applications, some of the cases having been before the trustees for long periods. The number of annuitants now receiving aid from the Charity, including those provisionally appointed at the present meeting, is 107, ninety-nine of whom are entitled to an annuity of £20 each; the remainder are sisters receiving £16 each per annum. The trustees are pleased to record the receipt during the past year of a legacy bequeathed by Miss Sarah Elizabeth Squier, late of Dover, whilst they have also the satisfaction to announce the receipt during the present year of a donation of £59 from Mrs. Page, of Wolverhampton, per W. Witton, Esq. These gifts, in addition to a donation of £100 contributed annually by a friend of the Charity, have enabled the trustees to materially add (temporarily) to the number of recipients beyond that which the income arising from the permanent investments of the Charity would bear. The applications, many of which are of an urgent character, are extremely numerous. The primary qualifications are (1) that the applicants be ladies not less than fifty-five years of age, never having been married; (2) that they have received the education and moved in the position of gentlewomen; and (3) that they have made a strenuous but unavailing attempt to support themselves. The appointments are made without regard to the place of residence or religious persuasion of the applicants. The objects of the Charity, and its administration as referred to in the newspaper notices of the trustees' meetings, have been so much appreciated that they have attracted the attention of persons at a distance, with the gratifying result that (in addition to those given this year) large and small sums have from time to time been received from perfect strangers, the former generally to add to the invested funds, the latter for immediate use, to be applied as income. The trustees are most grateful for these donations, which largely increase the power for usefulness of the Charity, and confer a great boon on a still larger number of deserving and often distressed gentlewomen; but even with these additions they are unable to assist more than one-fifth of the applicants, a large number of whom are most worthy objects of the Trust.

THE PRESSURE OF LIGHT.

WITHIN the last few years Professor Lebedew, of Moscow, has succeeded in showing, by some very remarkable experiments, that light presses against any surface on which it falls. Even in the strongest sunlight this pressure is exceedingly minute, less than one two-hundred-thousandth of a grain on the square inch, and the most delicate apparatus is needed for its detection. Little wonder then that it has only now been shown to exist.

Old Attempts to Show Light-pressure.

When light was supposed to consist of very little particles, shot out from the source, it was natural to suppose that, moving with a speed of nearly 200,000 miles a second, these particles would press appreciably against any surface which they were bombarding, their enormous speed making up for their infinitesimal mass. In the eighteenth century, when this theory was almost universally held, many experiments were made, which sometimes appeared to show the pressure, but only because various disturbances came into play, and gave an effect which we now know to have been spurious. Some of these experiments are described in Priestley's "Vision," and Priestley appears to have thought that they conclusively exhibited the pressure. However, a few years later Bennett, allowing a ray of sunlight to fall on a paper disc attached to one end of a horizontal straw hung by a spider line in a vacuum, could detect no effect, though a very minute pressure on the disc would have turned the straw a little way round. For two generations Bennett's experiment was taken as disproving the existence of any pressure due to light.

The Wave-theory of Light.

Meanwhile the corpuscular theory disappeared, and the wave-theory reigned in its stead. If light consisted of transverse waves or quivers in an almost immaterial ether it was by no means evident that such waves would bring momentum with them, and press against a surface on which they spent themselves. Indeed, it was rather considered that Bennett's experiment confirmed the wave-theory, inasmuch as waves would account for the absence of pressure.

Forty years ago it seemed almost certain that we knew that light was a quivering of the ether, a jelly-like medium pervading all space. The atoms vibrating in this ether shook it up and down and to and fro, and these up and down and to and fro motions were sent out on all sides as waves of light. The ether was postulated, and then all else was known. But now this form of the wave-theory has entirely disappeared, and in its place we have Maxwell's Electro-magnetic theory. Light still consists of waves, but waves of electric strain and magnetic spin. We can only form guesses as to the actual changes of position and the motions in these strains and spins. We can imagine, but only imagine, atomic changes corresponding to them. It would appear as if we had given up a substantial theory for a vague and shadowy one.

But though we cannot with any confidence describe electric strain in terms of atomic and molecular change, yet we do know how to produce such a strain, and we know what it does when produced. It is an old fallacy to suppose that we know more about a thing if we can imagine how it is made up than if we only know what it does. We do not know how the electric strain is made up as we thought we knew how the ether jelly waves were made up, but we know as a matter of direct experiment how it behaves and how it travels.

The Electro-magnetic Theory of Light.

What, then, are the electric strain and the magnetic spin which now we suppose to constitute light? When we hold an electrified stick of sealing-wax near a little bit of paper which it pulls towards it we have every reason to suppose that the action is due to a modified condition of the air round the electrified surface, that the air pulls the wax and paper together, that it is acting as if it were in a state of stretch, like a stretched india-rubber cord. We say that there is electric strain in the air. We picture it by lines of force stretching from surface to surface like thin rubber cords; but these lines of force are mere symbols used to describe the strained condition. Along the lines of force, then, there is a pull shown in the tendency of the two surfaces to draw together. But somewhat as a rubber cord tries to contract, and in so doing tends to bulge out sideways, so the air or any medium which is electrically strained tries to pull together lengthwise and bulge out sideways, pressing against the surroundings.

In like manner, when a magnet pulls a little bit of iron we suppose that the intervening air is altered, and again we symbolise the alteration by lines of force stretching across from surface to surface, trying to shorten and at the same time pressing out sideways. We have some reason to suppose that there is a spinning motion round the lines, perhaps of the atoms or perhaps of the corpuscular constituents of the atoms. Just as a spinning body like the earth tends to draw together along the axis of spin and press out sideways at the Equator, so the medium round a magnet tends to draw together lengthwise and press out sideways.

Let us see how we may have waves of electric strain and magnetic spin. Imagine a wavy line, drawn from left to right across this page, to represent a set of waves of light. Of course this is a purely conventional representation, and does not imply anything as to the actual form and nature of the waves. The kind of electric strain supposed to exist in the waves may be thus described. In each height or crest the strain is that which would be produced by a positively electrified body held underneath the line, and in each depth or trough the strain is that which would be produced by a negatively electrified body held underneath the line. Or to put it in another way, suppose a number of short electrified rods, some of glass electrified positively, some of sealing-wax electrified negatively, and suppose them arranged in two lines thus:

s. wax glass s. wax glass
glass s. wax glass s. wax,

then the space between the lines will have alternations of electric strain, as we suppose them, arranged in waves of light. But while these waves will be each the length of the two words, s. wax glass, the two alternations in a wave of light are only perhaps a fifty-thousandth of an inch long.

Now let us think of the waves as moving on from left to right. Whenever electric strain moves on we know from experiment and observation that magnetic conditions are produced. In this case it can be shown that there must be magnetic lines of force, perpendicular to the wavy line, perpendicular in fact to the paper on which it is drawn. If the waves are travelling from left to right, then in the crests the magnetic condition will be the same as if a magnetic north pole were held just behind the page, and in the troughs it will be the same as if the pole were held just in front of the page.

Now, as I have said, both the electric strain and the magnetic spin tend to bulge out sideways and produce a pressure sideways, and for both the sideways direction in the waves is the direction in which they travel. That is, the waves press forward against a surface to which they are travelling, and backwards against any surface which they are leaving.

Lebedew's Experiment.

This was all foretold by Maxwell more than thirty years ago. Lebedew has detected the pressure by what we might describe as a refinement of Bennett's experiment. A disc was fixed at the end of a short horizontal arm suspended by an extremely fine fibre and in a vacuum as perfect as possible. A beam of light was concentrated on the disc, and it moved a little way back. The force was, as nearly as could be measured, that calculated by Maxwell.

Astronomical Consequences.

It is somewhat startling to be told that while the sun is pulling all the planets with the force of gravitation, at the same time he is pushing them away by the light he pours out on them. It is true that this outward push is, for such a planet as the earth, too small in comparison with the inward pull to be taken into account, at any rate at present. On the whole earth it is only about 50,000 tons, which is a mere nothing compared with the sun's pull of gravitation. But as the size of the body diminishes, the gravitation-pull decreases much faster than the light-push. We may imagine particles so small that the pull and push are equal, and for still smaller particles the push may be greater than the pull, and the sun may drive such small particles away from him. Thus a drop of water a twenty-five-thousandth part of an inch in diameter would be equally pulled and pushed by the sun, and smaller drops would be pushed away. But for very small particles the law of light-pressure probably changes, and the pressure diminishes very rapidly. Just as water-waves dashing against a big ship may press it onwards, while a cork, or even a small boat, may ride over them and only be moved up and down, so the very small particles round the sun may ride over the waves of light, as it were, and not be pressed outwards by them. Indeed, if the smallest particles were pressed out according to the same law as the largest ones, the sun would always be driving away the atoms and molecules from his surface and pouring them into space. Perhaps he does drive away those particles which are neither so big as to be drawn in by gravitation, nor so small that they can ride on the light-waves like corks on water; and perhaps in some such action we may find an explanation of the mysterious corona revealed in eclipses, and in the still more mysterious zodiacal light, that enormous belt apparently of thinly-diffused matter which stretches out from the sun all across the earth's orbit, and which may be seen in the west any clear moonless night at this time of the year an hour or two after sunset. But we have only just begun to realise that light-pressure is an actual fact, a fact to be taken into account; and it is too soon yet to say with any certainty what effects it may produce. But, at least, we can say that the proof of its existence is one more triumph for the electro-magnetic theory of light, which we owe to the wonderful genius of Maxwell. J. H. Poynting.

IN EARLY SPRING.

The waking woods are filled with glee;
Each bush and tree,
Tho' leafless yet, has now its chorister
That merrily flits and flashes here and there,
And shakes the laughing music from his throat.
Uprising like a fountain flies
The singer of the skies;
And, drop-like falling, every liquid note
In rapture ripples, ripples thro' the air.
Sequestered sings
The mellow blackbird from afar,
Who, blithely prodigal of priceless things,
His jewels all around him flings—
Melodious numbers, radiant as a star.

Tho' leafless yet the trees,
A thousand fronds, uncurling one by one
To meet the wooing, kind, caressing sun,
A thousand tender shoots
Put forth around the roots,
And brave the healthful freshness of the breeze—
An air austere
That says the time of summer is not here:
A fuller joy shall be;
To-day is prophecy—
Not yet the glory of the perfect year.

Not yet? What is it strikes my heart
With that remembered chill,
And keeps it silent still,
Amid the vocal woods a thing apart?
The glory of the perfect year
I find not here.
It is our nature's universal pain—
When all the earth rejoices
And violets bloom again—
To seek the sweetest smiles in vain,
In vain the dearest voices.

To-day, to-day is prophecy;
The fuller joy shall be!
How wide soe'er its orbit roll
The world hath summer hidden in its soul.
Me may that Master teach
Who bids the waking woodland sing
The dauntless oracles of spring,
Me may he grant prophetic speech,
A music of sublimer reach,
A song of ampler praise
Than warbling choristers can raise
That take with soaring wing the upper air,
And lowly lodge content;
This may he give,
And not to live
A mournful spirit, pent
Within a cage of fruitless care,
To keep a silent, melancholy Lent.

THE RELIGION OF THE RABBIS.

I.

Under the title of "Jewish Scholarship and Christian Silence" there appeared in the January number of the Hibbert Journal an article by Mr. C. G. Montefiore, in which he drew attention to the persistent ignoring by Christian theologians of the work of Jewish writers in the same field. It is in vain that eminent Jewish authorities protest against the way in which the Rabbinical theory and practice of religion are misrepresented by Christians, almost without exception. They cannot get a hearing. Even a great writer like Schürer, whose "History of the Jewish People in the Time of Christ" is the standard work, pays no attention when Schechter, who does know his Talmud while Schürer does not, exposes his errors. For errors they certainly are. But Schürer is the accepted guide for all Christian writers on Jewish history; and Schechter's remonstrance is unheeded. Judaism is still, as it has been for centuries, misjudged and despised by Christians, not one in a thousand of whom has any first-hand knowledge of it, or even thinks it possible that he may be scarcely in a position to judge it fairly.

Mr. Montefiore referred to a series of articles contributed by Schechter to the Jewish Quarterly Review (1894-1897) under the general title of "Some Aspects of Rabbinical Theology," and he justly complained that neither Schürer nor anyone else has taken any notice of them. Schechter may be mistaken; if so, let him be refuted. Schürer also may be mistaken, especially upon subjects where his own book plainly shows that he is not at home. It is a reproach to him and to all Christian scholars who follow him that they will not listen to Jewish protests against their misrepresentation of Jewish theology.

Will readers of The Inquirer be willing to hear the other side, or will they glance at the heading of this article, and say "Oh, it is only those Jews; let us find something more interesting"? In the hope that there may be some who will take the trouble to hear a little of what Jews think about their own religion, I propose, in this and a following article, to put before them some of the points advanced by Schechter on behalf of Rabbinical Judaism. His great authority, as one of the foremost Talmudic scholars of the day, should be sufficient guarantee for the truth of his statements. To anyone who knows the Rabbinical literature at first hand, his statements are obvious truisms.

We have all heard of "Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites"; and though some Christians are learning to admit that not all Pharisees were hypocrites, yet the religion of the Pharisees is usually supposed to be the worship of a far-off God, and the mechanical observance of a mass of trivial rules. It is supposed that by the time of Jesus the prophetic conception of God had been refined into a colourless abstraction, while the "Tradition of the Elders," beginning with Ezra, had crushed the life out of religion under a heavy weight of law. And, naturally, the Christian religion is made to appear as a liberation from the bondage of Judaism.

Now if Christianity were endangered by the discovery that Judaism was not the unspiritual formalism it is usually supposed to be, that would not say much for the intrinsic worth of Christianity. But, however that may be, Christians ought not to be afraid of learning that to those who lived under it, the Jewish religion was not by any means an unspiritual formalism, not even the religion of the Pharisees, of whom they read in the New Testament, and nowhere else.

I will take for consideration the Rabbinical conception of God, and, in the following article, the Rabbinical conception of the Law with particular reference to the Sabbath, and will show from the statements of Schechter what these were. (I may add that I have read nearly all the passages in the original books to which Schechter refers; and if I do not give all his references, it is because they would not be of much use to the general reader.)

What then was the Rabbinical conception of God? Certainly God was thought of as the Supreme Being, Creator and Ruler of the whole Universe. But no less certainly he was thought of as very near to his worshippers, near enough for the humblest prayer to be instantly heard. It is needless to illustrate the first of these two aspects of the belief in God. Christians are well aware of it, and, indeed, lay great stress upon it. That is why they say that Judaism is the worship of a far-off abstract Deity. But the Pharisee cared quite as much for the second aspect of God as he did for the first; because it was in this second aspect that his own personal religion found its chief inspiration. "God is near," said a Rabbi, "in every kind of nearness." And again, "When a man comes to the synagogue and prays, God listens to him; for the petitioner is like a man who talks into the ear of his friend." Moreover, God was frequently addressed as "Our Father who (art) in heaven," and that by Rabbis who had no inclination whatever to borrow Christian phrases. It cannot be shown, and it is in the highest degree unlikely, that any of the characteristic ideas of Christianity were ever taken over into Rabinnical Judaism. When the Rabbi prayed to God as his Father in Heaven, it is only fair to suppose that he really did think of God as his Father. And if a Jew often addressed God as "Our Father, our King," that does not prove the aloofness of God in his mind, any more than the same is proved by the Christian (also Jewish) expression the "Kingdom of Heaven," upon which Jesus laid so much stress.

It is doubtless true that the Jew thought of God as being in a relation of special nearness to Israel as a nation, and that only through such general relation could the individual Jew receive the fulness of the divine blessing. But the point is that he did receive it, did feel that God loved him and gave him many proofs of His love. If it was the function of Israel to serve God as a holy nation, it was the privilege of every Jew, a privilege for which he was deeply grateful, that he himself could serve God and thereby show his love to him. Judaism may have been something less than a "world-religion"; but to those who professed it, and lived by it, it provided the means of a real communion of the soul with God, in a close relation of love and joyful service.

I have mentioned above the phrase "the Kingdom of Heaven (or of God)." This occurs very frequently in the Rabbinical literature. What did it mean as regards the personal religion of the Jew? Schechter says (J.Q.R. 1894, p. 640) :—

Communion with God by means of prayer and through the removal of all intruding elements between man and his Maker, through the implicit acceptance of God's unity as well as [through] an unconditional surrender of mind and heart to his holy will. . . . This is what is understood by the receiving of the Kingdom of God.

This is the meaning of the "Shema," the "Hear, O Israel," &c., which is the corner-stone of Judaism. In the "Shema" it is said "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy might." What does such love to God mean? Here is a Rabbinical explanation :—

Love Him with thy heart's last drop of blood, and be prepared to give up thy soul for God if he requires it. Love Him under all conditions, both in times of bliss and happiness, and in times of distress and misfortune. For every measure He metes out to thee praise and thank Him exceedingly.

But it may be said that the Rabbi loves God, or at least serves him, for the sake of the promised reward. Here is another Rabbinical explanation :—

Say not "I will study the law for the purpose of being called Sage or Rabbi, or to acquire fortune, or to be rewarded for it in the world to come;" but do it for the sake of love to God, though the glory will come in the end.

This is the meaning of the Kingdom (or Kingship) of God in its relation to the individual Jew. It was the belief that his whole life was under the merciful and loving control of God; and to take on himself the "yoke of the Kingdom" was to surrender himself with whole-hearted devotion to the Divine will. The phrase "Kingdom of God" has another meaning, not individual but national and, even in Judaism, universal. I do not touch upon it here, because my main object in this article is to throw light upon the personal religion of the Rabbinical Jew, his own sense of his relation to God.

The usual Christian conception of a Pharisee's prayer is based upon the parable in Luke xviii. I place beside that, for comparison, another prayer by a Pharisee, and leave the reader to judge, bearing in mind that this is taken from the Pharisees' own literature. It dates from the second century, and is part of the Jewish liturgy to-day :—

Lord of the worlds, not [trusting] in our righteousness do we cast our entreaties down before thee, but [trusting] in Thine abounding mercies. Who are we? What is our righteousness? What is our deliverance? What is our strength? What is our might? What shall we say before Thee, O Lord God and the God of our fathers? Are not all the mighty as nothing before Thee, and the men of name as though they had never been? And the wise are as those without knowledge, and the understanding as those that are without discernment. For the multitude of their deeds is nothing, and the days of their life are a breath before Thee. . . .

That is far more expressive of the real spirit of Rabbinical Judaism than is the complacent effusion in the parable. But, it may be objected (by those who have read Schürer and that other leader of the blind, Weber), that the Rabbis devised all manner of rules for the regulation of prayer—how often a man should pray every day, which parts of prayer need more devotion than others, when and for what reason prayer may be interrupted, &c. Certainly there is an abundance of these; but, as Schechter says (J. Q. R. 1896, p. 375), "These writers seem to overlook the fact that the very framers of these petty laws were the main composers of the liturgy. And who can say what were the Rabbi's feelings when he wrote, for instance, 'Forgive us Our Father, for we have sinned'? The word Father alone suggests a world of such ideas as love, veneration, devotion, and child-like dependence upon God. It is easy enough to copy rubrics. . . . If 'Life and Times' writers would only dip a little deeper into the 'Sea of the Talmud' they would notice how easily the Rabbis could disregard all these rubrics. . . . Prayer is, indeed, as the Rabbis call it, 'the service of the heart.' But, as they also say, 'matters given over to the heart' can only be comprehended by God. . . . 'Prayer without devotion is like a body without a soul' is a common Jewish proverb. God himself teaches Israel how to pray before him; for nothing is more beautiful than prayer. It is more beautiful even than good works, and of more value than sacrifices. It is the expression of Israel's love to God; God longs for it. Prayer is Israel's chiefest joy. Hence the benediction in which Israel thank God that they are permitted to pray to Him."

It should be evident from what has been said, and from the illustrations afforded by the Rabbinical literature, that the religion of the Pharisees was by no means wanting in the spiritual element which is commonly denied to it. They worshipped a God who was thought to be at once supremely great, Lord of the worlds, and also very near to the devout soul. They worshipped him, and would not tolerate the intervention of any mediator whatsoever. Such phrases as Memra (Logos), Shechinah, Metatron, belong to speculative theology; and moreover, while the first and second were not personifications of divine attributes, but simply synonyms for God, the third was carefully distinguished from God, as being merely an angel. And prayer is never addressed to Metatron, or to any other being except God alone.

Now one main reason why most Christians fail to do justice to Rabbinical Judaism is that most Christians hold a mediatorial theory of religion, and infer that Judaism must fail, in regard to communion with God, because it repudiates all idea of a mediator. But those Christians who also believe in prayer directly addressed to God, without the intervention of a mediator, should feel a good deal of sympathy with the religious ideas of the Rabbis: should at least admit that it is quite possible to believe in, and pray to, a God who is Sovereign Lord of the Universe and also the Heavenly Father near to every loving heart. So far indeed as its Theism is concerned, Rabbinical Judaism, though in other respects widely different, is not much unlike the Christianity sometimes known as Unitarian. In its conception of the law, it is very different from any form of liberal Christianity; also very different from the common notion of Rabbinical Judaism. I shall deal with the law in the following article.

MAZZINI.*

We congratulate the Editor of "The Temple Biographies" on the idea of the series, which, as he tells us in his admirable preface, is "to bring together lives . . . on one side commanding interest for the service which they have rendered to their kind, and, on the other, respect for their achievement of character—a double aspect also in that they witness to two sides of vital greatness; on the one side its upward look, which always suggests a larger progress than it achieves, and gains by the spiritual energy of faith what is to be worked out afterwards in the sphere of historical fact; and, on the other, the practical sense which makes them the obedient and practical instruments of their own ideals." It is an idea which will recommend itself to all those who recognise with Mr. Macfadyen that "the supreme facts and factors" in human life "are spiritual," and the consequent importance of personality in history. For while we reject Emerson's view that "all history resolves itself very easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest persons," and hold that "the true history of Humanity is the history of the progressive religion of Humanity and of its translation into symbols and visible acts," yet it is true that each fresh line of this progressive religion has for its prophet some chosen spirit in whose life and teaching the "unconscious thought" of the multitudes, "which it will take many generations to develop," first becomes, as it were, articulate. Such a prophet was Mazzini, whose life has been selected most fittingly, to inaugurate the series. For not only was his political achievement almost unique in history, but he was, to quote from the memoir before us, one of the small band who have the strength as well as the love of Christ, not only the unselfishness that draws, but the conviction and the power that command, who impose their beliefs and make disciples.

Although more than thirty years have passed since Mazzini died, no adequate life of him had hitherto appeared. We are therefore very much indebted to Mr. Bolton King for having given us in this volume the first worthy biography of the man in whom Arnold Toynbee rightly hailed "the true teacher of the age." Himself a student, and—better still—a practical disciple, of Mazzini, an earnest worker in the cause of social progress, and the author of the best English history of Italian Unity, Mr. King brings to his task not only knowledge of his subject and a clear and interesting style, but the personal sympathy without which any biography is lifeless; a sympathy, moreover, which does not prevent him from noting the few flaws in his hero's public life (his private life was stainless), or from pointing out his defects as a thinker and what seem to him (not always rightly, we think) his political mistakes.

For the personal side of Mazzini's life (observes Mr. King), the moment is not a very opportune one. While it is almost too late for personal reminiscences, it is too early to avail oneself fully of Mazzini's correspondence.

He has, however, been fortunate enough to have access to many of Mazzini's unpublished letters, and "to obtain invaluable information from two of the very few persons now living who knew Mazzini intimately." The result is a memoir full of human interest; a faithful portrait of one of the most inspired and inspiring personalities the world has ever seen. The volume consists of a life of Mazzini, a study of his thought, and an appendix, with some of his unpublished letters and a ood bibliography.*

* "Mazzini." By Bolton King, M.A. The Temple Biographies. Edited by Dugald Macfadyen, M.A. (J. M. Dent and Co. 4s. 6d.)

We do not always agree with Mr. King in his estimate of Mazzini as a politician; that he did make political mistakes—sometimes very serious ones—we do not deny, but we cannot think his lifelong fidelity to the republican flag is to be reckoned among them, still less his distrust of Louis Napoleon, to whom we think Mr. King does more than justice. Nor does it strike us that there is any inconsistency in Mazzini's attitude towards Ireland and Poland. We are inclined to think, pace Mr. King, that time will prove the correctness of his judgment in the former instance; while in the latter he was simply applying his own principle of nationality, a principle resting on a far higher and surer basis than any theory of "balance." But while in these instances Mr. King fails, as we think, to appreciate the soundness of Mazzini's judgment, he fully recognises his loftiness of aim, the grandeur of his work, and his true place among statesmen.

To few has it been given to create a great political idea; to fewer still to be not only the creator but the chief instrument in its realisation. Mazzini was both, and it gives him the right to rank among the makers of Europe.

He also does full justice to the splendid use which Mazzini made of the only opportunity ever afforded him of putting his principles into practice—namely, at Rome in 1849, when he inspired the citizens with his own magnificent faith, and gave to the world in the Roman Republic the sole example in modern times of a religious State—a true Theocracy—the pledge, as we must believe, of the Italy that shall be.

We quite agree with Mr. King that Mazzini and Cavour "could never have worked cordially together." Even had Mazzini understood Cavour's real policy, there could have been no sympathy between the uncompromising apostle of an Italy "destined by God to the great mission of giving moral unity to Europe, and through Europe to Humanity," and the unscrupulous diplomatist who, sincere patriot though he was according to his lights, sapped the moral fibre of the nation and taught it to trust in foreign aid for its redemption.

The only blemish in Mazzini's career is an occasional disingenuousness in his political acts. In most cases this seems to have been a necessity of the conditions under which he worked; but in some it is unjustifiable, if not inexcusable.

To those who are accustomed to think of Mazzini as a mere arch-conspirator—a kind of Old Man of the Mountain—it will be a revelation that politics and conspiracy were to him "constraining but unwelcome duties." He hated the secrecy and tortuous methods involved in them. The real bent of his mind was literary and artistic. Endowed with more than commonly warm and deep affections, he deliberately renounced all hope of personal happiness, and took Duty for his bride. Sternly exacting to himself and to his fellow-workers, he was the tenderest of friends; a man to whom men and women turned for sympathy and counsel in their deepest griefs and perplexities; himself sad "with the gentle sadness which is near akin to spiritual yearnings and large-hearted love," yet rejoicing—none more—in the happiness of others; finding his own greatest happiness in acts of personal charity; loving and drawing to himself children and dumb animals. Intense reverence for woman was one of his dominant characteristics, and his deepest and most lasting and inspiring friendships were—with one exception—those of women. His devotion to his mother, which she fully returned, was quite untouched by their difference of religious belief and by some lack of intellectual sympathy between them, and her noble love and trust in him were doubtless, as Mr. King says, "the most lasting human inspiration of his life." His friendship with the saintly Signora Ruffini, though ending—not through his fault—in estrangement, was a scarcely less potent influence. The sweet and noble Giuditta Sidoli was probably the only woman he ever really loved, for his feeling towards "Madeleine" seems to have been chiefly, if not altogether, one of brotherly affection and almost overwhelming pity. Be this as it may, he put away all thoughts of any closer relation as incompatible with his loyalty to Giuditta and with the life of duty to which he had consecrated himself. The joys of the family, "the only pure joys that it is given to man to enjoy on earth," were not for him. It was his supreme sacrifice on the altar of Duty. In later years the sympathy and affection of his English friends partly filled the blank, and he bore noble and touching testimony to the worth of English friendships.

The key to all Mazzini's life and work is to be found in his religious faith. It was this that gave his life its wonderful unity and made him, in spite of certain intellectual limitations, one of the most original and stimulating thinkers of his time. Except in one supreme moment of temptation he never for an instant doubted—nor can we—that his mission was from God, nor could the bitter disappointments of his life quench his burning love for humanity. It is not this generation, nor the next, that will understand and realise the full import of his message, but his influence can already be traced in much of the best thought of to-day, and is bound as time goes on to increase. Hence we regard as particularly valuable the chapters devoted by Mr. King to a very able, thoughtful and sympathetic study of his teaching. We cannot refrain from quoting the last paragraph almost in extenso.

> He was not the mere conscientious worker only; he lived in the light of a spiritual vision, and that light radiated in almost every page he wrote, on every man and woman he touched. . . . What if he dreamed dreams, that for generations yet may be no more than dreams? What if his mental ken reached not to all the knowledge of the age? What if he marred his work by mistakes and miscalculations? His errors have passed; his intellectual limitations can be supplied. His was the rarer and the greater part, to lift men out of the low air of common life up to the heights, where thought is larger and life runs richer, and the great verities are seen, undimmed by self and sophistry. The idealist is still mankind's best friend. . . . Greater still is he, who is not idealist only, but saint and hero, and in his life bears witness to the truth he teaches. Such saint and hero and idealist Mazzini was; and while men and women live, who would be true to themselves and to their call, who value sacrifice and duty above power and success, so long will there be those who will love him and be taught by him. L. E. M.

* We note an error on p. 369. The alternative title of the "Letter to the Œcumenical Council" is "From the Council to God." Both it and Lamennais were translated by Mrs. Venturi, and not, as stated, by Miss Martineau, who only reprinted them with the translator's permission. The translation of the "Council" was expressly revised by Mrs. Venturi for Miss Martineau's edition.

"THE BACONIAN THEORY OF SHAKESPEARE."

Sir,—Mr. Lupton assumes that "the account of the Forest of Arden, which existed in Warwickshire, and the veiled reference in The Merry Wives of Windsor to the Lucy family of Charlecote afford evidence that Shakespeare assisted in the compilation of at least two of the plays." This is not at all certain, as it has never been proved that the Arden of Warwickshire is the Arden of As You Like It. In the latter Sir Oliver speaks of Orlando pacing through the forest and meeting a lioness, and Rosaland describes what she found on a palme tree. Were there lionesses and palm trees in the Warwickshire Arden at any time? The Shakespearean Forest of Arden is taken from Lodge's novel, where the forest contains not only palm trees, but olives, figs, lemons, citrons, pomegranates, and myrrh trees.

Shakespeare's forest was Lodge's forest, and that forest could exist only in fancy, and could not be identified with the Warwickshire forest. Charles Knight says: "We are equally sure that Shakespeare meant to take his forest out of the literal when he assigned to it a palm tree and a lioness. . . . There are fifty places in England where, with the As You Like It in hand, one might linger from 'noon to dewy eve,' and say, 'Ay, now I am in Arden.'" A more likely forest to be identified with that of As You Like It would be the forest of Ardennes, between the Meuse and the Moselle, but even there it would have been difficult even to have discovered either a flourishing palm tree or a starving lioness!

There is no more in the Warwickshire location of the Forest of Arden than there is in the much vaunted Warwickshire dialect in the plays. According to Professor Wright's magnificent "Dialect Dictionary" there is not a single word in Shakespeare's plays which is confined to Warwickshire.

As to the reference by Mr. Lupton to the Lucy family of Charlecote in The Merry Wives of Windsor your readers would do well to consult an able article by Mrs. Stopes, one of our ablest Shakespearean scholars, in the Fortnightly Review for March, under the title "Justice Shallow: not intended as a satire on Sir Thomas Lucy." Mrs. Stopes proves conclusively that the early quarto editions of The Merry Wives do not contain the slightest allusion to either coats-of-arms or "Luces," this being reserved for the first folio. OBITUARY.

THE REV. S. C. PINKERTON.

By the death of the Rev. Samuel Cordner Pinkerton, of Newry, co. Down, the Free Churches of the North of Ireland have lost one of their most devoted and most honoured ministers. Mr. Pinkerton was a man of gentle and kindly manner, of earnest purpose, and of deep and sincere piety. In Newry especially, where his twelve years of faithful ministerial work had made him well known, he was esteemed very highly, and his funeral, on March 17, was attended by the ministers and clergy of most of the congregations in the town. He was an Antrim man, and was born in 1861. Arriving at man's estate, his friends, finding that his heart was set upon the ministry of religion, offered him the choice of a training for one of the orthodox churches or for a pulpit among Unitarians. Choosing the latter, he attached himself to the non-subscribing Association and read for a time with the tutors of that body. He graduated at the Royal University in 1883, and spent a session at Manchester New College, London. He was minister for four years at Godalming, and settled at Newry twelve years ago. For a year his health had been broken and his work much interrupted; yet still he hoped for a return of strength, and it was only a few weeks ago that he definitely resigned his pulpit. His people have all along been most sympathetic with their stricken minister and his four motherless children, and now they grieve sincerely for the loss of a true friend.

MR. JOHN CURNOCK.

Our friends in Bristol and Clifton have suffered a severe and deeply-felt loss in the decease of Mr. John Curnock. To the sorrow of all who knew him he passed away, in the prime of his useful and earnest life, after a brief but most severe illness, on the 16th inst. From his infancy he may be said to have been identified with the faith and principles we cherish. These found for him an honoured and consistent exemplification in the daily life of his father, the late Mr. Samuel Curnock, so long known in years gone by as a devoted teacher in the Lewin's Mead Sunday-school, with which he himself also was closely associated. As his opportunities increased his heart seemed to open ever more widely towards everything that imported the welfare of his old religious home. With a generosity at once thoughtful and most liberal he found positive delight in serving the interests of the old house of prayer with which his family had so long and so closely been associated, and the same kindly spirit found willing expression in the active sympathy with which he regarded and aided the congregation worshipping at Oakfield-road. May the example of cheerful and generous service which he has left behind him touch others with its encouraging influence!

The funeral service, which was shared by his life-long friend, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., and the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, M.A., of Oakfield-road, took place at Lewin's Mead on the 21st inst., the concluding portion being held in the beautiful Church Burial-ground at Redland Green, where, by the kindly courtesy of the vicar of Westbury, the Rev. H. J. Wilkins, M.A., the church bell was tolled both before and after the last solemn offices were rendered. Such an instance of gracious liberality was felt to be in keeping with the generous spirit of the friend who had passed away.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Honour.

"I should hate to be a sneak or a coward." So all brave honourable boys and girls would say. Men will risk their lives to preserve their honour. And honour concerns boys and girls as well as men.

What is honour?

There are two different things which go by that name. There is what people say or think about us, which is properly called reputation. Many boys, who don't much mind telling a lie, would fight if they were called a liar. Men in England, not long ago, used to fight duels if they were insulted, to defend their honour. They still do so in other countries. That honour, which other people can injure, means reputation: what other people say or think about them.

But our true honour is what we are: as we know ourselves, and as God knows us. You cannot help caring a great deal what other boys and girls say about you. But it matters a great deal more what the boy or girl inside you says about you. It is bad to be called a sneak, but it is much worse to be a sneak. Reputation, what others say, is only a reflection of what you are. Sometimes it is not much more like you than the funny reflection of yourself, which you may see in a brass door-knob or a silver spoon, when you put your face close to it. You would not like to have your portrait taken from it and exhibited. But still it would not be you. Honour stops at home while Reputation travels abroad in your name.

Honour is the substance, the thing. Reputation is the shadow. Take care of the substance, what you are; and the shadow will generally take care of itself. If it does not, the thing remains the same. You are what you are, whatever may be said.

Here are two stories about honour; and as it happens they are both about German boys.

A young man was on a walking tour in the Saxon Switzerland as it is called. He was hesitating about the road, and a boy offered his services as a guide. He was a poor, barefooted boy, and wanted to earn a trifle.

The tourist had a guide-book that told him the names of the comfortable inns in the place to which he was going, but he asked the boy about them.

The boy at once said that "The Red Trout" (if that was the name) was a very good one. But was it the best? asked the tourist. Well, the boy would not say it was the best. But he stuck to it that it was very good, and when he was asked why he wanted to take the tourist there rather than to the other, he said honestly, because they gave him "a good feed" when he took anyone there, and they did not give him anything at the other.

"The Red Trout" was marked in the guide-book as comfortable, and rather cheaper than the other. And so the tourist let his guide take him there. And the boy could enjoy his dinner with a good conscience. He wanted it very much, for perhaps he would only have had black bread and butter at home. But he would not tell a lie to get it.

The other story is about a little gentleman. He also was a little German boy, perhaps ten years old, at a village in the Harz Mountains. He came up to a party of tourists, five Dutchmen and an Englishman, and offered to show them the way to a place where there was a fine view. They did not want anyone to show them; for they knew quite well from the guide-book, and it was easy to find. The boy was shabbily dressed. He had touzled hair and no hat. And the Englishman thought it was only an excuse for begging. So he told the boy that they did not want a guide, and that they would not give him any money. But still he persisted in coming with them, chatting with the Dutchmen, whom the Englishman blamed for encouraging him.

After they had got to the place they wanted to see, the Dutchmen went on farther, leaving the Englishman alone with the boy. The boy in a friendly way pointed out this and that, till the tourist wished that he could give him something; but he thought it wasn't right.

After a time a nut came flying past his head. He turned round, and the boy at once came up to him with a handful of nuts he had gathered.

The tourist, very glad of the chance, offered him a penny for them. But the bareheaded boy drew himself up proudly and said, "I am not a beggar."

Confused and ashamed at his mistake, the young man tried to mend matters by offering the boy a sixpence in German money, which would be at least as much to him as a half-crown would be to one of you. The boy looked at it, and then, like the honourable little gentleman he was, he shook his head and said "No."

Then the tourist had a happy thought. He asked the boy, "Have you a little sister?"

"Yes," said the boy.

"Then you can take it for her."

The boy thought for a moment, and then he saw that the money was now offered as a friendly present, which he could accept for his little sister with honour. Afterwards he introduced her to the tourist with pride and pleasure.

He was a little gentleman, and had maintained his honour.

Mr. Stopford Brooke's course of lectures on English Poetry at University College was concluded on Thursday week, the lecture being on "Wordsworth's View of Nature." A vote of thanks to Mr. Brooke for his wonderfully inspiring lectures, proposed by Dr. Gregory Foster on behalf of the University College Council and of the audience, was passed with great enthusiasm. In reply, Mr. Brooke thanked the audience for their interested attention as he had led them from poet to poet, and announced that the five lectures of the autumn course would continue the subject of Wordsworth's poetry, considering the various volumes of poems in the order of their publication, beginning with the Lyrical Ballads of 1798. Subscriptions and donations are still needed for the establishment of the permanent lectureship.

AT THE HEART OF FAITH.

A FORTNIGHT ago we spoke in this column of the work of our Domestic Missions, in their special Ministry to the Poor, and return now to the same subject after what we wrote last week on the programme of new and enlarged work issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. That programme makes provision for a large amount of most admirable work, both at home and abroad. Among the various suggestions for extended efforts popular religious services in theatres and public halls are contemplated, and the idea of such services is distinctly devotional and practical, aiming not at doctrinal propaganda, but simple religious helpfulness. And whatever makes for the strengthening of the religious life in our churches must make also, indirectly at any rate, towards a more helpful ministry among the poor of our great cities. But it will be noted that in the new programme there is no reference to any larger equipment of our Domestic Missions.

That does not mean that those who direct the work of the Association are indifferent to such special ministry, or are not themselves in other connections vitally concerned with the adequate support of that other work. As a matter of fact it was the B. and F.U.A. which in this country took the lead and, at the instance of the Rev. W. J. Fox, established our first Domestic Mission in Spitalfields. But very early in the history of the movement it was judged to be better that this special ministry should be directed by a separate society, not connected in any way with doctrinal propaganda, and in 1835, the year after the establishment of the Manchester Mission, the London Domestic Mission Society was founded to take charge of the work in Spitalfields, and elsewhere as the operations of that special ministry should be extended.

It is, therefore, apart from the work of the B. and F.U.A. that these efforts to help the neglected poor receive their impulse and direction. At the same time they are an essential part of our religious duty, and spring directly from the very heart of a living faith. Those who are seekers of the light, who rejoice in the broader conception of the Divine goodness, and have found the true foundation of unconquerable faith, cannot neglect the steadfast doing of the FATHER'S will. If theirs is to be faith indeed, there must be also a deeper passion of unselfish love, which springs instinctively to the help of those whose need is greatest. We are called to preach the Gospel—but to preach it in deeds even more than in words, and in those places where the gloom is greatest and the burden heaviest.

We ask the attention of our readers for the report of the annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, which is the present representative of our first Domestic Mission in Spitalfields. The appeal for more adequate financial aid cannot be neglected, but that is only a part of the need. Both Mr. ARTHUR SHARPE, who presided at the meeting, and Mr. Gow, who as a former missionary, has very intimate knowledge of the conditions of the work in Bethnal Green, pointed to the splendid opportunity for unselfish service offered by that Mission, and urged it, not as painful self-sacrifice, but as a privilege and delight, to take even the humblest part in such efforts of pure brotherly kindness. We would add our appeal to theirs, and beg any of those who have a little leisure and goodwill, or who, even by serious effort, can give up an occasional evening, or one evening a week, to make trial of the work, and see whether it does not open out a new world of interest, in which high unselfish purpose adds nobleness to life, and new surprises of tenderness, of joy and strength, spring up upon the hidden way of the humblest faithfulness. Even those who do not see that there is any special work for them to do should go, as Mr. Gow said, and take a friendly face and the sincerity of a sympathetic interest to cheer the workers in that field of difficult duty. Then, may be, they will get fresh insight and find that after all there is something that they must do.

Mr. Gow pointed out that Mansford-street stands alone among our London Missions, with its parsonage attached, so that the missionary lives among the people to whose service he is devoted; and Mr. ELLIS, who has now completed his first winter's work in Bethnal Green, spoke of the pleasure and help he had derived from the companionship of Manchester College students, who had come down in vacation to take part in the work. They had been obliged, as Mr. ELLIS said, to find quarters at Toynbee Hall, but he evidently had it in mind to see whether there might not be scope for an independent settlement in Mansford-street itself. Not only students during vacation, but young men coming up to London for some regular work, might well take up quarters there, and serve an apprenticeship in life among the poor for which all their after years would be the better. But whether in residence or as occasional visitors and helpers, or only through sympathetic attention to the reports of others, this is to be urged upon all members of our churches, that they should know what life is among the poor, what devoted work is being done, and what the problems are, which must be faced by the community as a whole.

We have referred specially to Mansford-street, but every one of our Domestic Missions makes a similar appeal. We have received a copy of the last report of the Manchester Domestic Mission, presented to the recent annual meeting at the Town Hall, and find there the same needs and the same urgent plea for fuller equipment. After these lines were written there came in also the report of the meeting, which will be found on another page. From this, as from the report itself, it is clear that there is not yet adequate financial support, though many new subscriptions have been secured, and there is a strong committee, representative of the churches of the district.

That is the right direction to give to this work. The churches must be made to feel that it is their responsibility, that this is the most searching test of the vitality of their religion and the sincerity of their profession of Christian faith and love. These are the brethren, who have the sorest need. Here is the field of service, here also the Kingdom of GOD is to come—but not without the efforts, the self-sacrifice, of those who have received abundantly, that they may learn also to give.

AFTER A MILD WINTER.

TO-DAY upon earth's threshold springtime stands,
Not after weary waiting, as before,
Nor as a captive pent in fortress hoar
By winter, flinging down at last the bands
That bound her, breaking from her tyrant's hands,
And with her shouts of joy arousing all
The countryside as with a trumpet call;
But noiseless has she crossed the sleeping lands
And gently stolen hither, day by day,
Drawing more near and nearer, wakening,
Strewing with sweetest buds and flowers her way,
And setting all the woodland birds to sing.
Scarce may we tell when first her winsome grace
Appeared far o'er the plain, but now we see her face.

MANSFORD-STREET CHURCH AND MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The fourteenth annual meeting of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal-green, was held in the Church on Wednesday evening, March 18, Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe in the chair.

Mr. J. Classon Drummond read the Committee's report:—

The report opened with a tribute to the memory of two friends whose death had brought very grievous loss to the Mission, Miss E. J. Garrett and Mrs. Squire. Of Miss Garrett it was said: "She not only worked hard at the Mission and at some of the agencies connected with it, but she was constantly in the district in friendly touch with many poor homes. Her loss will be felt by many whose lives were helped, uplifted, and sweetened by her friendship, and by a large circle who knew her as a true good woman." It had been determined to erect a memorial of her life and work at the Mission. Mrs. Squire was one of the oldest and warmest supporters of the Mission from early Spicer-street days, and had rendered invaluable service by her superintendence of the convalescent work at Hampstead. The report further recorded the settlement of the Rev. John Ellis in April last, and spoke with warm appreciation of his work, urging the need for more helpers. It also called attention to the unsatisfactory condition of the finances. It had been necessary to trench upon capital, and an additional income of £150 was required. "It is hoped," the report added, "that this appeal will be brought prominently under the notice of many, and that the result will enable your committee to maintain the Church and Mission in a state of high efficiency. At present the Mission is largely indebted to a few friends for liberal subscriptions, but your committee are most anxious to see the total number of subscribers largely increased, and they would appeal most earnestly to all who are interested in the life and welfare of London and in the spread of free religious opinions among the poor, to consider the claims of the Mission and to support it if they are satisfied that it is, in its small way, one of the centres which is exerting an uplifting influence in the district in which it is placed. Your committee ask all who are connected with our Free Churches to consider this appeal and to weigh carefully the responsibility that rests on them to help the work of brightening the dark places in this metropolis by contributing their share of time or money."

Miss L. Jones, as Treasurer, presented the accounts, which showed receipts amounting to £365 16s. 3d., including £251 12s. in annual subscriptions, £52 19s. in donations, a grant of £25 from the L.D.U.S., and £15 from the B. and F.U.A. The expenditure amounted to £438 3s. 9d., and there was a deficit of £47 11s. 2d. to make up. £121 6s. had therefore been taken from the capital account, making the total £487 2s. 3d., and leaving £1 7s. 4d. in hand. In the capital account there remained a balance of £95 16s. 2d.

Mr. W. J. Clark presented the Chapel Committee's report, which contained a full record of the year's activities, with satisfactory results throughout.

The Rev. John Ellis read his report, which spoke with great hopefulness of the prospects of the work on which he had entered, and of the agencies, "well planned and equipped," which he had found established at the Mission. He asked for more helpers in the work of the Provident Society, which in 1902 had about 875 depositors and collected £567. The Convalescent and Country Holiday Fund had done admirable work. He emphasised the value of the worship hour on Sundays, and spoke with great satisfaction of the work of the Sunday-school; but there a superintendent was greatly needed, to set free the minister for other special work. The report then continued:—

Of the more personal aspects of our work I may not speak at length. It has been one of the most gratifying features of my new experience that I have been the medium through which an expression of Brotherhood had reached the poor and distressed. Many a home has been brightened and many a heart lightened by the gifts which have come to me from numerous and generous donors for my Poor's Purse and Christmas Fund. In addition to this practical beneficence which has been rendered possible by the help of others, there have been most sacred and private ministries with the sick and those in trouble, and by the bedside of the dying, of which I cannot write. I refer to them in this report to indicate that, although a stranger to the district, nevertheless there have been already confidences which make the conditions of a fruitful ministry.

Reference has already been made to the losses the Mission has sustained through the departure to the higher life of Miss E. J. Garrett and Mrs. Squire. None feel this loss more acutely than your minister. That these consecrated lives, whose thought and care for the poor, the sick, and sad within the reach of the influence of this Mission should have been removed at the very beginning of one's ministry is hard to contemplate. May God in His goodness fill others with a kindred spirit, so that the work they so well began may be maintained and continued.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, offered a cordial welcome to Mr. Ellis, and congratulated him on the record of the year's work. He referred in sympathetic terms to the losses recorded in the report, and thought there should be no difficulty in making up the additional income required. He dwelt especially upon the many opportunities of work, for young and old alike, offered by the Mission; there was no gift or capacity which could not find some opening for helpful service, and no one could appreciate the real good they would receive by coming down to help, until they had done it. Only in self-sacrifice could they find the true way of life. Until they had done some work for others in self-forgetfulness, they had not experienced the real joys of life.

Mr. Alfred Thompson seconded the resolution. Speaking as one intimately associated with the work of the Mission, he referred to the pleasure with which they had welcomed Mr. Ellis, who came in a spirit of appreciation of the faithful work done by Mr. and Mrs. Cadman during the previous nine years. He urged the young people especially to make full use of the opportunities offered to them in Mr. Ellis' ministry. He paid a touching tribute to the memory of Miss Garrett, whose life had been so wrapt up in the people of that district. She delighted to be one of them, and to share their experiences, whether of joy or sorrow. Thus she would go with a poor woman to the funeral of her child, or sweep up the hearth for some poor sick woman, and by her ready sympathy she drew to herself the confidences of rough men. As to the work of the Mission, he pointed out the danger of placing too many offices on a few willing shoulders, and asked for many more helpers, each to take a share of the burden.

The Rev. Henry Gow moved a resolution of appreciation of Mr. Ellis's work, and of appeal for more helpers. He said they must congratulate themselves and that congregation on having such a leader as Mr. Ellis. On every side he heard expressions of gratification and delight at his services and the energy with which he was throwing himself into that work with its splendid opportunities. It had been a year of exceptional sadness through the losses they had sustained, yet he noted an exceptional hopefulness in the reports. That showed the real worth of the friends whom they had lost. Their influence had brought a new energy of purpose, a new consecration into the lives of the young people, who were ready humbly to follow them and do something of the kind of work they did. In that Mission they had a splendid equipment, and it afforded a unique opportunity for service, especially as Mr. and Mrs. Ellis lived there, among the people. But they must remember that their minister would need on that account to come into contact with other life and thought. Friends must come down with help and friendly sympathy. Young people, even if they did not find any special work to do, should take the brightness of their presence and friendly interest to cheer the workers there, and women especially should remember that they could cheer the minister's wife. In that great East End of London, so full of opportunities of help and of learning, of giving and of getting help, that Church had a great opportunity, and they felt that Mr. Ellis was just the man for the work. Their business was not only to furnish financial support, but to sustain those who were working there by personal help.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. J. G. Foster, and very cordially passed.

The Rev. J. Ellis, in response, spoke of the great difference between his work at the Mission and that he had left in the North. He had had to learn wise methods in the administration of charity, and he had found great satisfaction in the work of the Country Holiday Fund. He felt deeply the responsibility of his position, and the great opportunity it offered. He made an earnest appeal for more personal help from men and women of culture and leisure. He had already a large body of devoted helpers, but the field was very great, and they needed all the refining and uplifting influences they could secure.

On the motion of Mr. Walter Baily, seconded by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, the Committee of officers were then appointed. Mr. Wicksteed spoke of the great privilege of the work of such a Mission, based as it was on the appeal of pure religion to the inmost and the best that was in them. It was their happiness to be able to give a little of that in which they were so rich to those who were poor in spiritual riches. Work was carried on there vigorously throughout the week. Whatever they undertook, religion was to be brought to light in it. When they took up any work, they ought to ask themselves how it was going to contribute to the one thing needful.

A resolution of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Mr. S. W. Preston, and seconded by Mr. E. F. Grundy, brought the meeting to a close.

MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting was held on Tuesday, March 17, in the Lord Mayor's Parlour, Town Hall, Manchester. The Lord Mayor was in the chair at the opening of the proceedings. The Mission's two centres of work are in Collyhurst and Hulme, where much active work is being carried on among the poor. Schools, services, banks, clubs, boys' brigades, recreative classes, and many other activities go on throughout the year. The annual report, which is an interesting account of these enterprises, says:—

In these days, when the tendency of popular thought is to lay an ever-growing stress on the consideration of practical social needs and on the solution of pressing problems of poverty and distress, the work of the Missions and their ministers is assuming not a less but a greater importance than ever before in their long and varied history. . . . The domestic missionary in his daily work is brought into close contact with the lives of those among whom he labours, and he is first of all a religious and moral teacher.

Further, as the report says, he is a social reformer, and it is his duty, by agencies and societies, as well as by personal influences, to combat the forces and tendencies that produce the social evils, and to ameliorate the conditions of those who have to endure them. The committee appeal for a larger number of helpers, so that the work can be more efficiently done and extended. The accounts show an adverse balance of nearly £65, largely due to the loss of old subscribers through death and otherwise.

The Lord Mayor, in a brief speech, warmly commended the work of the Mission, and Mr. D. A. Little, the hon. treasurer, drew attention to the urgent need for more funds, saying that the subscriptions ought to amount to at least £150 a year more than they did at present.

Miss H. M. Johnson, of Liverpool, moved a resolution adopting the reports of the missionaries and expressing sympathy with them in their work. She pointed out that house to house visitation was the first object of the Mission, and the aim of the missionaries was to become the friends of the poor amongst whom they worked. But as the work progressed it was found that the homes of the poor were so wretched in the congested districts that it was necessary to provide for the young some kind of home life, and so the Mission buildings came to play a more and more important part. The missionaries were trying to bring to the poor not theological doctrine but "religion which comes from the heart that has religion in it." The Missions were helping to break down the mutual ignorance and misunderstanding between the cultured and uncultured classes. They made a bridge between classes, which in an ideal state of society would be unnecessary, but which was most useful at present.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal claimed for the work that it was most thorough and effective in that it tried to change the people themselves even before it tried to change the evil conditions which surrounded them. He seconded the resolution.

The missionaries, the Revs. J. W. Bishop and A. W. Timmis, in addressing the meeting, urged upon it the necessity of extending the accommodation at both the Missions. They now have to definitely refuse to admit any more new scholars.

The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, spoke of the work that was being done in that city, and of the splendid buildings they had erected for the purpose; and he invited Manchester friends to go and inspect them.

Towards the end of the meeting, Mrs. C. Roper, in a few remarks, emphasised the need for extension of premises. She thought their inadequacy was a disgrace to Manchester Unitarians, who would surely readily find the money required if they only knew how urgent the need was, and what great increase of work was possible. She had heard that an anonymous friend of the Missions had already offered to subscribe £200, and she therefore moved a resolution "That a Subscription List be at once started, and the scheme of extension proceeded with," offering herself to contribute £10 towards the sum required.

The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

BIRKENHEAD UNITARIAN CHURCH.

OPENING OF THE NEW CHURCH.

The new church in Bessborough-road, which the Birkenhead Unitarians have built, further out of town than their original church in Charing Cross, was opened on Thursday evening, March 19. The foundation-stone was laid in December, 1901, by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, whose uncle, the late Rev. R. L. Carpenter, became the first minister of the Charing Cross Church in 1851, and the old church was rendered notable also by the long ministry of the late Rev. William Binns.

Since the removal to Bessborough-road, the congregation have worshipped in the Lecture Hall, which they erected first, and there on Thursday, before the formal opening of the church, a crowded meeting was held in celebration of the event. The Rev. James Crossley, minister of the church, presided, in the absence, through illness, of Mr. Frederick Jevons, the chairman. A further shadow was cast over the celebration by the death that day of Mr. Charles Willmer, which prevented the vice-chairman, Mr. A. W. Willmer, also from being present. The proceedings were characterised by great earnestness and enthusiasm. Among those present were the Mayor of Birkenhead (Dr. R. Owen Morris), the Revs. Charles Hargrove, H. W. Hawkes, W. J. Jupp, H. D. Roberts, J. M. Mills, H. E. Haycock, and A. E. Parry, Mr. Charles W. Jones, and many other friends from Liverpool, as well as from the Cheshire side.

The Rev. James Crossley, in opening the proceedings, made sympathetic reference to the death of Mr. Willmer, and also of another member of the congregation, Mrs. P. J. Winser. He was glad to say that Mr. Jevons's health was slowly improving. In regard to the new church, the outlook from a financial point of view was very promising. Despite many disadvantages, very satisfactory progress had been made during the past six years, in which time the amount of money collected had been equal to that contributed during the previous ten years. This offered a further cause for satisfaction as an indication of the unity which existed between the members of the congregation and the harmonious manner in which they worked together. Now that larger accommodation had been acquired they would no doubt be able to extend their work, and enable it to prove of greater service. They had a band of young men on whom he looked with the greatest pride and pleasure. He was sure that if some lady members of the congregation came forward and undertook amongst the young women similar work to that which had been carried on amongst the young men by Mr. Arthur Willmer and Mr. Embury, their efforts would be attended with equal success and supported with equal loyalty. He thought they might look forward with confidence to their future. They had at last a beautiful building in which to meet for worship, and where they could explain their views to those who came to hear them. Their main function as a Church was to try to build up in those who came within their influence noble ideals of life and citizenship, and he felt assured that they would do their part amongst the churches of the town in helping these forces.

Mr. Charles W. Jones expressed the pleasure he felt in speaking on behalf of the other congregations of the neighbourhood. He was sure all connected with the body in that district and across the water would rejoice with the congregation at the conclusion of that work. Although they were a Church without organisation, they were bound together in fellowship, which was better than any organisation. He hoped that church would prove what all churches ought to be—a family affair, not, however, in the narrow sense, for he hoped their co-operation would be so extended as to include the congregations of other churches.

His Worship the Mayor, having alluded to the sad loss they had sustained by the death of Mr. Charles Willmer, heartily congratulated the congregation on that most auspicious occasion. He thought the congregation deserved considerable commendation from their fellow-citizens for having built within the borough boundaries an edifice which from artistic recommendations would be a delight to look upon, and which as a place of worship would be a great help to those who assembled there to adore their Creator. Referring to the Unitarian body, the Mayor said he personally regarded them as having done a great deal for culture and freedom of thought in the country to which they belonged. The very freedom with which it was possible for the members of that Church to address themselves to the problems of religious life and thought had proved of considerable help to those outside their own denomination, by causing others to emulate their example in addressing themselves to new aspects of thought with greater freedom than might have been otherwise possible. To-day they stood in a very different attitude to what they did a few generations ago, in regard to the distinctions of creed, and he hoped that the day would soon arrive when the bonds of brotherhood would be drawn closer together between the Unitarians of Birkenhead and the members of the other religious bodies that worshipped within the borough boundaries. They were all indebted to the great leaders of thought within the Unitarian Church as was testified by the veneration in which they held the name of Channing and that great mind, Dr. Martineau, who so recently passed away full of years and honour. He hoped that church would address itself to the problem of helping to raise the spiritual life within the borough beyond what was worldly and material. He congratulated them most heartily on the fine building they had erected, and he hoped in the years to come they would prove a real factor in all that appertained to the well-being of the borough—that they would go in heartily for all that was best in their municipal and educational work, and that their church would prove an influence for the spread of interest in all that affected the good of the community in which they lived.

The ceremony of opening the church was then performed by Miss Jevons, in the absence of her father, Mr. Frederick Jevons. Miss Jevons was escorted by the Mayor to the principal entrance of the church, where she performed the ceremony with a silver key, and said, "This church is now open to the worship of Almighty God."

THE FIRST SERVICE.

An impressive service, conducted by the Rev. James Crossley, was afterwards held in the church, which was crowded to its utmost capacity. The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., was the preacher, and in the course of an eloquent sermon on the principles of Unitarianism, he said they were met there for the first service in that new church. They had laid the foundations firm; they had raised the walls, roofed in their church, and furnished it with proper fittings for a home of worship; but they had not built for themselves alone; they had also built for generations yet unborn. They looked forward to a time when some old man, now a boy at school, would perhaps preach to a congregation whose leaders would be the children of to-day—nay, to a centenary and bi-centenary to be kept with thanksgiving and rejoicing by men and women who would remember them as the founders of this church who held firm to faith and lived and died very long ago. They might, however, dig deep and make their walls strong and secure their roof with beams seasoned against the ravages of time, but if an earthquake should take place beneath, what would their labour avail? Assuredly, the signs of the times were disquieting, but the horizon was never free from clouds, and to the biassed observers of each generation it had ever seemed that their own day was dark with prognostications and impending doom. It was necessary for them, therefore, to consider what were the things essential in religion, and how they might so reform the administration of religion as to meet effectually the real needs of the people.

Referring in conclusion to the restlessness caused by conflicting religious dogmas, he said they must dig deep beneath the shifting sands of ever varying opinions, beneath the alluvial deposits of venerable traditions, if they would reach the bed-rock which underlay the accumulations of the ages. There alone would they find the foundation which could be shaken neither by the advance of knowledge nor by the inevitable changes of the years.

It was a pleasant feature in the service that the choir was joined for the occasion by that of the Liscard Memorial Church, Mr. F. J. Rymer being at the organ.

The total cost of the new church and lecture hall, including the price of the land, has been between £11,000 and £12,000.

A REMEDY FOR OUR RELIGIOUS INEFFECTIVENESS.

Sir,—The topics dealt with in your leading article last week raise issues of very great importance for our Church life, and, indeed, for the whole future of the religious movement which many of us are trying to serve to the best of our ability. We are on the eve of the National Conference, when important questions of policy will be discussed, and when it seems not unlikely that a bold appeal may be made for a new departure in the interests of a larger religious idealism. The time seems ripe for some frank utterance, and for a resolute effort to face the facts. I have no wish to speak in any tone of complaint. Fifteen years of happy, and, I hope, not unfruitful, work in the ministry leave me much to be thankful for; but the fact remains of a conviction, which grows continually stronger, of our spiritual ineffectiveness. We can, under a sudden impulse, raise large sums of money for special purposes. Occasionally we are able to galvanize the churches of a particular district into spasmodic effort. But then we hand the money over to a small body of individual subscribers and let them manage it for us in their own way, the impulse is allowed to exhaust itself, and, so far as any quickened sense of fellowship and responsibility in the churches is concerned, the effort might just as well have never been made. Twenty-one years ago the money was raised for the Sustentation Fund. At the present time a small group of subscribers take an interest in it, but hardly any outside the aided churches even realise that it exists. As a bond of religious fellowship, and the expression of a common religious responsibility, the Fund has been a failure. No blame is to be attached to the managers, and I am not criticising their administration in any way. I simply use the fact—one out of many—as a telling illustration of our rigid adherence to individualistic traditions and the necessary penalty.

With all their quiet cultivation of piety, and their noble loyalty to truth, our churches remain ineffective for all the larger purposes of a common life; and it is this very ineffectiveness which, in an increasing degree, strikes even the sympathetic outsider. A short time ago a keen and not unfriendly critic observed to me that the statics of our movement are far more obvious than its dynamics.

But it is easy to criticise. What is the remedy? I confess that I have not much hope from a mere resolution at the Conference, deeply pledged as I am to the policy which is stated in outline in the Committee's report. Nor do I expect any spiritual awakening to result from a successful appeal for £3,000 contributed chiefly by a few generous individuals, good and useful as the work which will be accomplished by means of this money may be, especially if the Unitarian Association is wise enough not to try to thwart or cramp the new forces which are moving in the Conference. A beginning must be made with small groups, and especially with the centre of individualistic tradition, the local church. It needs to feel the breath of a larger life, and above all to realise itself not as a group of atoms like a heap of sand, but as an organism, a living society with common privileges and duties. I fear that the ordinary way of managing a church among us is almost fatal to this idea. At present the spiritual concerns of the church are left to the minister, and the management of property and finance is in the hands of the Committee. As a rule the minister does not attend the meetings of the Committee. He is left without adequate and regular opportunities for sympathy and consultation to walk in the old paths or to try experiments according to his judgment, while the Committee would feel almost uncomfortable if it were asked to engage in earnest religious discussion as an essential part of its business. Could any arrangement be devised more inconsistent with the real interests of a living spiritual society? I believe that the tenacity with which we cling to this separation between the sacred and the secular and throw the whole responsibility for religious thought and work upon the minister is responsible, as much as anything, for the absence of those quickening impulses and strong sympathies which make a church an effective organism for religious purposes.

Let me suggest that we should try to supersede the old-fashioned Committee by a Church Council. This Church Council should be large enough to represent all the best elements in the congregation. The minister, of course, should have a seat on it, and the women and young people should serve as well as the older men. The Council should meet every two months or quarterly, and at its first meeting for the year would appoint the necessary sub-committees for finance, music, Sunday-school, &c. At the ordinary meetings it would receive reports from these sub-committees, and transact business of sufficient importance to be brought before the larger body, but it should also be part of its regular work to consider the religious welfare of the Church, to discuss new plans of activity, to suggest improvements, to watch for fresh opportunities, and to keep itself in close sympathetic touch with missionary work and all the movements of religious life, both local and national, for which it has a special affinity. A Church Council of this kind would develop a strong feeling of common life and interest among the members, and from them it would extend to the congregation as a whole. From the congregation the contagion would spread to the local union, and through the local unions to the National Conference, and we should then have duly organised and articulated the natural organs for the expression of a strong, healthy, and progressive Church life.

May I add that though a transformation of this kind must necessarily be gradual, there are great opportunities before the forthcoming Conference. All that I have tried faintly to indicate in this letter may be helped effectually or retarded most seriously by the attitude which is assumed of sympathy or the reverse for the policy of the Conference Committee with its bold appeal for greater religious effectiveness on lines which transcend our crippling individualistic traditions. That policy represents strong convictions, which have been thought out with care and a full sense of responsibility. It is offered to the churches in the interests of nobler life and larger usefulness. For myself, I believe that the plan of religious work, represented by the secular Church Committee and the private society with eleemosynary relations to weak congregations, has failed, and will continue to fail. The hope for the future is in the Conference. The former cannot kindle the imagination and appeal to the social instinct; the Conference does because it is rooted in living thought and a religious ideal. It is only by being faithful to this ideal, and by allowing it to infuse fresh life into every branch of our activity, from the least to the greatest, that we can hope to remove the reproach of our religious ineffectiveness.

THE SUPREME NEED OF THE HOUR.

Sir,—While the whole of your admirable article of last week, headed "Enlarged Work," demands thoughtful and careful attention on all hands, it is supremely desirable that special attention should be paid to what you say as to the need of some clear understanding among all engaged in the manifold and multiform activities your article refers to, and which your pages are now recording. While, indeed, the main drift of all these varied signs of new life, new inspiration, and new power, in our small group of Free Churches is such as all lovers of the Liberal Faith must be thankful for and rejoice in, yet it is equally certain that these things, as a whole, also bear within themselves the seeds and signs of still further confusion, complication, and bewilderment in our ranks. No one can possibly read, with due care and consideration, the document just issued by the B. and F.U.A., in regard to its attempt to raise and expend £3,000 a year additional to its present income and expenditure, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, give equal heed to the report and the projects of the Committee of the Triennial Conference of our churches, without seeing that the two great and complex movements thus separately contemplated, by two distinct bodies, not to mention any others, cannot both be made truly successful, when weighed and measured with reference to the well-being, the unity, and the harmony of our Free Churches as a whole. How, for instance, can we, as a body of Free Churches, logically, consistently, and successfully promote and support both the National Conference Committee's project of "a paid secretary and pastor-at-large" and the additional project of the appointment of a "travelling missionary" by the B. and F.U. A.? It cannot be wisely and well done at all; and any attempt to do it must lead to confusion worse confounded within our own borders, and to an enormous increase in the bewilderment of outsiders when they watch our more characteristic methods of procedure. Nor can the other parts of the two schemes be carried out together with any better issue, as surely all who take the trouble to consider the facts, the logic, and the moral of the situation must see.

The supreme need of the hour, before any new movement whatever, on either hand, was projected, was that the Committee of the B. and F.U.A. and the Committee of the National Conference should have met together in mutual and friendly conference, not simply to arrange a special basis of wise mutual action for the special occasion, but to lay down an equally wise and solid general foundation for future action in regard to all our collective movements. We have verily reached the hour for this, and if we have also found the men for the hour, it will be well with us. Certain it is that, whatever be the actual case with those who stand at the front, the rank and file of our people begin to clearly see that it is now, above all other things, absolutely necessary to settle once for all the question as to whether we are to be "a Free Catholic Church," with or without a "private doctrinal association," as was verbally, though not really, agreed on a generation since, or "a distinctively Unitarian den o mination" or "Unitarian Church," and whether, therefore, our churches are to be organised on a Unitarian basis, with the B. and F. renovated as our head centre, or on the Free Church basis, with the Triennial Conference made annual as our representative assembly. Some of us, both ministers and people, decidedly prefer the one, and some of us quite as decidedly prefer the other; but the essentially necessary thing is to come to an agreement, all round, in the one way or the other. At present we are, at least, really two denominations in one, and the more these consequent separate projects sectionally succeed the more they will divide us, so that their fullest success in one way can but measure their completest failure in another.

Without further delay, then, let the two Committees of the chief organisations concerned meet together in this way and for the purpose I have already ventured to suggest. Let them thus agree among themselves what our churches essentially are, on what collective basis they shall be organised, and by what one collective name they shall be known, and then let the two committees submit their united proposals to their respective constituencies, with the ultimate design of submitting them also, in some adequately representative way, to the whole body of our churches. That such an attempt to lead all our churches into line with each other is desirable no one can doubt, and, if it be deemed impossible, it will be because we "have not known" in this our day "the things that belong unto our peace," and have proved ourselves blind to "the time of our visitation." PROPOSED PRIESTLEY MEMORIAL IN BIRMINGHAM.

Sir,—Any suggestion emanating from the Rev. Joseph Wood is worthy of respect, but I imagine that many will dissent from his proposal to found a theological lectureship—or at least there will be many, like the Rev. J. C. Street, to whom it will be a matter of some indifference. It seems to me that theology is too much with us already, and that what is mainly lacking in Unitarianism is a more pronounced spirituality and more organised enterprise.

Be this as it may, I would suggest, as an alternative proposal, that a Priestley Memorial Church be erected in one of the Birmingham suburbs—one where success would most likely result. For example, I believe the time is ripe for the establishment of a Unitarian church between the residential suburb of Erdington and the populous district of Aston.

One reason why the churches in large towns are not so well attended as they ought to be, is that so many people now go to reside in the suburbs, where fresh air and quiet may be obtained. These people have a natural disinclination to visit town on the seventh day as well as on the other six, and when they find that the visit entails an enormous loss of time, the disorganisation of family life, &c, they can scarcely be blamed for staying at home. Besides, suburban members of a town church cannot conveniently participate in its social life, whilst young children—and this, I think, the most important point of all—are entirely excluded from church benefits.

There is one other consideration. Would not Unitarians, when deciding to move from residence in town to residence in a suburb, naturally give priority of choice to that suburb where a Unitarian church exists? As it is they usually become a loss alike to their Church and to their Cause. R. H. Matthews.

DECADENCE.

Sir,—I know I am but a bad Unitarian, but I venture to think that I am not so bad as I might be, or, indeed, as I think even I should be if I should now consent to sell my birthright, as Esau did, for a mess of pottage.

Pottage is all very well, but it should be made by honest, earnest cookery of our own for ourselves, from our own venison, and coloured with our own red lentils, and we ought to have deserved it by faithful, brave hunting, as our own faithful and brave fathers and mothers did.

It is not good enough for us to be thankful—to be satisfied with an education for our and other people's children, if it is to be salted with catechism and flavoured with Athelstan Riley sauce—observe the signature!

We ought not to be made by anybody to pay for management by the nominees of an alien clergy and their statutory majority, or, what is worse still, for studious intrusion by a crafty priesthood, whether Roman or Anglican, of lessons which we know to be false and corrupting.

It is all very well no doubt for us to be satisfied that we or our neighbours' children shall get such education as we can find, and to trust to some correction of the colour, the odour, or the flavour which they are to be compelled to be subjected to, by such means as Sunday-schooling, children's services, and home teaching.

Religious teaching in satisfactory Sunday-schools will be strangely disturbed by the objectionable lessons at the day-school, and, after all, multitudes of children will never attend it.

The art of conducting services for children has not yet been effectively studied for general use, however anxiously tried here and there; and, lastly, have our parents sufficiently maintained the old family custom of home worship and home teaching, and of home religious atmosphere?

How many are unable or even unwilling to try this experiment, and in every case the poison will have been and will be instilled in the day-school, and only antagonised in the remedies.

Sympathy and bias and loyalty to truth and religion seem to be left to be overcome by worldly prudence, slackened watchfulness, and by much of what is called in the facile tongue of the faluter, liberality and toleration!

The three Rs are not enough to save souls, and are of little good anywhere without religion, and woe to the "Unitarians," if for any pottage of schooling they sell their birthright of principle and sacrifice for civil and religious liberty!

MANCHESTER GRAND BAZAAR.

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to call the attention of your readers to our announcement in your advertisement columns? We are encouraged, by many warm expressions of sympathy and much generous help received from all parts of the country, to believe that a very wide interest is being taken in the recent developments as well as in the more mature branches of the Association's work. Amongst the former, the establishment of our Holiday Home at Great Hucklow, and the maintenance of a Convalescent Home at Blackpool take the first place. At our Holiday Home over a thousand of our scholars and teachers get a week's holiday annually during the summer months. When the Home was unoccupied for a chance week last year, a party of some sixty poor mothers with infant children were sent out from our missions. The erection and furnishing of the Home, with its 100 beds, large day-room, &c., cost over £1,600, and the whole amount has been raised within a few pounds. We have, however, this year to build a matron's room, and to make some other improvements, which will cost about £100. Our Convalescent Home is open all the year round, and it is an unspeakable boon to our schools. Unfortunately we have to limit admissions to quite young children, and to refuse the applications of young teachers and elder scholars. So persistent and urgent, however, have these latter become that the committee have decided to make additional provision to meet the demand. The music, lantern, lecturing, visiting, temperance, and other departments of work are also calling for more help, and altogether £1,000 at least is required at once. May I appeal to your readers to help us in raising this amount? Any contributions in money or goods will be most gratefully received by either of the gentlemen named in our advertisement, or by myself.

Charles Peach,
Chairman of Committee.
68, Richmond-grove, Manchester.

National Conference.—Mr. Blake Odgers, K.C., has given notice to the acting hon. secretary of the Conference that at the business meeting to be held at Liverpool on Thursday, April 23, he will move as an amendment to the motion relating to the appointment of a paid secretary, "That the Committee be authorised to appoint a paid secretary of the Conference, who shall not be a pastor-at-large, and who shall be paid a salary not exceeding £100 a year."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday Morning, or Thursday at latest.]

Byker.—At the week-night evening service at the Unitarian Mission Church on Wednesday week, the Rev. Frank Walters lectured on the question, "Was Jesus God?" giving an eloquent and masterly exposition of the Unitarian view of the subject, and was listened to with rapt attention by a numerous congregation. Mr. J. Glendining conducted the devotional portion of the service.

Central Postal Mission.—In recognition of his thirteen years' ministry at Framlingham and Bedfield, a clock with an inscription, and a purse containing £24, has been presented to the Rev. A. Amey by the members and friends of the Central Postal Mission, on his settlement in the West of England.

Chelmsford.—The chapel was well filled last Sunday evening, when Mr. Aylmer Maude, of Great Baddow, conducted the service, the subject of his discourse being "Catholicism, Protestantism, and the Society of Friends."

Dundee.—The Rev. H. Williamson, who came to Dundee straight from College in 1866, and has ministered there ever since, with only one proper holiday in all that time, is now about to visit America, and hopes to be present at the Whitsuntide meetings in Boston. During his absence the congregation have arranged with the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Kirkcaldy, to supply the pulpit.

Edinburgh.—During the winter the St. Mark's Chapel Literary Society has had a most successful series of lectures. The course was inaugurated by the Rev. R. B. Drummond with a Shakespearian reading, and among the lectures were "Homes and Haunts of R. Louis Stevenson," "Some Bits of Suburban Edinburgh," and "The Roman Wall, from the Tyne to the Solway." On the 23rd inst. Mr. R. C. H. Morison, the popular reciter, brought together a talented company of ladies and gentlemen, who contributed a brilliant entertainment for the closing night. Notwithstanding the prevailing inclement weather, the audiences have been very encouraging.

Killinchy.—The annual soirée in connection with the Remonstrant Church was held on Tuesday week, when about 500 sat down to tea. At a subsequent meeting the Rev. Joseph Geary presided, and spoke of the value of such social gatherings. He trusted that means of this sort would be oftener used for the purpose of binding them together as minister and people. Miss M'Ilwrath (organist at the church) gave some fine selections of music on the new organ, which were much appreciated. A fine series of cinematograph views were then shown, after which the singing of the National Anthem brought to a close a very successful meeting.

King's Lynn.—A very successful concert was held in the schoolroom on Wednesday week, and there was also a stall for the sale of useful articles, and a refreshment stall. Alderman R. Green presided, and in a few introductory remarks said that although it was a very unusual thing for him to take part in anything connected with a chapel, he was very glad to be there that evening to show his sympathy with them, as he owed a great deal to the eminent writers and thinkers of the Unitarian body, especially Channing and the poet-philosopher Emerson. A capital programme of music was rendered; also some phonograph selections and amusing experiments in hypnotism. There was a large attendance.

Liscard.—The general meeting of the Wednesday Evening Society took place on March 18 in the Memorial Church Hall, the President, Mr. S. Wellington in the chair. The Committee's report, presented by the secretary, Mr. H. P. Houghton, showed that during the session there had been twenty-three meetings of the society, with an average attendance of 136. There were ninety-six members' names on the roll. Perhaps the most satisfactory feature of the session was the increased attendance on the lecture evenings, which averaged 102 at nine lectures. As owing mainly to the needs of the Wednesday Evening Society the Committee of the Memorial Church had increased the accommodation of their hall by the addition of a gallery, it was proposed to contribute towards the expenses of this alteration a sum of twenty guineas out of the funds of the society. The meeting adopted the report, and the usual votes of thanks were passed, and the committee and officers for next session elected. The general meeting was followed by an "At Home," which was attended by about 100 members and friends of the society.

London: Forest Gate.—A brief farewell meeting, in connection with Mr. Frank Kilburn's removal to Leeds, was held after service on Sunday evening, when testimony to valuable services rendered to the congregation for more than three years past was given. Mr. Perris presided, and a gold-mounted fountain pen was presented as a trifling memento. Mr. Indge and Mr. Sidney Brown made the presentation.

London: Peckham.—The twentieth anniversary meeting of the Avondale Band of Hope was held on Tuesday evening. After tea and a short miscellaneous programme, the Chairman, Mr. J. Bredall, called upon the secretary, Mr. A. J. Cooley, to read the report, which expressed regret that owing to various causes the attendance during the past year had somewhat fallen off. There were, however, promises of improvement, and the day of meeting had been changed to the first and third Tuesdays in each month. The prizes were distributed by the Rev. F. Allen, who delivered a telling address.

Malton.—Four lectures have been given during the winter in connection with the Mutual Improvement and Social Society, including "General Gordon," by the Rev. Ottwell Binns, and "Caedmon," by the Rev. C. Hargrove.

Manchester: Longsight.—On Monday evening, the 16th inst., the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., welcomed to his "At Home" over 150 members of the congregation and friends, who attended in response to an invitation tendered in his double capacity as minister and as president of the Gaskell Literary Society. A musical programme of a high-class character, arranged by Mr. H. O. Heys, added greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. The Gaskell Literary Society has had a very successful season, thanks to the able lectures of local Unitarian ministers and friends.

Manchester: Moss Side.—A small bazaar, organised by the Ladies' Sewing Society, was held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Free Church on Friday and Saturday, March 20 and 21, for the purpose of clearing off a small deficit on current account, and, mainly, to augment the organ fund. As a result, after paying expenses, a net profit of over £300 has been realised. On the first day the bazaar was opened by Mrs. John Harwood, of Bolton, chairman, Councillor R. G. Lawson; and on the second day by Mr. F. Monks, J.P., of Warrington, chairman, Councillor A. Burgon. This has been a most successful effort, the aim being to raise £250. The anniversary of the church is to be held to-morrow (Sunday), when it will be exactly sixteen years since the work in Moss Side began. During that time about £16,000 has been raised for the maintenance of services and the erection of church and school buildings. The Rev. Charles Roper, who is the first minister of this church, has held his office fourteen and a half years.

Manchester: Oldham-road.—Never in its history has the Unitarian Free Church had so many men present at one service as on Saturday last, when the Rev. Walter Reynolds conducted the funeral of Mr. John Hazzlewood, the manager of the Corporation Cleansing Department, Oldham-road. The body of the church was filled, the workmen from the Corporation forming the major part of the congregation, whilst deputations from the Oddfellows Friendly Society and the Engineers Trade Society were also present. Mr. Hazzlewood has been a member of the church for thirty years, and for teens of years served on the committee. Mr. Reynolds preached a funeral sermon to a good congregation on Sunday evening. The choir sang the anthem, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," and "The Dead March" in Saul was played on the organ.

Parkstone.—Emerson Hall was crowded on Sunday afternoon, many standing outside by the wide open doors to hear an address by Mr. W. T. Stead, of the Review of Reviews. Mr. Bushrod took the chair, and the meeting opened, as usual, with a hymn and prayer and scripture readings. After an anthem had been contributed by the Poole choir, Mr. Stead gave his address, from the text, "I was a stranger, and ye took me in." It was a remarkable exposition of practical Christianity, and pointed out that Christ did not promulgate theories but held up a life, and that same life had to be the mark of our calling. Mr. Stead put the question very pointedly—had any present during the past month, or even the past year, taken a stranger into their homes? If not, how far had they fulfilled the requirements of Christian discipleship? and how were they going to meet the day of reckoning? He invited all present to commence from that day the Christian duty of inviting once a week a stranger into their homes and so endeavour to make the "brotherhood of man" more than a phrase. He promised, if this were generally attempted, that he would come down again in a month's time to hold an experience meeting.

Sale.—The Rev. W. L. Schroeder, M.A., is delivering a series of Sunday evening lectures during March upon "Unitarianism." The first address dealt with "The Principles of Unitarianism," and was followed by others on "The Bible" and "The Eternal God." Subsequent addresses will be delivered on "Jesus Christ: Son of God," and "The Abiding Law of Righteousness." So far the attendance has been very satisfactory, and those present listened with great appreciation to Mr. Schroeder's thoughtful and interesting discourses.

Sevenoaks: Bessell's Green.—The annual meeting was held at the Old Meeting House on Wednesday last, when there was a fairly good attendance of members and friends, including the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards and the Rev. F. Allen, of London. Mr. A. J. Peppercorn presented the treasurer's report and statement of accounts, which were of a satisfactory character. The officers and committee were re-elected for another year. The resident minister, the Rev. F. Teasdale Reed, who presided, gave an interesting account of the work done during the past year, including the establishment of a "Good-Will Society," the delivery of week-day lectures at Sevenoaks, and the holding of evening services at the Old Meeting House. An interesting feature of the meeting was an account of the origin and history of the Bessell's Green congregation (going back considerably more than 200 years), compiled and presented by Mr. T. B. Cowell. It is hoped this may take pamphlet form. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards and the Rev. F. Allen both spoke a few words, helpful and encouraging. An excellent musical programme added to the enjoyment of the evening.

South Shields.—On Monday week Mr. Thomas Paxton gave a lantern lecture descriptive of "Egypt and the Nile." Mr. G. Scott, chairman of the South Shields Board of Guardians, presided. The lecture is fully reported in the local Free Press.

Trowbridge.—On Tuesday week, in connection with the Young People's Class, a social took place in the Conigre Chapel schoolroom, when upwards of seventy young people gathered for enjoyment and mutual society. There was a refreshment stall, and a varied programme was rendered during the evening. On Sunday evening the Salvation Army held a service in the schoolroom, which was crowded. The band accompanied the singing, and the Rev. J. Wain offered prayers. Staff-Captain Parkin, a lady from Swindon, then delivered an admirable address on the work and methods of the army; also their social and religious work among the masses and the classes, and closed with an eloquent appeal for help. A collection was taken on behalf of the "Self-Denial Week" fund of the army.

Warrington.—The Rev. E. W. Lummis preached farewell sermons at Cairo-street Chapel last Sunday, concluding in the evening with a Communion Service, in which between forty and fifty young people, who have joined the congregation since the new year, took part for the first time. Mr. Lummis, who is lecturing in Dublin to-morrow, enters on his ministry at the Great Meeting, Leicester, on Sunday, April 5.

FREDERICK LONG, Manager.

PASSIVE RESISTANCE LEAGUE.

AN APPEAL.

We have lately endeavoured to encourage a very formal concert in resistance to the obligations which have been cast upon us as citizens entitled to the management of Schools which we are called upon to support, because the management has been deliberately withheld from us in the interest of hierarchical intrigue against free, personal, political, and Christian duty and effort; and that, namely, in the interest of parties who would sacrifice every other fellow citizen's and every other fellow Christian's independence.

Practically we are to be called upon to pay rates for the support of Schools from the management of which every effort has been purposely exerted to exclude independent popular representation, and with the express intention of enforcing dogmatic instruction of our children of a kind which we conscientiously believe to be absolutely unchristian in character, and absolutely unlawful in prescription.

We believe it would be sinning against the education of our children to allow such instruction to be enforced at the instance of the so-called Established Church of England, or, worse still, of the intrinsically disloyal Church of Rome.

We have joined ourselves to a very large portion of the most independent, the most loyal, and the most serious-minded of our fellow citizens and our fellow Christians to make the immediate and most forcible protest which we find at all possible and law abiding, namely, to oblige the Administration to take from us by violence what statutes shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin may have imposed, and that by force alone, against our wills.

We will not pay such rates by any accord of ours

This means, no doubt, much responsibility and often painful effort on behalf of each other in making known our principles and proceedings, and afterwards in defending against process by law, and helping to bear the sacrifice thereby caused to many of our poorer brethren, who can ill afford to pay costs for maintaining principle.

We admit that the law may oblige its administrators to enforce unjust charges, but we have made up our minds that cost what it may to us or our companions in principle and suffering, we will bear our Cross in this matter.

Of course, any agitation or organisation of the kind necessarily requires certain and material pecuniary assistance.

There is a vast amount of office work in printing and circulating papers, in occasional travelling expenses to meet friends on the same campaign, and more or less in arranging for and carrying out public meetings of protest and inspiration.

The Committee itself cannot be expected to undertake large expenses of the kind, and our Committee has determined that it will not proceed upon borrowed money.

We have therefore to appeal in the greatest seriousness to our friends not only for subscriptions to, but for self-sacrifice in our cause. We have already received promises of smaller or larger amounts, and in many cases the smaller contributions are truly the mites of the faithful.

Rich men seldom sacrifice so much as poor ones.

We make our appeal at once to every man's own conscience in this matter to assist liberally if he can afford it, to give something, if that is all that he can do.

The future prosecution of the operations of our Association are at present, to say the least, such as we cannot anticipate. We do not know how much we may have to spend, or in what way.

We therefore frame our appeal to those who can afford liberal subscriptions to give us, in addition to money which we may place in the Bank for our continuous use, also the promise of guaranteed money which the Committee may call up, pro rata, when they require it; and we very earnestly appeal to the sympathisers and friends of our movement to respond faithfully and earnestly to what has thus been taken up, and recommended, as the Cause of Civil Liberty, and of what is still more at our hearts, Religious Freedom.

Subscriptions or promises of guarantee may be sent to either of the undersigned.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE first list of new and increased subscriptions to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be found advertised on our back page. From this it will be seen that the £2,000 to add to the one munificent subscription of £1,000 from the President's Friend is practically assured. That the whole £2,000 is actually in this list we are not so sure; our impression is that about £50 more is needed, and plenty more fifties will be welcome, and well used if they come. Whoever likes arithmetic can add up the right hand lists, subtract from the result the sum of the left-hand lists, which are last year's subscriptions, and add a fifth of the donations. The result will show whether the whole £2,000 is actually there.

IN view of the crisis in educational affairs in London, and in response to an appeal from the leaders of the Progressive and Unsectarian party, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, with the approval of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, consented to become a member during the lifetime of the present Board. He was elected without opposition on Thursday. He had already served as one of the representatives of Southwark for twelve years. He will now represent the Hackney Division.

THE Rev. C. Silvester Horne has accepted the superintendency of the Central Mission at Whitefield's Tabernacle, in Tottenham Court-road, now in the hands of the London Congregational Union. He is to close his ministry at Kensington in June, and enter on his new work in September. Another appointment of great importance to Congregationalists is that of Professor Adeney to the Principalship of the Lancashire Independent College, in succession to Dr. Caleb Scott.

THE statistics of church attendance furnished by the Daily News are still the subject of reflection and anxiety. A Methodist paper said the other day that the truth must be confessed that the mass of the people are outside the churches, "and they are outside the churches because they are outside Christ." It is not quite clear what this comment means. If it means they are outside because they have not been converted into humble docile members of churches it is an "identical proposition." But they are surely not outside of all Christian influences, they are not outside all the means of grace, or all possibility of salvation. All that the statistics suggest is that they are mainly outside of the reach of organised churches; they spend no effort among us; they gain no (direct) benefit from us. Either they will not spend their strength in our churches because they suppose that a man cannot spiritually live upon such returns as we are able to give; they suppose they can be stronger, manlier, freer in some other way; or else dull indifference possesses them, and they are content with what is tolerable only, and do not seek the highest and best. In any case it is no time for lamentation. We have to seek in the one case to arouse the lethargic and dull, in the other to satisfy the spiritual needs of the eager ones who keep aloof, not out of carelessness, but a profound distrust which it is ours to conquer.

DR. J. M. WHITON, of New York, is contributing a monthly article to the Daily News on "Religious Life in America." The first note in his article which appeared on March 30 was as follows:—

> The Boston commemoration of the tenth anniversary of the death of Phillips Brooks, reported in this column last month, had a singular sequel. The Holy Communion was part of the commemoration service. The Rev. Edward Everett Hale, whom nobody could reasonably suspect of not following the Master, though the orthodox regret that "he followeth not with us," was among the number who went forward and communicated. Whereupon the Living Church, the organ of the "Catholic" party among American Episcopalians, proceeded to demonstrate the difference between "Churchianity" and Christianity, denouncing Dr. Hale's participation in the Sacrament as sacrilege, and, of course, condemning the Churchmen who tolerated such profanation of holy things. When this attack came to the notice of Dr. Hale, he merely said: "I received my invitation to the Lord's Table 1,900 years ago."

FOR some time a quiet revolution has been taking place in various Nonconformist churches in regard to the method of administering the service of the Lord's Supper. In many free churches the "individual cup" has been adopted with no loss to the reverence of the service or the brotherliness of the members, and with a certain sense of satisfaction that what was done was done wisely, and that no objection to the service could be raised on medical grounds. The Free Methodist states that the new system has been adopted in sixty-eight churches, including thirty-eight Congregational, eight Baptist, and thirteen Free Methodist churches. It adds "the feeling of fellowship and the sense of the Divine Presence may be strong and undisturbed with the use of the separate cups."

OUR Chicago contemporary Unity has already begun the celebration of the Emerson Centenary, in a series of articles contributed by well-known writers. In the issue of Feb. 19 Mr. F. B. Sanborn, of Concord, with the remembrance of nearly thirty years of personal intimacy, writes on "Emerson, the Person and the Philosopher," and mentions that he is about to publish in Boston a little book on the "Personality of Emerson." In the Unity article Mr. Sanborn speaks of Emerson's innate religiousness, and quotes from the "Life" Martineau's letter to Alexander Ireland in 1882, soon after Emerson's death:—

> I first heard of Emerson in 1830, from Henry Ware and his wife, who visited me at Dublin, and I have a faint impression that even then he was spoken of by the elder minister with a shade of reserve, as if the want of congeniality between the evangelical pastor and the independent thinker was already inwardly felt. Three years afterwards, in 1833, Emerson sought me out in Liverpool, introduced by Henry Ware, and told me the story of his scruples about the Communion. I was struck with the mixture of clear decision on that subject, and of modest suspense on topics he had not fully thought out. It was his visit in 1847 that left upon me an indelible impression of the depth and greatness of his nature. In his personality he appeared to me almost all that is noble, lovely, and venerable; and in his critical and ethical writings he rose to the very perfection of moral judgment; pure and keen without a trace of cynicism, and with a selecting enthusiasm for all beauty and good—calm and passionless because full of faith in them as the permanency of the world.

Of Martineau's opinion, expressed somewhat later, that he had not learnt much from Emerson, Mr. Sanborn thinks the reason is that "the rather formal, though profound, intelligence of Martineau could not quite keep pace with the glancing, poetic insight of Emerson." This is what Martineau says:—

A most winning and delightful personality on the side of the affections and conscience, he somewhat disappointed me intellectually. With deep and lively flashes of insight, characteristic of real genius, I find mixed many dicta which, though striking in their epigrammatic form, do not speak to me as true. Much as I love the man, I seek in vain to learn from him. The fault is probably in me.

For his own part, Mr. Sanborn thinks of Emerson as, like Plato, "a poetic inspirer, and a master of style in writing."

To the next number of Unity, Feb. 26, Robert Collyer contributes some pleasant "Memories of Emerson." Their first meeting was in 1862 at Concord, where, Collyer says, "I spent the afternoon with him, eating pears, or perhaps I ate them while he hunted them for me in the drawers where they were hidden away to mellow." After that, when Emerson went to Chicago to lecture, he often found his way to Collyer's house. The last of Collyer's "Memories" we must quote:—

Once on a visit we went to drink tea at the house of my dear friend, Mr. Dexter. A young school teacher went with me, and on our way to the lecture she took his arm. "What are you reading?" he asked her, as they went along the street. "The poets, sir," she answered, "I love best." "And what poets?" "Emerson," she answered. Whereat he shook his head. "And Tennyson." "Ah, that is better." "And Wordsworth." "Best of all," he said, eagerly and brightly. "Give your days to Wordsworth." In the summer before he died I preached in Concord one Sunday. He was present at the services, and I went in the afternoon to tea at the lovely old home. He was sitting then on the side of the river in the land of Beulah, where Bunyan's pilgrim sits, and a light which is not of the sun shone through the fine old face and eyes as through a dim transparency. We could not talk of the old times. These were no more remembered, and he was mostly silent, but now and then would say a word full of my host's sweet courtesy, but I felt this was a communion service as we sat about the table, and after this I saw his face no more.

The Burlington Magazine for Connoisseurs, illustrated and published monthly (Savoy Publishing Co. 2s. 6d.), has achieved in its first number a notable success. Sumptuous in form, the Burlington promises to take a first place in periodical Art literature, making "the serious and disinterested study of ancient art its chief occupation." Mr. Bernhard Berenson, the well-known critic of Italian art, opens with a masterly exposition of Alunno di Domenico. He is followed by a careful delineation of Early Dutch Painting by Mr. James Weale, and a note on a lost Adoration of the Magi of Boticelli by Mr. Herbert P. Horne. The Domestic Arts are represented by Emile Molinier's "French Furniture of Louis XIV."; Types of Old French Houses, Tinder Boxes, and Oriental Carpets. We are glad to note, in connection with this department, the editor's protest against the eccentricity of the present day, such, e.g., as meets us at every turn at the Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

"Originality" (Mr. Dell says) is hunted like the snark, and now we are to have it in the articles of our daily life. Where common sense dictates that our furniture shall be flat, we are to find it bulge; where structure and convenience demand a straight line, originality insists on flaccid curves; where beauty and the operations of the craft require an edge, we are to have a veiled contour. It is to be hoped we shall have the sensation of novelty when we sit down on an "original" apex.

The illustrations are numerous, and no pains have been spared in rendering them worthy of the originals. If the result is not always quite successful, it is because the choice of process—as in Domenico's "Pieta"—has been unfortunate. In his "Triumph of Venus," on the other hand, the atmosphere and delicacy of tone are almost as pure as in the original. The type and paper are admirably chosen. The editor, Mr. Robert Dell, is to be warmly congratulated on this first result of his new enterprise.

REV. R. J. CAMPBELL ON THE MANHOOD OF CHRIST.

Last week's Christian World contained the following letter from the Rev. J. Page Hopps:—

Sir,—The Christian World Pulpit for Feb. 18 contains a sermon by Mr. R. J. Campbell on "Supposing Christ were only a man." In this sermon we are told that there is no difference in kind between God and man: that the difference is only a question of goodness. It tells us that Mr. Campbell contemplates Christ and salutes him as "My Lord and my God," because Christ has reached the requisite height of goodness. It tells us that when Christ, as the fully unfolded man, reaches Godhood, he still has The Father above him. Most of your readers, perhaps, know what I am, and I want you to let me declare that all this I, as a Unitarian (in the modern sense of spiritual Theism), steadfastly believe.

But let me quote Mr. Campbell's very words. Citing certain objections, he says, of Christ: "Oh, simplify the matter at once, and let us say, 'Here was a man, the greatest of men, the noblest of men, the purest of men, one who has given us vision of God, but still only a man.'" Then he says, "Wait a little. What is a man? Let us settle that question first. The difference between man and man is infinite. . . . Some men stand far above their fellows. You cannot think of them without looking up; their humanity towers up and up until it is lost in divinity and indistinguishable therefrom."

This is driven home by the following statements: "Man is a fragment of Divinity, and he never can forfeit his origin. 'Only a man'—but we must take each man at his real value. How much of God does a man contain? That is the way in which to measure his humanity. 'Only a man'—may he never cease to be a man, too, when his manhood towers up and up till it touches God and reveals God? We are mistaken when we try to draw any line between that humanity and the God that created it."

"Cease talking about mankind as though it were something different from Deity. The difference between man and God is a difference not in kind but in moral height. From the side of God there is no line drawn between humanity and Deity at all."

"I have seen many attempts at manhood, but I never have seen a man save in the New Testament. 'Behold the man!'—the only one. When I have said that, like Thomas, I have cried out, 'My Lord and my God.' Fulness of the stature of manhood brings me God, all the God I am capable of receiving, and still the Christ, who is the humanity of God, is looking up into the face of the Father. To all eternity, it must be so."

All this is revolutionary, and it does not matter what else Mr. Campbell says, for all else must be determined by these explicit declarations, which are vital and fundamental. The old arithmetical treatment of the Trinity is dead. The modern Unitarian is a spiritual Theist who believes in an immanent God, in whom we all live and move and have our being, and who lives and moves and has His being in us; and when he is told that Christ reached divinity through an ideal humanity, and that we are all following on, till we attain to "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," he sees no real point of difference, and wants to say so. Hence this letter, which, let me say, might possibly help to make history, if you would lay it before your readers.—Yours truly,

March 19. J. Page Hopps.

Many co-operators are feeling strongly that they ought to have a Garden City of their own. The Co-operative Wholesale Society does an enormous trade and owns over a score of large factories, mostly situated in large towns, and extensions and new buildings for industrial production are frequent. The sales of the Society in 1900 amounted to more than £16,000,000, and the increase is continuous. There are many other societies for co-operative production besides the "Wholesale." It is clear that by the co-operation of "co-operators," a city might be established in which their factories might be brought together—where their new enterprises might be established, and whither some, at least, of the old might be removed, with all the advantages of low rent, healthy and pleasant surroundings and convenience of arrangement of a Garden City. It is pointed out that an employé at the Co-operative Wholesale Society's Printing Works at Longsight, Manchester, has to pay 9s. 6d. a week for a house, whereas his requirements could be met in a more country district for 2s. 6d. Lower rents and better houses and many other advantages would be gained if the Wholesale Society took the matter in hand and established a beautiful, healthy, and well-arranged co-operative city. The Scottish Wholesale Society might do the same. From such an enlightened policy carried out with enterprise and careful forethought, one would hope for the best results.

Vegetarians at the National Conference.—The Rev. Arthur Harvie, of 11, Birchfield-road, Northampton, writes to say that through the courtesy of the local committee a vegetarian table will be provided at the luncheons in connection with the forthcoming Conference at Liverpool. Friends wishing to avail themselves of this accommodation are asked to send in their names to Mr. Harvie at once in order to facilitate arrangements.

THE SCOTTISH EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM.

In the prophetic enthusiasm of his reforming work, John Knox set up for Scotland the ideal of a school for every parish. Working under the inspiration of his idea the Scottish Parliament established parochial schools. The result, as Macaulay says, was an improvement such as the world has never seen in the moral and intellectual character of the people. Wherever a Scotchman went he carried his superiority with him. The Scotchman of the eighteenth century was the object of envy. The State had given him an education.

Education Free.

The State education thus provided was free. The schoolmaster was paid in peats, meal, and money by the heritors of the parish. He had to add frugality to his knowledge, but withal could hardly exist, and permission was cautiously given to him to claim a fee. But the fee system was not general till the end of the eighteenth century, nor was the right to charge fees acknowledged legislatively before the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Education Denominational.

Up till 1872 the schools were mostly denominational. There were many small adventure schools of an elementary sort, in which the Bible was the general reading book and the Shorter Catechism was used. There were also Burgal academies, but the majority were Church schools connected with the Established Church. After the disruption in 1843 Free Church schools started, and entered into successful competition with the Established Church schools.

Education Act, 1872.

The Act of 1872 broke the back of denominational education. Very wisely, Lord Young's act provided that within twelve months after its passing a School Board shall be elected "in and for each and every parish and burgh." What was voluntary in England was compulsory in Scotland.

Now there are in Scotland 972 School Boards, having 5,670 members, elected triennially, by cumulative vote. Over parishes or combinations of school districts, with a population of 2,394,157, there are 916 Boards, and over burghs or towns with a population of 2,077,843 there are 56 Boards. The lowest membership of any Board is 5; the highest 15.

The various Boards are constituted thus:—

5	Boards	with	15	members	each.
1	,,	,,	13	,,	,,
3	,,	,,	11	,,	,,
53	,,	,,	9	,,	,,
261	,,	,,	7	,,	,,
649	,,	,,	5	,,	,,

School Rate.

The school rate ranges from 2¼d. to 2s. 5d. per pound: the lowest being in Cupar (L), Fife; the highest in Shetland. The total school rate collected by all the Boards, according to last report (1902), was £1,012,360 5s. 2d., showing an average of 10·34d. per pound of the rateable value.

School Accommodation.

As a proof of the fact that the provision of school places fully corresponds to the need, it is shown that while there is a population of 4,472,000, implying 745,333 necessary school places, there are actually 921,119 school places in existence.

Attendance.

Number of children that might be at school (1902), 894,400.
Number of children actually on registers, 767,421.
Number of children that might be in daily attendance, 745,333.
Number of children in actual average attendance, 636,374.

Comparing attendance now with attendance before the passing of the Act of 1872, it is noteworthy that in 1872 the average attendance was 213,549, or 6·29 per cent. of the population. In 1901 the percentage was 71 per cent.

School Buildings.

The figures show that since 1872 grants have been made for building or enlarging public schools to the amount of £577,955. Local expenditure for the same, £2,097,883. School places thus provided, £266,340. Cost per school place, £10 0s. 11d. Of that sum £7 17s. 6d. was provided locally: State grant, £2 3s. 5d. The total loans sanctioned for school buildings since 1872 amount to £7,977,676. The liabilities for outstanding loans is £3,324,495.

Cost of System.

The total expenditure for the year ending Whit Sunday, 1901, was £2,601,461 8s. 10d.

Teaching Power.

The teaching power consists of 11,268 certificated teachers in inspected day schools.

Of these 80·31 (males) and 62·70 (females) passed through Training Colleges.

University Graduates, 967.

Pupil Teachers, 4,035.

Proportion of Scholars to each C. T., 57.

Average salary of male teachers (principal or assistant), £146 0s. 11d.

Average female, £72 6s. 3d.

The teaching supply comes mainly from the eight Denominational Training Colleges. Three of these are Established Church, three United Free Church, one Episcopalian, and one Roman Catholic. The King's Students scheme is in operation at St. Andrews and Aberdeen, and there are 132 students.

Secondary Education.

But while elementary education was thus provided for, secondary education was left very much to adventure. The summary of the income which passed through Secondary Education Committees during the year ending May 15, 1901, shows that £116,409 13s. was spent, of which £56,276 0s. 10d. came in State grants and £17,730 17s. 2d. from local sources.

The secondary schools do not, either in themselves or in their relation to primary and higher institutions, form parts of a coherent system. The educational effort and enterprise of recent years have resulted in the establishment of many valuable schools, secondary and technical, and have greatly improved others which already existed. But the effort has been sporadic, and has not been guided by any systematic conception, but by local and even accidental considerations. The majority of the secondary schools are under no public authority. The curricula are arranged at the will of their governors, and in entire independence of one another. And secondary education is detached from elementary instruction as well as incoherent in itself. Separated as they are, the later stage has nothing that leads up to it, and the earlier leads to nothing beyond itself.

A strong discontent has steadily grown around secondary education. It is generally felt that the co-ordination of it with primary and higher education which is lacking, though imperatively necessary, marks a fatal defect. The distinction between secondary and primary education is now seen to be artificial. "It has been brought about by political exigencies, and it exists only for political purposes. Secondary education, in truth, is a particular stage in a continuous process—the stage, that is, which lies between the elementary schools and the universities or technical colleges." There are no educational grounds for the distinction; and the fact that "a fixed and hard separation has come to exist between these two stages of one process is a manifest loss both to primary and secondary education."

Though the Scottish Primary System is nominally public it is Vitiated by Denominationalism.

The training colleges are denominational. The teachers passing through them have a sectarian tinge which affects the religious instruction given by them. They enter the colleges as pupils already indoctrinated from Sunday-schools, and while they are at college they are in a denominational atmosphere. Though they are not taught dogmatic theology, they are subjected to sectarian influences, and come out imbued with the prejudices of their sect. The training of the pupils in Scripture knowledge is of a superficial and traditional character, and they emerge from college without any knowledge of what the higher criticism has done for the Bible.

The retention of their training colleges by the Presbyterians when they gave up their schools was virtually an act of the dead hand. It gave them practical control of the religious instruction in public schools, and the schools have been effectually sectarianised. With few exceptions (the schools under the Aberdeen and Dundee Boards being notable exceptions) the Shorter Catechism is taught in Board-schools. The scheme of religious instruction varies from Board to Board, but it is usually designed on dogmatic lines. (The scheme of the Aberdeen Board is designedly Messianic; the selected passages and paraphrases for memorising are chosen on Messianic lines.) The religious instruction is of the most irresponsible and ineffective character. The teachers find it irksome; there is no state inspection, and no pains to discover results. The whole thing is anomalous; it is, in fact, a fraud. It should either be thoroughly taken in hand or entirely left out.

There is an association (twenty-three years old) for the inspection of religious instruction. In 1902 its inspectors visited 526 schools, mostly in Inverness, Ross, and Argyle. One of the inspectors says:—

The entire suitableness of the Scotch system of religious instruction to the minds of parents is borne out by the fact that it is almost unknown for a child to be exempted from it, except in the case of Roman Catholics. All the children, with the above exceptions, learn the Bible lessons, and in those schools where the Catechism is taught, children of parents who object to it just say, "I don't take Catechism." In a large proportion of schools the only part of the Catechism that is taught are the Commandments and the Creed.

It is impossible to say to what denomination a teacher belongs, for there is nothing in the instruction given which partakes of a sectarian character. The principles of morality and the great verities of the Christian faith, as they are held by the nation at large, are impressed on the minds of the children. [The words which I have italicised indicate Calvinism. There can be no doubt about it, children in the public schools are directly and indirectly taught the Calvinistic dogmas of the "Fall," the "Trinity," "Vicarious Atonement," a "Personal Devil," and "Eternal Torment." I have known cases of teachers who were Unitarians reproved by head masters for softening or not teaching these dogmas. If the Bible lesson itself does not furnish such teaching the hymn may do it; and even a natural history lesson is made a means of impressing the children with a fear of Satan going about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour.]

The Manning of Boards

has been a Sectarian question mainly. The Presbyterian sects compete with each other for seats, and the Episcopalians and Roman Catholics elect representatives in their own interest. The presence of Episcopal and Catholic representatives has proved a hindrance to progress. They stand out against free books and improvements generally, in the interest of their own schools, which are inferior in construction and equipment to the Board Schools.

The Radical Difficulty

in religious instruction lies in the fact that the nation itself is not a unity with regard to religion. It is split up into sects, one of which is established by law, and there is not enough agreement ecclesiastically to form a basis of public instruction. The ecclesiastical is so interwoven with the theological that there cannot be consent got to separate them. It would not be possible in any constituency to get a majority, or even a strong minority, in favour of purely Secular education. There is a latent desire among Presbyterians to hold the schools for their ideas; and it will help the introduction of reactionary measures. As an evidence of how the case stands in Aberdeen, I may mention that only thirty out of 30,000 scholars are kept from religious instruction.

Impending Changes.

In the educational profession there is going on an animated discussion in view of impending changes, and there is a unanimous opinion in favour of "suitably large educational areas, each under one local authority having control of all kinds of education." The County Committees on Secondary and Technical Education have recommended that the county should be the area for higher and technical education, while elementary education should be left to parishes and groups of parishes.

It has to be admitted that the small School Boards have not proved satisfactory, and that changed conditions point to the necessary supercedure of the parochial area. The Parochial system has been made a fetish, but its doom is pronounced. The Universities of Scotland are now virtually free. They have a raised standard for entrance, and the elementary as well as the higher schools have to recognise it. The development of Arts and Industries in all the leading countries requires the establishment of efficient technical schools. Scotland has few, if any, worthy technical schools. There is a felt need for such schools, and the feeling indicates the growing point in Scottish education.

A proposal has been made by Dr. Douglas and Professor Jones, in a pamphlet entitled "Scottish Educational Reform," for county districts as areas, and district School Boards as educational authorities. It is claimed that by that means the direct election of the educational authority would be secured and the co-ordination of control and management would be attained.

A Scottish Council of Education.

Messrs. Douglas and Jones also warmly advocate the creation by statute of a National Council of Education, and they close their timely pamphlet by expressing the hope (which every true Scot will echo) "that the people of Scotland, now that they have been brought face to face with this great national concern, will devote themselves to the task of discovering and of securing from the British Parliament a solution of the problem which shall be adequate to the needs of the present and provide for that continued and steadfast progress in public education which is one of the ultimate factors of national welfare." LITERATURE.

THE VILLAGE PROBLEM.*

The writer of this interesting book is personally known to many readers of The Inquirer from his connection with our churches, and to a much larger circle as an author and veteran journalist. About a dozen years ago he wrote a series of articles in the Daily News on "Life in our Villages," which attracted much attention, and now he returns to the subject in the book before us. He brings to the treatment of his subject large knowledge, a vivid style of writing, deep sympathy with suffering, and an almost prophetic fervour in the advocacy of his remedy.

Unfortunately there is little room for difference of opinion as to Mr. Millin's statement of the Problem. Whatever may be the cause or cure for the decay of village life, of the fact itself there is no doubt. In 1871, out of every 10,000 of the population in the United Kingdom 531 earned agricultural wages; ten years later this number was reduced to 394; ten years later still to 318. The returns for 1901, we believe, are not yet available; but the general impression is that the rate of decline has continued. These figures are full of significance to the economist, the politician, the social reformer. In the villages work is more plentiful than workers; in the towns workers are more plentiful than work. According to the familiar axiom these disproportions ought to work themselves right automatically.

But there is no sign, as yet, of their doing so. The problem is complicated by other than purely economic considerations.

Mr. Millin comes on more debatable ground when he prescribes as a remedy the abolition of private property in land (we presume "with the Ten Commandments," to use Mr. John Morley's phrase) and the establishment of self-contained village communities. He states his case with great force, and presents a glowing picture of the results which would follow the adoption of his plan. We gather that, life-long Liberal as he is, he would not hesitate to put a tax upon wheat, e.g., if it should turn out that it costs more to grow wheat on village lands than it can be bought for in the open market.

The question cannot be discussed here; we only wish to indicate our author's position and to induce readers to go to the book for themselves. Anxious as is the existing state of things we doubt whether the escape from it is to be found by going in the face of all the modern tendencies due to the opening up of the great world and the taking advantage of special aptitudes of individuals, nations and climates. The motive that prompts a man, when possible, to plant his fruit trees against a wall with a southern aspect is universal and far-reaching. At the same time the high à priori method is out of place here, and we are therefore entirely in favour of trying well thought out experiments in regard to this perplexing problem. We have often wished that land nationalisers, instead of attempting to begin with an old country like England, where every possible difficulty blocks their way, would make a start, say, with Western Canada, where no private interests in land have yet been created. At present the Colonial Government thinks it necessary, in order to tempt the new settlers whom it desires, to offer them grants of land. In doing so, is it labouring under a delusion? If so, it should be comparatively easy to convince it of the error of its ways. Land nationalisers would vastly strengthen their case if they could point to a flourishing community which was actually founded upon and illustrated their principle.

THE MENACE OF MISERY.*

I.

Both these little books utter a warning which, in these days of police efficiency and general orderliness, is, perhaps, too lightly regarded. As it was with the Court at Versailles—as well as in the days of Noe—so, perhaps, it is in these days. At any rate, the author of "From the Abyss," commencing his series of vivid descriptions with a reminiscence of Mafeking night, likens the rowdyism of the partially-submerged London districts to a cave bear emerging from its dark den."

Now it is straightening itself and learning to gambol with heavy and grotesque antics in the sunshine. It finds the exercise pleasant; it uproots a small tree, displaces a rock, laughing with pleasant good humour. How long before, in a fit of ill-temper, it suddenly realises its tremendous, unconquerable might?

And Mr. McKenzie concludes a more statistical review of a somewhat different class with the warning:—

We cannot leave the unemployed and hard-driven poor to stew in the juice of their own misery with safety. France tried it over a century ago. The dish, when cooked, was eaten by others beside the poor. The slums of London to-day are a menace to our safety.

We confess we do not rate the appeal to fear very high. If class selfishness will not yield to a reasonable love of kind there seems little probability that it will flow down before the frost of terror. But while this is so, there can be no doubt that a vast number of persons ought to be better acquainted with the facts of London life than they are. It is in this that these books, especially the former, have their mission, and if they are successful in arousing interest in the types of life—or existence—they describe, they will achieve, perhaps, the highest object an author can set before him to-day.

We say the former especially because its author's aim is description pure and simple, and "From the Abyss" will doubtless be read by many on account of its literary merits who would turn aside from bare statistics or proposed remedies. The book suggests no remedy whatever. It is solely concerned with giving us pictures—of rare merit—of life in districts like Bermondsey and Camberwell. While it is evident that the author feels keenly, he has his feelings well under control, and his work is further assisted by a vein of humour, difficult to "place," just sufficient to give the necessary light (and lightness) to the sombre scene.
